START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

MARCH 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-016

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library

(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

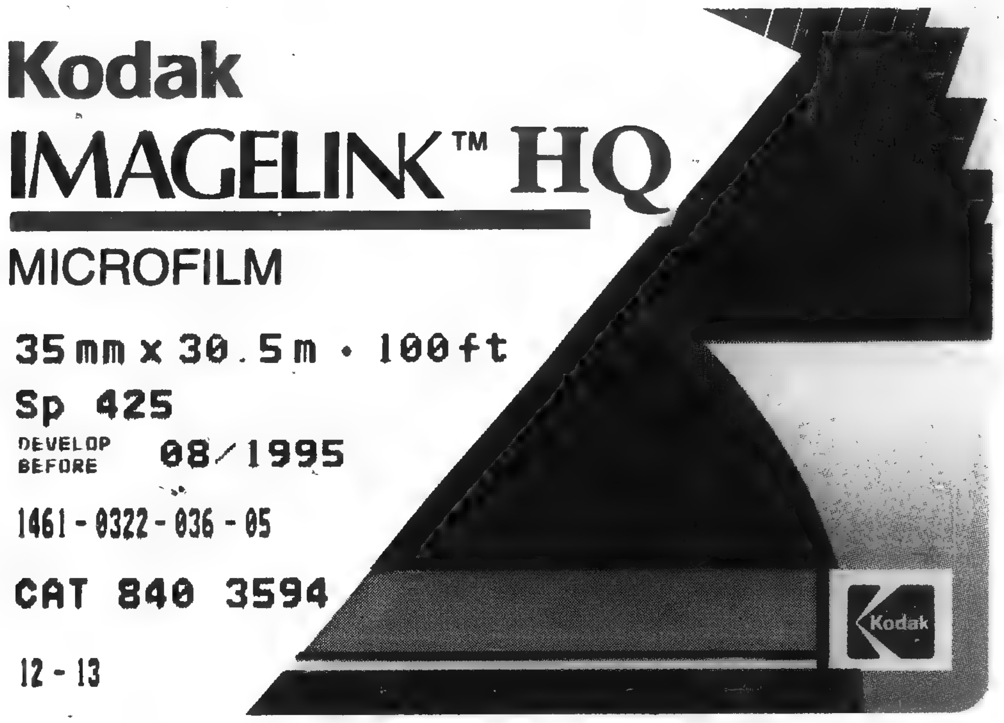
This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:



Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35 mm x 30.5 m · 100 ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 08/1995
1461 - 0322 - 036 - 05
CAT 840 3594
12 - 13

REEL 16

Volume 33-34

BSO-POPS
1914-1915
to
BSO-POPS
1915-1916

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

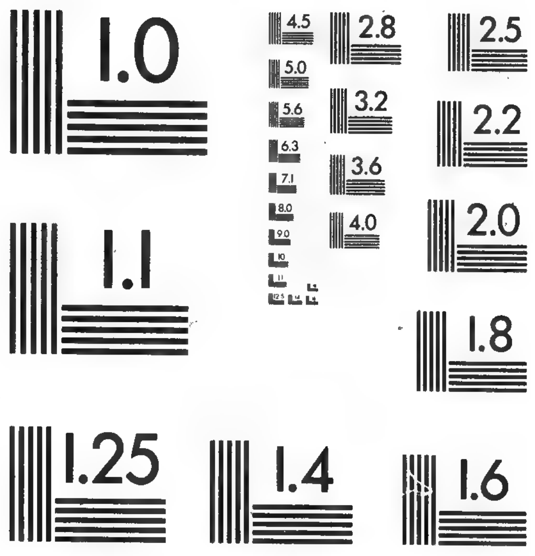
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm



1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5

A4

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 33

BSO
Pops

1914 - 1915

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER

ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

HILL SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
8 MILK ST.
BOSTON.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1913.

WAR WON'T STOP THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck to Sail for Boston Next Week—Most of the Players Coming.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the coming season are now assured. Events have so shaped themselves that they will begin Oct. 16 and 17, according to a statement yesterday by Henry L. Higginson.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, cabled yesterday from London that its scheduled concerts in Boston, New York and other cities will take place on the dates named; that there will be but few changes in the members of the orchestra, and that most of the "assisting artists," singers and virtuosi will be able to appear.

It is declared to be likely that Kreisler and Thibaud, who are believed to be enrolled in the Austrian and French armies, respectively, will be able to come. A full program of the schedule for the season will be announced within a week or ten days, concerts continuing from Oct. 16 to the beginning of May, 24 pairs in all. A few concerts in the West, scheduled for early in October, are the only ones to be abandoned.

M. Grisez, the first clarinet, is now in the hospital corps of the French army, and a new player must take his place for a few weeks, at least. Dr. Muck has engaged players in Berlin as substitutes for those who answered the call of the Kaiser. The coming of all these to Boston is now assured. Very little new music has been secured by Dr. Muck. He will leave from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was motoring in Bavaria and the Tyrol when the war commenced. On Aug. 1, the first official day of German mobilization, he was in Bayreuth conferring with Dr. Muck about the symphony work for the coming season. He then returned to Munich, and with Dr. Muck, who worked from Bayreuth, sought out the members of the orchestra, their plans and possibility of playing in Boston this fall. Letters and telegrams, however, could not be sent into hostile countries from Munich, and Mr. Ellis had much difficulty in getting in touch with his men.

When the restraints against foreigners leaving the country were taken off, the manager went to Rotterdam and made better progress with his search. Later he met Dr. Muck, and they matured plans and engaged the necessary new players.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Full Course Will Be Given Without Change in Announced Dates and With Few Changes in Personnel.

It was officially announced yesterday by Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Boston's famous Symphony concerts will begin Oct 16 and 17.

C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who is now in London, has cabled that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled, and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear. Even Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, the violinists who were believed to be in the Austrian and the French Armies, are likely to be able to keep their engagements.

It is said that the war has necessitated relatively few changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French Army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk.

To replace the few men who were called to one or another army Dr Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin, and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the Summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt.

Dr Muck expects to sail for America from Rotterdam next week.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY TO START OCT. 16

All Players Rounded Up—Dr. Muck to Conduct

The war will not affect the regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, and already the announcement [illegible] made that the [illegible] on Oct. 16

[illegible] was as to whether concerts [illegible] be held this season at all. However, the management have worked night and day in locating the various members abroad, and one by one the musicians have been rounded up. Practically all of the men will be in Boston on Oct. 1.

It was feared at first that a majority of them had enlisted in the armies abroad, but investigation proved to the contrary.

Dr. Muck will be on hand for the first concert.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 16,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS NOW ASSURED

A NOTE FROM MR. HIGGINSON—THE REGULAR BEGINNING AND THE FULL NUMBER—FEW CHANGES IN THE ORCHESTRA

Mr. H. L. Higginson has sent to the Transcript the following note about the Symphony Concerts for the new season:

Events have so shaped themselves that it is now possible to announce that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season will begin Oct. 16 and 17. HENRY L. HIGGINSON

Boston, Sept. 16, 1914.

Yesterday morning, Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, who is now in London, cabled to its officers here that its concerts in Boston, New York and all the other cities that it annually visits were now assured; that the concerts would take place on the dates already announced; that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled; and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear. Even Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, who are believed to be in the Austrian and the French armies, were likely to be able to keep their engagements.

Accordingly full announcement of the schedule and the arrangements for the year will be made a week or ten days hence. The concerts will begin on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, and continue as usual until the beginning of May—twenty-four pairs in all. The series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Cambridge, and the occasional visits to other cities will all be accomplished, "as announced." Only the concerts in the West in the first days of October have been abandoned.

The war has necessitated relatively few changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr. Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk. To replace the few men that were "called" to one or another army, Dr. Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin. Their journey to Boston has now been assured and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt. Necessarily Dr. Muck has been able to secure the scores and parts of very little new music, but—this lack of novelties aside—the programmes will run as usual with him. He himself embarks from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

When the war began, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was fortunate enough to be motoring in Bavaria and the Tyrol. On Aug. 1, the day that the German mobilization officially began, he was in Baireuth to confer with Dr. Muck about the arrangements for the new season. Both were eager to carry out the concerts as planned and announced. Mr. Ellis then returned to Munich and with Dr. Muck similarly working from Baireuth, sought to learn what members of the orchestra were in Europe and what assurance there was of their return in September to Boston. Little could be done in Munich, since it was impossible to send letters and telegrams into hostile countries, while into neutral territory they were long delayed. In the midst of the mobilization, Mr. Ellis made another risky automobile journey to Baireuth to confer with Dr. Muck.

When foreigners were at last permitted to leave Bavaria, the manager established himself at Rotterdam and, as far as he might by letters and telegrams, learned conditions of affairs in Boston, discovered the players who were in Europe, arranged for their return or ascertained the impossibility of it. Then he made the tedious and uncomfortable journey now thirty-six hours long, from Rotterdam to Berlin, and Dr. Muck made as long a one from Baireuth. In Berlin they matured their plans and the conductor engaged the necessary new players. Once in London again after another almost endless journey Mr. Ellis sent the message to Mr. Higginson that assures the concerts.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck and the Dresden Opera—A Plain Account of the Negotiations with Him and the Outcome—Kreisler Not at the Front—Miss Duncan Transfers Her Dancing School to America

WHEN Dr. Muck arrived in Germany from Boston last spring, he betook himself to the "Weisser Hirsch," a suburb of Dresden in the hills above the Elbe to undergo the recuperative process that the Germans call a "cure." There he was visited almost daily by Count Seebach, the able and persistent Intendant of the Court Theatres at Dresden. Count Seebach besought Dr. Muck to become the director and the chief conductor of the Court Opera House in succession to von Schuch, who had lately died, who had made its orchestra the foremost operatic orchestra in the world, and who had given the thea[illegible] composers preferred it [illegible] other for the first production of their work. Count Seebach offered to Dr. Muck an absolutely free and unquestioned hand in the control of the Opera House and a very large salary, as salaries go for such work anywhere. To it several rich and interested Dresdeners added an annual contribution until report in the city set the promised honorarium at $20,000 a year.

To these daily prayers and proffers Dr. Muck replied that he was under contract to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years more; that he was well satisfied with the conditions and the results of his work in America, and that he purposed to fulfil his obligations cheerfully and to the letter. Count Seebach then professed his willingness to wait three years for Dr. Muck, providing that he would then accept the proferred post. Dr. Muck replied that he could not make decisions that belonged to the spring of 1917 in the spring of 1914. On the other hand, he admitted that the opportunity thus opened at Dresden did appeal to him strongly. Finally, the upshot of almost daily conferences was an agreement upon Dr. Muck's part to prepare and to conduct a few "special performances" of "The Ring" and other of Wagner's operas at Dresden in this present September and again in May and June of next year. Needless to say, both sets of performances have now been abandoned, and the probabilities are that for some years to come neither the Saxon government nor the citizens of Dresden will be able to expend large sums for the upbuilding of their opera under Dr. Muck. In such position, when the haze of contradictory gossip is brushed away, the matter now rests.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 17

SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN BOSTON ASSURED

REGULAR PROGRAMME BEGINS OCT. 16 AND 17

Visits to Other Cities as Planned Also Possible—But Few Changes in Personnel of Orchestra.

The regular programme of symphony concerts in Boston this fall is now assured. Henry L. Higginson announced yesterday the concerts would begin Oct. 16 and 17.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, cabled that concerts in Boston, New York and all the other cities annually visited were now assured; that the concerts would take place on the dates already announced; that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled; and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear.

Even Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, who are believed to be in the Austrian and French armies, were likely to be able to keep their engagements.

Accordingly full announcement of the schedule and the arrangements for the year will soon be made.

The concerts will begin on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, and continue as usual until the beginning of May—24 pairs in all.

The series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Cambridge, and the occasional visits to other cities will all be accomplished, "as announced." Only the concerts in the West in the first days of October have been abandoned.

The war has necessitated relatively new changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr. Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk.

To replace the few men that were "called" to one or another army, Dr. Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin. The journey to Boston has now been assured and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt.

Necessarily Dr. Muck has been able to secure the scores and parts of very little new music, but—this lack of novelties aside—the programmes will run as usual with him. He himself embarks from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON WAY HOME

But Few Caught by War's Demand in Europe

Final proof of the [illegible] season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is furnished by the official announcement from Symphony Hall of the first auction sales of seats for the coming season, which will take place on Monday morning, Oct. 5. Dr. Muck will sail from Europe on the 26th of this month. The possibility of the forthcoming Symphony season is principally due to the splendid labors of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Dr. Muck in Europe.

No one on this side could possibly tell how many members of the Boston Symphony had been forced into the fighting ranks, or whether those not in the ranks could return in time for the regular date of the opening of the season. But reassurance from Mr. Ellis has arrived, and it is now known that with a few and comparatively unimportant exceptions the Symphony Orchestra will be the same orchestra—certainly the same as regards the quality of the performances—as the orchestra of last season.

FIRST CONCERT OCT. 16

Preparations for the season are well advanced. As it was originally intended that the Symphony Orchestra should give a Western tour before opening in Boston, the dates of the auction sales of season tickets had been put forward a week in advance of the usual time.

Now, however, the sales will commence, as in the past, on the first Monday in October. The seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will go on sale on Monday morning, Oct. 5, at 10 a. m., and on Tuesday morning at the same hour. The seats for the Saturday evening performances will be sold on Thursday and Friday mornings, Oct. 8 and 9. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and Saturday evening, Oct. 17. Boston will get its usual number of 24 public rehearsals and concerts. All of the soloists engaged last spring for the coming season are expected to appear, including Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud.

At the beginning of the war there were over 20 members of the orchestra in Europe and among them nearly all of the solo members. So far as it is possible to find out now, only four or five are actually serving in the armies of their various countries, and the rest will be here by the first of October.

Witek on the Way

Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, who was in Sweden at the outbreak of the war is now on his way back from Holland. With him is Mr. Holy, the harpist. There was much doubt about Mr. Holy's whereabouts, as his wife, who did not go abroad this summer, did not hear from him for several weeks, but news has come that he reached Rotterdam in safety.

Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenon and Mr. Meuller, of the oboes are here but Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, is in the French army. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, is also in the French service, but his place has been filled. It is possible, also, that Mr. Agnesy and Mr. Stumpf, the bass clarinet, may be serving, but this is not at all certain. The same applies to Mr. Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, and Mr. Blumenau of the violas, and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellos.

All of these, however, except Mr. Agnesy were in Berlin a short time ago and the chances are very favorable that they have not been called to service. Of the first violins, probably Mr. Koessler is the only one now at the front, as he belonged to the first reserve of the Germany army. Mr. Roth when last heard of was in Munich and will probably be back within a fortnight.

JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY RANKS WILL BE FILLED

Substitutes for Those at the Front—Auction Sale of Seats.

Following The Journal's exclusive announcement, made just a week ago, that the Symphony season would not be canceled, as it was first feared it might have to be, comes the bulletin that the regular auction sale of subscription tickets will begin Monday, Oct. 5. The first concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16.

The Friday afternoon seats will be auctioned off on Monday, Oct. 5, and Tuesday, Oct. 6. The Saturday night concert tickets will be disposed of on Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9.

It is officially announced that only a few members of the orchestra will be absent when the season begins, and their places will be filled at least temporarily by newcomers.

Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, and Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, are serving in the [illegible] Mr. Koessler, one of the [illegible] fighting on the what has become of Mr. Agnesy, Mr. Stumpf, Mr. Blumenan, Mr. Rabenicht and Mr. Steinke. Otto Robb, when last heard from, was in Munich, but he is expected back within a fortnight.

Dr. Muck will probably sail for America a week from today. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who spent most of the summer with Dr. Muck, is now on his way home.

There will be the customary series of twenty-four matinee and twenty-four evening concerts.

TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 19, 1914.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Season

Mr. Higginson's announcement made Wednesday last, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give its usual series of concerts in Boston and elsewhere, cleared up the doubt which has surrounded the future of the orchestra since the war began. There had been for several weeks a very real doubt whether the orchestra would not at least be compelled to postpone the opening of its season. It was impossible to find out how many of the members in Europe would be able to return, but fortunately, as it now stands, there will be only a few who cannot return this year, and their places will be filled.

Preparations for the season are well advanced. The auction sale of tickets for rehearsals will be held Monday, Oct. 5, and Tuesday, Oct. 6; and for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9. The first rehearsal will be given Friday afternoon. Oct. 16, and the first concert the following evening.

So far as it is possible to find out now, only four or five Symphony players are actually serving in the European war. Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, is in the French army. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, is also in the French service. It is possible, also, that Mr. Agnesy and Mr. Stumpf, the bass clarinet, may be serving. The same applies to Mr. Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, and Mr. Blumenau of the violas and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellos. Of the first violins, probably Mr. Koessler is the only one now at the front.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Higginson's announcement made Wednesday, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give its usual series of concerts in Boston and elsewhere, cleared up the doubt which has surrounded the future of the orchestra since the war began.

Preparations for the season are well advanced.

Dr. Muck, who is still in Berlin, is expected to sail Sept. 26. Passage has been secured for him and there seems to be no reason to doubt that he will get his steamer.

The full announcement of the plans of the orchestra will be made in a week.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1914.

WAR WON'T STOP THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck to Sail for Boston Next Week—Most of the Players Coming.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the coming season are now assured. Events have so shaped themselves that they will begin Oct. 16 and 17, according to a statement yesterday by Henry L. Higginson.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, cabled yesterday from London that its scheduled concerts in Boston, New York and other cities will take place on the dates named; that there will be but few changes in the members of the orchestra, and that most of the "assisting artists," singers and virtuosi will be able to appear.

It is declared to be likely that Kreisler and Thibaud, who are believed to be enrolled in the Austrian and French armies, respectively, will be able to come. A full program of the schedule for the season will be announced within a week or ten days, concerts continuing from Oct. 16 to the beginning of May, 24 pairs in all. A few concerts in the West, scheduled for early in October, are the only ones to be abandoned.

M. Grisez, the first clarinet, is now in the hospital corps of the French army, and a new player must take his place for a few weeks, at least. Dr. Muck has engaged players in Berlin as substitutes for those who answered the call of the Kaiser. The coming of all these to Boston is now assured. Very little new music has been secured by Dr. Muck. He will leave from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was motoring in Bavaria and the Tyrol when the war commenced. On Aug. 1, the first official day of German mobilization, he was in Bayreuth conferring with Dr. Muck about the symphony work for the coming season. He then returned to Munich, and with Dr. Muck, who worked from Bayreuth, sought out the members of the orchestra, their plans and possibility of playing in Boston this fall. Letters and telegrams, however, could not be sent into hostile countries from Munich, and Mr. Ellis had much difficulty in getting in touch with his men.

When the restraints against foreigners leaving the country were taken off, the manager went to Rotterdam and made better progress with his search. Later he met Dr. Muck, and they matured plans and engaged the necessary new players.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Full Course Will Be Given Without Change in Announced Dates and With Few Changes in Personnel.

It was officially announced yesterday by Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Boston's famous Symphony concerts will begin Oct 16 and 17.

C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who is now in London, has cabled that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled, and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear. Even Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, the violinists who were believed to be in the Austrian and the French Armies, are likely to be able to keep their engagements.

It is said that the war has necessitated relatively few changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French Army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk.

To replace the few men who were called to one or another army Dr Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin, and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the Summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt.

Dr Muck expects to sail for America from Rotterdam next week.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY TO START OCT. 16

All Players Rounded Up—Dr. Muck to Conduct

The war will not affect the regular plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season and already the announcement [illegible] made that the [illegible] on Oct. 16

[illegible] concern was [illegible] lovers as to whether concerts could be held this season at all. However, the management have worked night and day in locating the various members abroad, and one by one the musicians have been rounded up. Practically all of the men will be in Boston on Oct. 1.

It was feared at first that a majority of them had enlisted in the armies abroad, but investigation proved to the contrary.

Dr. Muck will be on hand for the first concert.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 16,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS NOW ASSURED

A NOTE FROM MR. HIGGINSON—THE REGULAR BEGINNING AND THE FULL NUMBER—FEW CHANGES IN THE ORCHESTRA

Mr. H. L. Higginson has sent to the Transcript the following note about the Symphony Concerts for the new season:

Events have so shaped themselves that it is now possible to announce that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season will begin Oct. 16 and 17. HENRY L. HIGGINSON

Boston, Sept. 16, 1914.

Yesterday morning, Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, who is now in London, cabled to its officers here that its concerts in Boston, New York and all the other cities that it annually visits were now assured; that the concerts would take place on the dates already announced; that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled; and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear. Even Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, who are believed to be in the Austrian and the French armies, were likely to be able to keep their engagements.

Accordingly full announcement of the schedule and the arrangements for the year will be made a week or ten days hence. The concerts will begin on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, and continue as usual until the beginning of May—twenty-four pairs in all. The series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Cambridge, and the occasional visits to other cities will all be accomplished, "as announced." Only the concerts in the West in the first days of October have been abandoned.

The war has necessitated relatively few changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr. Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk. To replace the few men that were "called" to one or another army, Dr. Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin. Their journey to Boston has now been assured and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt. Necessarily Dr. Muck has been able to secure the scores and parts of very little new music, but—this lack of novelties aside—the programmes will run as usual with him. He himself embarks from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

When the war began, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was fortunate enough to be motoring in Bavaria and the Tyrol. On Aug. 1, the day that the German mobilization officially began, he was in Baireuth to confer with Dr. Muck about the arrangements for the new season. Both were eager to carry out the concerts as planned and announced. Mr. El'lis then returned to Munich and with Dr. Muck similarly working from Baireuth, sought to learn what members of the orchestra were in Europe and what assurance there was of their return in September to Boston. Little could be done in Munich, since it was impossible to send letters and telegrams into hostile countries, while into neutral territory they were long delayed. In the midst of the mobilization, Mr. Ellis made another risky automobile journey to Baireuth to confer with Dr. Muck.

Wnen foreigners were at last permitted to leave Bavaria, the manager established himself at Rotterdam and, as far as he might by letters and telegrams, learned conditions of affairs in Boston, discovered the players who were in Europe, arranged for their return or ascertained the impossibility of it. Then he made the tedious and uncomfortable journey now thirty-six hours long, from Rotterdam to Berlin, and Dr. Muck made as long a one from Baireuth. In Berlin they matured their plans and the conductor engaged the necessary new players. Once in London again after another almost endless journey Mr. Ellis sent the message to Mr. Higginson that assures the concerts:

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck and the Dresden Opera—A Plain Account of the Negotiations with Him and the Outcome—Kreisler Not at the Front—Miss Duncan Transfers Her Dancing School to America

WHEN Dr. Muck arrived in Germany from Boston last spring, he betook himself to the "Weisser Hirsch," a suburb of Dresden in the hills above the Elbe to undergo the recuperative process that the Germans call a "cure." There he was visited almost daily by Count Seebach, the able and persistent Intendant of the Court Theatres at Dresden. Count Seebach besought Dr. Muck to become the director and the chief conductor of the Court Opera House in succession to von Schuch, who had lately died, who had made its orchestra the foremost operatic orchestra in the world, and who had given the thea-

German [illegible] Italian composers preferred it to any other for the first production of their work. Count Seebach offered to Dr. Muck an absolutely free and unquestioned hand in the control of the Opera House and a very large salary, as salaries go for such work anywhere. To it several rich and interested Dresdeners added an annual contribution until report in the city set the promised honorarium at $20,000 a year.

To these daily prayers and proffers Dr. Muck replied that he was under contract to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years more; that he was well satisfied with the conditions and the results of his work in America, and that he purposed to fulfil his obligations cheerfully and to the letter. Count Seebach then professed his willingness to wait three years for Dr. Muck, providing that he would then accept the proferred post. Dr. Muck replied that he could not make decisions that belonged to the spring of 1917 in the spring of 1914. On the other hand, he admitted that the opportunity thus opened at Dresden did appeal to him strongly. Finally, the upshot of almost daily conferences was an agreement upon Dr. Muck's part to prepare and to conduct a few "special performances" of "The Ring" and other of Wagner's operas at Dresden in this present September and again in May and June of next year. Needless to say, both sets of performances have now been abandoned, and the probabilities are that for some years to come neither the Saxon government nor the citizens of Dresden will be able to expend large sums for the upbuilding of their opera under Dr. Muck. In such position, when the haze of contradictory gossip is brushed away, the matter now rests.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 17

SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN BOSTON ASSURED

REGULAR PROGRAMME BEGINS OCT. 16 AND 17

Visits to Other Cities as Planned Also Possible—But Few Changes in Personnel of Orchestra.

The regular programme of symphony concerts in Boston this fall is now assured. Henry L. Higginson announced yesterday the concerts would begin Oct. 16 and 17.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, cabled that concerts in Boston, New York and all the other cities annually visited were now assured; that the concerts would take place on the dates already announced; that the full forces of the orchestra with a few substitutes could be reassembled; and that nearly all the singers and virtuosi engaged as "assisting artists" would be able to appear.

Even Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, who are believed to be in the Austrian and French armies, were likely to be able to keep their engagements.

Accordingly full announcement of the schedule and the arrangements for the year will soon be made.

The concerts will begin on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, and continue as usual until the beginning of May—24 pairs in all.

The series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Cambridge, and the occasional visits to other cities will all be accomplished, "as announced." Only the concerts in the West in the first days of October have been abandoned.

The war has necessitated relatively new changes in the personnel of the orchestra and none, except in the case of Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, among its principal virtuosi. Mr. Grisez is for the time in the hospital corps of the French army and for a few weeks at least another player will take his desk.

To replace the few men that were "called" to one or another army, Dr. Muck has recently been engaging new players in Berlin. The journey to Boston has now been assured and all the members of the orchestra who were in Europe for work or pleasure during the summer have either returned or announced their coming beyond any reasonable doubt.

Necessarily Dr. Muck has been able to secure the scores and parts of very little new music, but—this lack of novelties aside—the programmes will run as usual with him. He himself embarks from Rotterdam at the end of next week.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON WAY HOME

But Few Caught by War's Demand in Europe

Final proof of the [illegible] season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is furnished by the official announcement from Symphony Hall of the first auction sales of seats for the coming season, which will take place on Monday morning, Oct. 5. Dr. Muck will sail from Europe on the 26th of this month. The possibility of the forthcoming Symphony season is principally due to the splendid labors of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Dr. Muck in Europe.

No one on this side could possibly tell how many members of the Boston Symphony had been forced into the fighting ranks, or whether those not in the ranks could return in time for the regular date of the opening of the season. But reassurance from Mr. Ellis has arrived, and it is now known that with a few and comparatively unimportant exceptions the Symphony Orchestra will be the same orchestra—certainly the same as regards the quality of the performances—as the orchestra of last season.

FIRST CONCERT OCT. 16

Preparations for the season are well advanced. As it was originally intended that the Symphony Orchestra should give a Western tour before opening in Boston, the dates of the auction sales of season tickets had been put forward a week in advance of the usual time. Now, however, the sales will commence, as in the past, on the first Monday in October. The seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will go on sale on Monday morning, Oct. 5, at 10 a. m., and on Tuesday morning at the same hour. The seats for the Saturday evening performances will be sold on Thursday and Friday mornings, Oct. 8 and 9. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and Saturday evening, Oct. 17. Boston will get its usual number of 24 public rehearsals and concerts. All of the soloists engaged last spring for the coming season are expected to appear, including Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud.

At the beginning of the war there were over 20 members of the orchestra in Europe and among them nearly all of the solo members. So far as it is possible to find out now, only four or five are actually serving in the armies of their various countries, and the rest will be here by the first of October.

Witek on the Way

Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, who was in Sweden at the outbreak of the war is now on his way back from Holland. With him is Mr. Holy, the harpist. There was much doubt about Mr. Holy's whereabouts, as his wife, who did not go abroad this summer, did not hear from him for several weeks, but news has come that he reached Rotterdam in safety.

Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenon and Mr. Meuller, of the oboes are here but Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, is in the French army. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, is also in the French service, but his place has been filled. It is possible, also, that Mr. Agnesy and Mr. Stumpf, the bass clarinet, may be serving, but this is not at all certain. The same applies to Mr. Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, and Mr. Blumenau of the violas, and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellos.

All of these, however, except Mr. Agnesy were in Berlin a short time ago and the chances are very favorable that they have not been called to service. Of the first violins, probably Mr. Koessler is the only one now at the front, as he belonged to the first reserve of the Germany army. Mr. Roth when last heard of was in Munich and will probably be back within a fortnight.

JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY RANKS WILL BE FILLED

Substitutes for Those at the Front—Auction Sale of Seats.

Following The Journal's exclusive announcement, made just a week ago, that the Symphony season would not be canceled, as it was first feared it might have to be, comes the bulletin that the regular auction sale of subscription tickets will begin Monday, Oct. 5. The first concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16.

The Friday afternoon seats will be auctioned off on Monday, Oct. 5, and Tuesday, Oct. 6. The Saturday night concert tickets will be disposed of on Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9.

It is officially announced that only a few members of the orchestra will be absent when the season begins, and their places will be filled at least temporarily by newcomers.

Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, and Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, are serving in the French army. Mr. Koessler, one of the first violins, is fighting on the what has become of Mr. Agnesy, Mr. Stumpf, Mr. Blumenan, Mr. Rabenicht and Mr. Steinke. Otto Robb, when last heard from, was in Munich, but he is expected back within a fortnight.

Dr. Muck will probably sail for America a week from today. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who spent most of the summer with Dr. Muck, is now on his way home.

There will be the customary series of twenty-four matinee and twenty-four evening concerts.

TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 19, 1914.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Season

Mr. Higginson's announcement made Wednesday last, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give its usual series of concerts in Boston and elsewhere, cleared up the doubt which has surrounded the future of the orchestra since the war began. There had been for several weeks a very real doubt whether the orchestra would not at least be compelled to postpone the opening of its season. It was impossible to find out how many of the members in Europe would be able to return, but fortunately, as it now stands, there will be only a few who cannot return this year, and their places will be filled.

Preparations for the season are well advanced. The auction sale of tickets for rehearsals will be held Monday, Oct. 5, and Tuesday, Oct. 6; and for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9. The first rehearsal will be given Friday afternoon. Oct. 16, and the first concert the following evening.

So far as it is possible to find out now, only four or five Symphony players are actually serving in the European war. Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, is in the French army. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, is also in the French service. It is possible, also, that Mr. Agnesy and Mr. Stumpf, the bass clarinet, may be serving. The same applies to Mr. Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, and Mr. Blumenau of the violas and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellos. Of the first violins, probably Mr. Koessler is the only one now at the front.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Higginson's announcement made Wednesday, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give its usual series of concerts in Boston and elsewhere, cleared up the doubt which has surrounded the future of the orchestra since the war began.

Preparations for the season are well advanced.

Dr. Muck, who is still in Berlin, is expected to sail Sept. 26. Passage has been secured for him and there seems to be no reason to doubt that he will get his steamer.

The full announcement of the plans of the orchestra will be made in a week.

[2

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 26,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS INTACT

Manager Ellis, Back, Says but Few Men Are Missing

Back from a three-months' European search for soloists, Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached Boston last night from New York, and declared that the plans for the orchestra will not be changed, and that not more than four or five new faces will be seen in the 100 of its personnel.

Mr. Ellis was met at the Back Bay station by a group of friends. He arrived from New York on the 6 o'clock express after a pleasant trip across on the Mauretania, from Liverpool.

WITH DR. MUCK

His time abroad being his first "vacation" for years, was spent mostly with Dr. Muck, conductor of the orchestra. He divided his time between the cities of Baireuth, Munich, Nuremberg, Berlin and Rotterdam. Fears of absence of some of the orchestra's men forced Mr. Ellis to conduct a careful search for good men, and he has a large list of available artists. Only four or five will be required, however, and these will probably be secured here.

"I left Berlin on September the 8th," said Mr. Ellis. "That city showed no excitement—not half as much as London. The people have a deep confidence in the victory of Germany, although they realize the odds now against her.

Can Get Men Here

"There will be but four or five vacancies caused by absentees. I know of no casualties among symphony men, but from a few I have not heard, and these will be replaced in all probability. There are excellent artists in New York and in Boston, and, should they be unavailable, there are waiting good men in Holland whom we can secure.

"Mr. Kreisler and the rest of the assisting artists will be on hand, and I can think of no change or ommission that will be necessitated.

Muck's Auto Seized

"I left Boston about the middle of June with Dr. Muck. I spent my time in various cities, and was in Baireuth when the war began. During the mobilization period I was in Munich. On a trip from Munich to Nuremberg with Frau Muck, our automobile was taken from us, and was commandeered.

"Realizing that about 30 of our men were spending their vacations in Germany, France, Belgium and Austria, I looked about for available instrumentalists in case of emergency. However, there will be so few absentees—most of those who went abroad having returned by this time—that we shall find all we require in the east here.

Dr. Muck on Way

Mr. Holy, the harpist, and Mr. Witek, concertmeister, are already on their way here, as is Dr. Muck. As soon as Dr. Muck reaches Boston, rehearsals will commence and progress until the scheduled opening.

"Of those who are missing I am certain only of Georges Grisez, the first clarionet, who has joined the French troops. Of his non-appearance I am reasonably sure, and his loss is a keen one."

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26,

FEW PLAYERS MISSING AND RANKS FILLED

Revocation of Early Western Tour Only Change Necessary in the Schedule of Concerts—Eleven Artists Are Engaged

FIRST CONCERT OCT. 16

Following the announcement made 10 days ago that the Boston Symphony orchestra would begin its season at the stated time and with full ranks, comes the prospectus of the season. The management announces that it is especially desirous of correcting the idea that owing to the war the orchestra will not be up to its usual mark. This impression is declared to be erroneous. For although a few of the members are held in Europe by military service, their places, in the judgment of the managers, have been satisfactorily filled.

Karl Muck, the conductor, and Charles A. Ellis, the business director, have been working to fill vacancies since the early part of August, and it is noted that there will be no more changes in the membership than have been made many times in the past at the beginning of a season. Mr. Ellis is just home from Europe and Dr. Muck is expected Oct. 5.

Auction Begins Oct. 5

The prospectus announces that the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold at auction Monday, Oct. 5; the $10 seats, Tuesday, Oct. 6; the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 9. The sales will be held, as usual, in Symphony hall, and will open at 10 o'clock a. m.

The only part of the season that has been abandoned is the preliminary trip to the West which the orchestra was to take in the first 12 days in October. Owing to the uncertainty of assembling the players by Sept. 28, the day on which the first rehearsal was called, it was thought wise, last month, to postpone this trip until October, 1915. As things have turned out, it is said that the trip could have been undertaken, but when it was certain that the orchestra could be assembled, it was too late to revoke the postponement.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH

Pianist whose readings are remarkable for their fervent emotion and for their technical smoothness. His phrasing in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor concerto has a suavity that responds to the Italian likings of the Russian composer. His reading of a Chopin sonata has a dignity and an earnestness that revive the mid-nineteenth century sentiment of the Polish composer.

(Photo by Champeau Studio, New York)

MME. JULIA CULP

Artist who ventures into the concert field with individual views of interpretation. She brings out the point of a song not so much by the elocutionary devices of the reader as by the tone coloring and tone shading effects of the singer. Her ideas have noteworthy appeal in songs of exalted melody, like those of Brahms.

In other respects the season will be carried through exactly as planned. In Boston there will be 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, extending from Oct. 16 to May 7, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, extending from Oct. 17 to May 8. Owing to the absence of the orchestra from town the following Fridays and Saturdays will be omitted: Nov. 7-8, Dec. 5-6, Jan. 9-10, Jan. 30-Feb. 1, Feb. 20-21, and March 20-21. The total number of concerts to be given will be 110. In Cambridge there will be eight, in New York 10, in Providence six, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn five each, and in Hartford, New Bedford and Worcester three each. There will be single concerts in a number of cities in New England and the middle West.

The New York and Brooklyn series were sold out by subscription last May. It is expected that the Baltimore, Philadelphia and Washington series will be sold out by the time the season opens in those cities. In Boston the indications are said to be that there will be just as strong a demand for tickets as last year.

Eleven Soloists Engaged

The prospectus names 11 artists who will assist at the concerts as soloists. It is possible that this number may be increased before the season is over. The list comprises four singers, four pianists, and three violinists. The singers are Mmes. Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt and Florence Hinkle, and Pasquale Amato. The pianists are Harold Bauer, Feruccio Busoni, Leonard Borwick and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler, Jacques Thibaud and Anton Witek.

Four of these soloists are making their first appearances in Boston with the Symphony orchestra. These are Miss Hinkle, Mr. Amato, Mr. Borwick and Mr. Thibaud.

Concluding, the announcement notes that it is impossible, under present conditions, to promise many novelties. The library of the orchestra contains some works which have not yet been played and may get a hearing, and it is more than possible that Dr. Muck will fetch some music to America with him. However, no lack of variety is expected, for not only is there the store of classics to draw from, but there are many works which have been heard but once or twice and are held to deserve repetition. As soon as Dr. Muck arrives his early programs will be announced.

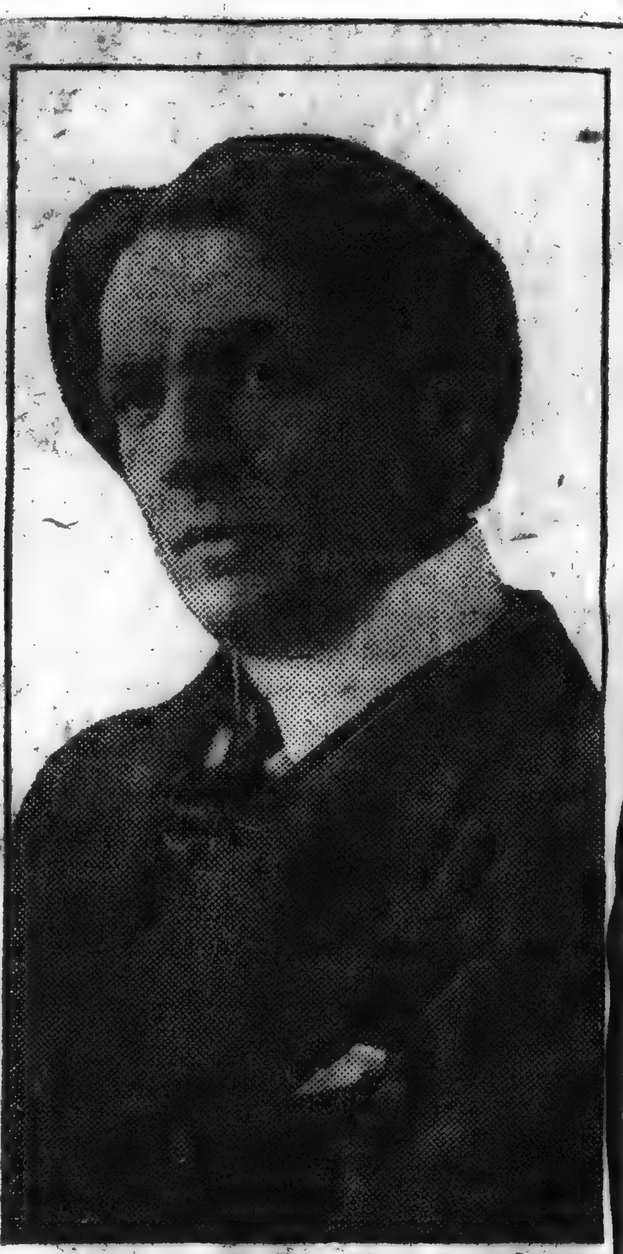
MISS FLORENCE HINKLE

Soprano who maintains the traditions of oratorio singing for which, in the best days of the choral society and the singing school, the United States had high acclaim. Her powers of interpretation, although developed wholly outside the theater, are strong both in delineating character and in narrating incident. Her vocal equipment is exceptional. She has beauty of tone, suppleness of execution and vigor of speech in song.

(Photo copyright by Mishkin, New York)

PASQUALE AMATO

Though little known in Boston as a concert artist, Mr. Amato is well known and highly approved as an interpreter of baritone roles in opera. His acclaim as an impersonator of characters like Kurwenal in Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Iago in Verdi's "Otello" and Figaro in Rossini's "Barber of Seville" has almost eclipsed his reputation as a singer. His appearance in the severe surroundings of the Symphony Hall platform will test in a direct way his vocal method and his skill in phrasing. His round, brilliant voice and his distinct enunciation assure him a good measure of applause from both the critical Friday audience and the quickly appreciative Saturday audience.



JACQUES THIBAUD

Violinist who won distinguished applause at his appearances in recital in Boston last winter. He made at once such a success as artists usually have to work many years to attain. All his playing was with piano accompaniment. He will be tested this year as soloist in an orchestral concerto.

(Photo by Apeda Studio, New York)

MISS ELENA GERHARDT

Soprano who has taken first rank as an interpreter of the works of the German song repertory. She made sure of herself as a concert singer by gaining the approval of the public of leading European cities before she came to the United States. At her first appearances here she was applauded as the bringer of new recital standards. She both reads her words and sings her music. Her engagement as Symphony soloist is in line with the usual policy of the managers to present only artists who have proved their worth.

(Photo copyright by Tyler, New York)

FERRUCCIO BUSONI

Pianist whose ideas are too advanced to win the unqualified favor of the musical masses. His mastery of the keyboard is such that ordinary technical and critical terms do not provide classification for them. Some listeners have given up trying to account for him and have relegated him among the disturbers of the musical commonwealth. To them he is merely an extreme individualist. He seems to scorn the ways of playing Beethoven and Chopin that have become standard. He dissociates their works from the epoch in which they were written, and plays them as if they were the product of today. Whatever else he does, he leaves the conviction on his hearers that there is more to be said about the last sonatas of Beethoven and the preludes of Chopin than has yet been said.

LEONARD BORWICK

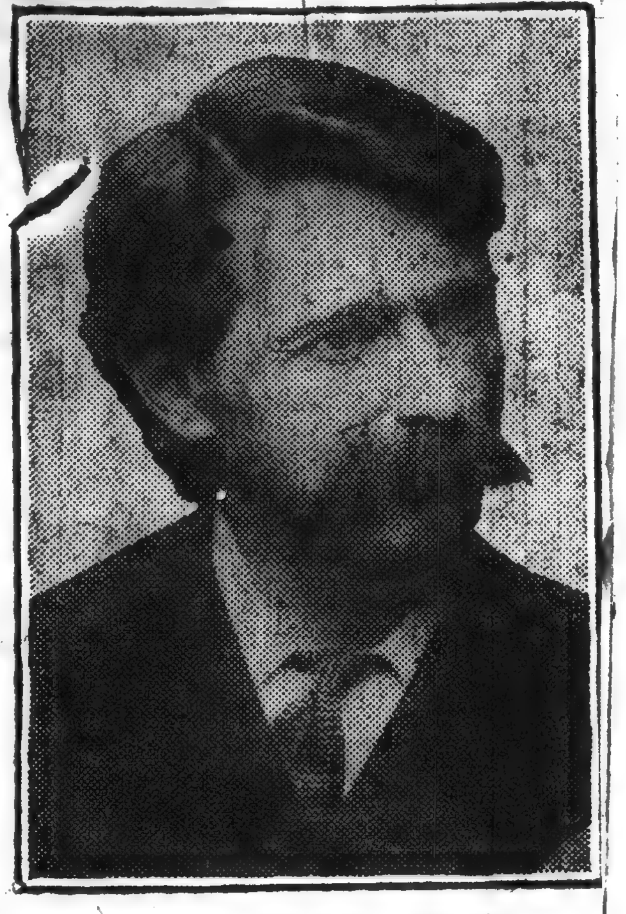
Mr. Borwick's name is the only one on the Symphony solo list that is not familiar to Boston listeners. That influential part of the public which attends piano recitals has learned something about his artistic leanings. Playing in Jordan hall two years ago, he gave the impression of a pianist of highly intellectual, if somehat matter-of-fact, approach to his composers. He read his selections in a style that indicated a musician of vigorous though not presumptuous thinking. He seemed to desire to give his audience a fresh impression of the repertory master works. He has a powerful tone, which should be serviceable in a piano concerto with orchestra.

LAST FESTIVAL CONCERTS GIVEN AT WORCESTER

WORCESTER, Mass.—Closing its annual festival, the Worcester County Musical Association presented three of its chief visiting artists Friday night in a program of operatic arias and songs before the largest audience of the week. They were Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano; Evan Williams, tenor; and Clarence Whitehill, baritone. The orchestra of Boston Symphony players which has been assisting at the festival, played under the direction of Gustav Strube. The chorus of the association sang Elgar's "The Challenge of Thor," with Arthur Mees conducting.

In the afternoon concert, Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, who arrived just in time from Europe, appeared, playing the Tschaikowsky B minor concerto. He won great applause from the matinee house. Another soloist was Miss Olive Kline, soprano. The orchestra played the Schumann symphony in D minor, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, and the "Finlandia" of Sibelius, with Mr. Strube conducting.

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 27,



Leonard Borwick, Pianist.

Miss Hinkle, Soprano.

Harold Bauer, Pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season in this city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16. Practically the entire personnel of the orchestra will be present for the first rehearsal, which will be held Monday morning, Oct. 12. The places of the few members, who have been detailed in Europe on account of the military service, have been filled satisfactorily.

The names of the new members of the orchestra will be announced within a few days. Dr. Muck and Mrs. Muck are due in New York Oct. 5.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.

Miss Gerhardt, Soprano.

Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

Preliminary to the opening of the season will come the regular auction sales of seats. These will be held in Symphony Hall on Monday, Oct. 5, Tuesday, Oct. 6, Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9, all of them beginning at 10 A. M. The $18 seats, for the 24 public rehearsals, will be sold Monday and the $10 seats Tuesday. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday and the $10 seats Friday.

Miss Culp, Contralto.

Pasquale Amato, Baritone.

The season in general calls for the same schedule that has held in the past. Boston will get its usual 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. Beginning Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and Saturday evening, Oct. 17, they will run through to Friday afternoon, May 7, and Saturday evening, May 8. The usual five southern trips will be made in November, December, January, February and March, respectively, and the usual western trip will be made the last week of January. This will give six weeks without concerts, the dates being, Nov. 7-8, Dec. 5-6, Jan. 9-10, Jan. 30-Feb. 1, Feb. 20-21 and March 20-21.

The total number of concerts to be given in the season of 30 weeks will be 110. Cambridge will have eight, New York ten, Providence six, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, five each; Hartford, Worcester and New Bedford, three each, with single concerts given in a number of cities of New England and the middle West. It is a disappointment that the orchestra is unable to make the western tour which had been scheduled for the first 12 days of October. All things being equal, these concerts will be given in October, 1915.

At present the management announces 11 soloists, who will appear in Boston during the winter. Four of these are singers, four of them pianists and three of them violinists. The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato. The pianists are Harold Bauer, Leonard Borwick, Ferruccio Busoni and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler, Jacques Thibaud and Anton Witek. In addition to these, besides Mr. Witek, members of the orchestra will be heard, particularly Mr. Noack, second concert master, and Mr. Warnke, principal cellist.

Four of these soloists, although not unknown to Boston, will make their first appearances here as soloists with the orchestra. These are Florence Hinkle, Pasquale Amato, Leonard Borwick and Jacques Thibaud. Miss Hinkle has appeared here in choral concerts a number of times and has had several very successful appearances elsewhere with the orchestra. Pasquale Amato has established himself firmly in the favor of the American people as a concert singer. Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, is returning to America this year for an extended tour, and his appearance with the Symphony orchestra was a foregone conclusion.

The other newcomer, Jacques Thibaud, is one of the world's great violinists. He has appeared in Boston but twice, once ten years ago, once last season, and both times he created a profound impression. For a time it was taken for granted that he was compelled to serve in the French army. He has notified his manager in New York that he will fill all the engagements made for him.

The other soloists announced are all old friends. The singers are Mmes. Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. Messrs. Busoni and Bauer have been heard here recently, but Mr. Gabrilowitsch returns after an absence of several years.

Mr. Ellis, Mr. Kreisler's manager, heard directly from him, within the last three weeks, that not only would he be in America to fill his engagements, but that he will probably be here earlier than January, the time he originally intended to come.

The chances are that Dr. Muck will have few novelties to present during the season. However, there should be no lack of variety in the programs. The library of the orchestra is, comparatively speaking, inexhaustible. It contains a great number of works which having been heard here but once or twice are worthy of further hearings and may well count as novelties in themselves. There is always the great store of classics to draw on.

It is hoped that immediately after the arrival of Dr. Muck, it will be possible to announce the early programs.

BOSTON GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 26,

NO DOUBT ABOUT OPENING OCT 16

Charles A. Ellis Tells of Symphony Situation.

Comes From Europe With Provision Made for All Contingencies.

Without the slightest doubt the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here on Friday, Oct 16, according to Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who reached Boston early last evening after an absence of more than three months in Europe.

Mr Ellis sailed from Liverpool last Saturday on the Mauretania, landing in New York yesterday morning and taking the 1 o'clock train for Boston. William H. Brennan, assistant manager of the orchestra, met Mr Ellis at the dock in New York, accompanying him to Boston, and the two were met at the Back Bay station last evening by Louis H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony Hall, and W. E. Walters, its press representative.

"I think it is safe to say that we have provided for every possible contingency," said Mr Ellis as he stepped from the train, "and there is not the slightest doubt that the orchestra will begin its season on Friday, Oct 16."

"Fortunately," he continued, "those members whose places it would be most difficult to fill are already in Boston or else on their way across the ocean. The places of the three or four who may not get here can be filled without any serious difficulty by engaging men in either Boston or New York, or, if it shoul prove impossible to get just what w want on this side, there is plenty o available material to be had either i Holland or in London."

Dr Muck, the conductor, is already o his way across the Atlantic, Mr Elli explained, and six or eight members o the orchestra sailed from Rotterda last Saturday, among them being Anto Witek, the concert master, and Alfre Holy, harpist. Fritz Kreisler, the grea violinist, whose death has been severa times rumored, will surely appear her with the Symphony Orchestra durin the season.

Mr Ellis was in Bayreuth on Aug 1 when the war broke out. The followin day he left for Munich by automobil accompanied by Mrs Karl Muck and her niece. He remained in Munich during the mobilization of the German Army, later returning to Bayreuth by motor. During this trip the automobile in which Mr Ellis was traveling was confiscated in Nuremburg.

Later Mr Ellis spent some time in Rotterdam, where he arranged for Dr Muck's passage, and in Berlin, which he finally left on Sept 8. The German capital, he said, was by no means the city of gloom and depression which some accounts printed in this country have pictured it, nor was the number of women wearing widow's weeds at all noticeable. The Germans were grim and determined in their attitude toward the war, he explained, but absolutely confident of ultimate victory, although fully aware of the tremendous odds against which they are fighting.

Mr Ellis made his way from Berlin to London through Holland, sailing from Flushing for Folkstone and spending a week in the British capital, which, he insisted, bore more outward evidences of the war than did Berlin. Traveling in Germany, he declared, was not difficult in the least after the mobilization of the troops had been completed.

BOSTON HERALD.
SEPTEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY LUCK SAVED BOSTON'S BIG ORCHESTRA

Manager Ellis, Back from Abroad, Says Most of Regular Players Are Coming.

"It is 'Symphony luck' that Boston may thank for the fact that we are able to go on this season with our orchestra practically unaffected by the war," declared Charles A. Ellis, its manager, on his return to Boston last night direct from the European war zone.

He was welcomed at the Back Bay station when the Knickerbocker Limited rolled in at 6 o'clock by the staff of the Boston Symphony orchestra and several friends. His first words were of assurance that nothing would be lacking when the concerts begin, Oct. 16, necessary for a continuance of their high character of performance.

While he was in Germany, more than a month after the beginning of the war, he suffered little inconvenience, and was able to travel about arranging for the return of Symphony artists and the engagement of new ones not liable for military service in time for the opening performance.

Several artists left Rotterdam, he said, for this country last Saturday and are expected soon, including Concert Master Witek and Alfred Holy, harpist. He was able to secure some talent in Holland which he thought was equally as excellent as that lost through the enforced service of performers in the armies.

"At the beginning of the war I was at Bayreuth with Dr. Muck, witnessing the last performances of 'Parsifal.' Immediately after the opera finished, the order for mobilization came. We had proceeded by motor as far as Nuremberg, when the order for mobilization went into effect, and our automobile was seized.

"I think we have provided for everything. The fact is, those of the orchestra who would be most difficult to replace are either already here or on their way. There are three or four members who possibly cannot come. Their places can be filled without difficulty.

"There are a great many men in Boston and New York we could have called on if necessary. There is an abundance of available material and conductors. Kreisler was not killed. He is not a member of the orchestra, but will participate in some of the performances as a soloist.

"I can say that there was little excitement. The people in Germany were earnest and sober. I saw no evidences of mourning or any procession of widows in Berlin or any of the cities. There was very little news of the progress of the war and no bulletins posted. Berlin was not plunged into gloom, as I found was reported outside of Germany. I don't remember seeing any widow's weeds.

"There were no signs painted or placarded on walls or buildings criticising the Kaiser and asking peace, and on the trains I rode through Germany no curtains were drawn to hide any signs. In London I should say there was a great deal more excitement and commotion than in Berlin. In London the calls for recruits placarded all the walls and there were a great many evidences of military movements.

"It is hard to get news of those now in service. Georges Grisey is with the French army. I saw more or less wounded, but aside from their suffering noticed no special instances of hardships among the people.

"The foreigners suffered such hardships as naturally come from trying to get transportation when there is none. When mobilization began there were no trains. Since then there have been a few trains and those were very crowded.

"Of the 30 members of the orchestra abroad, most of them will be ready for the opening concert. I regard it as proverbial "Symphony luck" that I happened to be on the spot to do what I was able to secure their attendance this season."

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 26

BRILLIANT SEASON FOR THE SYMPHONY

MMES. CULP AND GERHARDT AMONG THE SOLOISTS

Quartet of Interesting Pianists and Trio of Violinists Announced—Programmes Sure to Be Good.

The announcement of the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their season this winter shows that although a few men will be away from their regular stands the season will be as brilliant as it has been in years past.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, is back in this country from his trip to Europe, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, will be here the week after next. They have filled the few missing places in the Orchestra satisfactorily.

What is of even greater importance is that they have engaged a notable list of singers. Three women singers only are on the Symphony list this year. There are Mesdames Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, easily the two most popular lieder singers, with the exception of Dr. Wuellner, whom Boston has heard in recent years. The third singer is Mrs. Florence Hinkle, who, it will be remembered, was not even dimmed by Tita Ruffo when she sang at his concert.

The admirable Pasquale Amato, whom Boston knows now only as an opera singer, will debut with the Symphony this winter. The piano soloists are Bauer, Borwick, Busoni and Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Kreisler, Thibaud and Anton Witek, concert master.

Undoubtedly the advent of Dr. Muck will mean the announcement of the programs. On account of the troubles in Europe there will probably be few novelties, but the immense Symphony library can be drawn upon for an almost infinite variety of classics and popular works that have been played only a few times.

The prospectus announces that the four annual auction sales will be held week after next. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10; the $10 seats, Tuesday, Oct. 6, at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, at 10, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 9. The sales will be held, as usual, in Symphony Hall.

MANAGER ELLIS ARRIVES.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25.—Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to this country this morning on board the Mauretania of the Cunard Line, after having spent his summer abroad [illegible] to appear with the orchestra during the coming season.

"We open our season in Boston on the 16th of next month," he said, "and when we call the roll at the first rehearsal I do not think there will be more than one or two who will not answer. Dr. Muck, the conductor, will arrive in New York on Oct. 3, and his arrival will be the signal for the beginning of hard work. By the time he reaches Boston the orchestra will be assembled there ready to start rehearsals at once.

Anton Witek, the concert master, will return to Boston at about the same time. He also was abroad, but I have every assurance that he will get back in time for the first rehearsals. So far only one of the more important factors in the orchestra will not be with us this season.

He is Groeg Drisie, the first clarionetist, who has taken his place in his regiment and is fighting for France. Since he was called to the colors, I have heard nothi from him except that I know he is at t front."

BOSTON JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 26,

KREISLER BILLE TO APPEAR AS A SYMPHONY STAR

Austrian Violinist Is Now Fighting in European War.

OTHER FOREIGN STARS SCHEDULED

Auction Sale of Seats Takes Place Week After Next.

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished Austrian violinist, who was last reported as fighting with his compatriots in Galicia against the Russians, is billed as one of the stars for the forthcoming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open Oct. 16.

War is not to be allowed to interfere with the schedule of Boston's premier band, for among the other stars in the official announcement are Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist; Leonard Borwick, Britain's foremost exponent of the art of the pianoforte; Jacques Thibaud, the leading French violinist of the day; Ferruccio Busoni, the Italian pianist and composer, who makes his home in Germany; Anton Witek, the Bohemian violinist, who is popularly known as the concert master of the orchestra; Pasquale Amato, the brilliant Italian barytone from the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, and others.

The auction sale of seats will take place the week after next. The $18 Friday matinee seats will be offered on Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10 A. M.; the $10 rehearsal seats the following day; the $18 Saturday night seats on Thursday and the other Saturday seats on Friday.

There will be the customary twenty-four concerts in both the Friday afternoon and the Saturday night series. The orchestra will make its usual monthly trips, so that it will be out of town on the following Fridays and Saturdays: Nov. 7 and 8, Dec. 5 and 6, Jan. 9 and 10, Jan. 30 and Feb. 1, Feb. 20 and 21, March 20 and 21.

Dr. Muck will make some announcements concerning programs when he arrives the week after next. Novelties will be scarcer than ever, of course, owing to unsettled conditions in Europe, but the library of the orchestra contains some compositions that have never been played here and others that have been performed only once or twice. These, with the great store of classic works, will furnish an abundance of variety.

Symphony Orchestra Season Certain, Says Ellis

"Dr. Karl Muck is on the way to the United States and will be in Bosotn Oct. 6. We have provided for every contingency. At the most not more than four players will be missing from their seats when the rehearsals begin, and they can be replaced without difficulty."

This statement was made by Charles A. Eillis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who reached Boston last night after spending the summer in Europe.

"The three or four places we may have to fill can easily be taken by Boston or New York musicians," Mr. Ellis added, "and even if we had difficulty finding men in these two cities there is an abundance of material in Holland and London."

Of the absent members of the orchestra, Mr. Erisez is known to be serving in the French army. He is the solo clarinetist. It is not known what has become of Walter Habernicht, leader of the second violins, but he may be on his way to America.

Excepting an adventure at Nuremburg, Bavaria, where the military authorities seized an automobile in which he was riding with Mrs. Karl Muck, the Symphony director's wife, and her niece, Manager Ellis had an uneventful two months in Europe. He personally experienced little difficulty in traveling at will through Germany.

During his stay at Berlin, which lasted three weeks, Mr. Ellis saw no signs of popular disaffection against the Kaiser. He saw no "widow's weeds" or sorrowing processions of the populace. The residents of the German capital, he thought, were thoroughly familiar with the gravity of the war and were facing the situation bravely.

RECORD. SATURDAY.
SEPTEMBER 26

Symphony to Have Fine Programmes and Excellent Soloists Despite the War

FAVORITE WOMEN LIEDER SINGERS TO APPEAR AT THE SYMPHONY.

ELENA GERHARDT.
Who returns to the Symphony audiences, who admire her greatly.

JULIA CULP.
The most popular concert singer Boston has heard in many years.

The announcement of the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their season this winter shows that although a few men will be away from their regular stands the season will be as brilliant as it has been in years past.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, is back in this country from his trip to Europe, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, will be here the week after next. They have filled the few missing places in the Orchestra satisfactorily.

What is of even greater importance is that they have engaged a notable list of singers. Three women singers only are on the Symphony list this year. There are Mesdames Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, easily the two most popular lieder singers, with the exception of Dr. Wuellner, whom Boston has heard in recent years. The third singer is Mrs. Florence Hinkle, who, it will be remembered, was not even dimmed by Tita Ruffo when she sang at his concert.

The admirable Pasquale Amato, whom Boston knows now only as an opera singer, will debut with the Symphony this winter. The piano soloists are Bauer, Borwick, Busoni and Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Kreisler, Thibaud and Anton Witek, concert master.

Undoubtedly the advent of Dr. Muck will mean the announcement of the programs. On account of the troubles in Europe there will probably be few novelties, but the immense Symphony library can be drawn upon for an almost infinite variety of classics and popular works that have been played only a few times.

The prospectus announces that the four annual auction sales will be held week after next. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10; the $10 seats, Tuesday, Oct. 6, at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, at 10, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 9. The sales will be held, as usual, in Symphony Hall.

BOSTON GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 26,

NO DOUBT ABOUT OPENING OCT 16

Charles A. Ellis Tells of Symphony Situation.

Comes From Europe With Provision Made for All Contingencies.

Without the slightest doubt the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here on Friday, Oct 16, according to Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who reached Boston early last evening after an absence of more than three months in Europe.

Mr Ellis sailed from Liverpool last Saturday on the Mauretania, landing in New York yesterday morning and taking the 1 o'clock train for Boston. William H. Brennan, assistant manager of the orchestra, met Mr Ellis at the dock in New York, accompanying him to Boston, and the two were met at the Back Bay station last evening by Louis H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony Hall, and W. E. Walters, its press representative.

"I think it is safe to say that we have provided for every possible contingency," said Mr Ellis as he stepped from the train, "and there is not the slightest doubt that the orchestra will begin its season on Friday, Oct 16."

"Fortunately," he continued, "those members whose places it would be most difficult to fill are already in Boston or else on their way across the ocean. The places of the three or four who may not get here can be filled without any serious difficulty by engaging men in either Boston or New York, or, if it should prove impossible to get just what we want on this side, there is plenty of available material to be had either in Holland or in London."

Dr Muck, the conductor, is already on his way across the Atlantic, Mr Ellis explained, and six or eight members of the orchestra sailed from Rotterdam last Saturday, among them being Anton Witek, the concert master, and Alfred Holy, harpist. Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, whose death has been several times rumored, will surely appear here with the Symphony Orchestra during the season.

Mr Ellis was in Bayreuth on Aug 1, when the war broke out. The following day he left for Munich by automobile, accompanied by Mrs Karl Muck and her niece. He remained in Munich during the mobilization of the German Army, later returning to Bayreuth by motor. During this trip the automobile in which Mr Ellis was traveling was confiscated in Nuremburg.

Later Mr Ellis spent some time in Rotterdam, where he arranged for Dr Muck's passage, and in Berlin, which he finally left on Sept 8. The German capital, he said, was by no means the city of gloom and depression which some accounts printed in this country have pictured it, nor was the number of women wearing widow's weeds at all noticeable. The Germans were grim and determined in their attitude toward the war, he explained, but absolutely confident of ultimate victory, although fully aware of the tremendous odds against which they are fighting.

Mr Ellis made his way from Berlin to London through Holland, sailing from Flushing for Folkstone and spending a week in the British capital, which, he insisted, bore more outward evidences of the war than did Berlin. Traveling in Germany, he declared, was not difficult in the least after the mobilization of the troops had been completed.

Several artists left Rotterdam, he said, for this country last Saturday and are expected soon, including Concert Master Witek and Alfred Holy, harpist. He was able to secure some talent in Holland which he thought was equally as excellent as that lost through the enforced service of performers in the armies.

"At the beginning of the war I was at Bayreuth with Dr. Muck, witnessing the last performances of 'Parsifal.' Immediately after the opera finished, the order for mobilization came. We had proceeded by motor as far as Nuremberg, when the order for mobilization went into effect, and our automobile was seized.

"I think we have provided for everything. The fact is, those of the orchestra who would be most difficult to replace are either already here or on their way. There are three or four members who possibly cannot come. Their places can be filled without difficulty.

"There are a great many men in Boston and New York we could have called on if necessary. There is an abundance of available material and conductors. Kreisler was not killed. He is not a member of the orchestra, but will participate in some of the performances as a soloist.

"I can say that there was little excitement. The people in Germany were earnest and sober. I saw no evidences of mourning or any procession of widows in Berlin or any of the cities. There was very little news of the progress of the war and no bulletins posted. Berlin was not plunged into gloom, as I found was reported outside of Germany. I don't remember seeing any widow's weeds.

"There were no signs painted or placarded on walls or buildings criticising the Kaiser and asking peace, and on the trains I rode through Germany no curtains were drawn to hide any signs. In London I should say there was a great deal more excitement and commotion than in Berlin. In London the calls [illegible] recruits placarded all the walls and [illegible]ere were a great many evidences of [illegible]itary movements.

"It is hard to get news of those now in [illegible]vice. Georges Grisey is with the [illegible]nch army. I saw more or less [illegible]nded, but aside from their suffering [illegible]ed no special instances of hard[illegible] among the people.

"[illegible]e foreigners suffered such hard[illegible]as naturally come from trying to [illegible]ansportation when there is none. [illegible] mobilization began there were no [illegible] Since then there have been a [illegible]ins and those were very crowded. [illegible]he 30 members of the orchestra [illegible] most of them will be ready for [illegible]ning concert. I regard it as [illegible]al "Symphony luck" that I hap[illegible]be on the spot to do what I was [illegible]cure their attendance this sea-to appear with the orchestra during the coming season.

"We open our season in Boston on the 16th of next month," he said, "and when we call the roll at the first rehearsal I do not think there will be more than one or two who will not answer. Dr. Muck, the conductor, will arrive in New York on Oct. 3, and his arrival will be the signal for the beginning of hard work. By the time he reaches Boston the orchestra will be assembled there ready to start rehearsals at once.

Anton Witek, the concert master, will return to Boston at about the same time. He also was abroad, but I have every assurance that he will get back in time for the first rehearsals. So far only one of the more important factors in the orchestra will not be with us this season.

He is Groeg Drisie, the first clarionetist, who has taken his place in his regiment and is fighting for France. Since he was called to the colors, I have heard nothing from him except that I know he is at the front."

BOSTON HERALD.
SEPTEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY LUCK SAVED BOSTON'S BIG ORCHESTRA

Manager Ellis, Back from Abroad, Says Most of Regular Players Are Coming.

"It is 'Symphony luck' that Boston may thank for the fact that we are able to go on this season with our orchestra practically unaffected by the war," declared Charles A. Ellis, its manager, on his return to Boston last night direct from the European war zone.

He was welcomed at the Back Bay station when the Knickerbocker Limited rolled in at 6 o'clock by the staff of the Boston Symphony orchestra and several friends. His first words were of assurance that nothing would be lacking when the concerts begin, Oct. 16, necessary for a continuance of their high character of performance.

While he was in Germany, more than a month after the beginning of the war, he suffered little inconvenience, and was able to travel about arranging for the return of Symphony artists and the engagement of new ones not liable for military service in time for the opening performance.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 26

BRILLIANT SEASON FOR THE SYMPHONY

MMES. CULP AND GERHARDT AMONG THE SOLOISTS

Quartet of Interesting Pianists and Trio of Violinists Announced—Programmes Sure to Be Good.

The announcement of the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their season this winter shows that although a few men will be away from their regular stands the season will be as brilliant as it has been in years past.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, is back in this country from his trip to Europe, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, will be here the week after next. They have filled the few missing places in the Orchestra satisfactorily.

What is of even greater importance is that they have engaged a notable list of singers. Three women singers only are on the Symphony list this year. There are Mesdames Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, easily the two most popular lieder singers, with the exception of Dr. Wuellner, whom Boston has heard in recent years. The third singer is Mrs. Florence Hinkle, who, it will be remembered, was not even dimmed by Tita Ruffo when she sang at his concert.

The admirable Pasquale Amato, whom Boston knows now only as an opera singer, will debut with the Symphony this winter. The piano soloists are Bauer, Borwick, Busoni and Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Kreisler, Thibaud and Anton Witek, concert master.

Undoubtedly the advent of Dr. Muck will mean the announcement of the programs. On account of the troubles in Europe there will probably be few novelties, but the immense Symphony library can be drawn upon for an almost infinite variety of classics and popular works that have been played only a few times.

The prospectus announces that the four annual auction sales will be held week after next. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10; the $10 seats, Tuesday, Oct. 6, at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, at 10, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 9. The sales will be held, as usual, in Symphony Hall.

MANAGER ELLIS ARRIVES.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25.—Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to this country this morning on board the Mauretania of the Cunard Line, after having spent his Summer abroad [illegible]

BOSTON JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 26,

KREISLER BILLED TO APPEAR AS A SYMPHONY STAR

Austrian Violinist Is Now Fighting in European War.

OTHER FOREIGN STARS SCHEDULED

Auction Sale of Seats Takes Place Week After Next.

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished Austrian violinist, who was last reported as fighting with his compatriots in Galicia against the Russians, is billed as one of the stars for the forthcoming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open Oct. 16.

War is not to be allowed to interfere with the schedule of Boston's premier band, for among the other stars in the official announcement are Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist; Leonard Borwick, Britain's foremost exponent of the art of the pianoforte; Jacques Thibaud, the leading French violinist of the day; Ferruccio Busoni, the Italian pianist and composer, who makes his home in Germany; Anton Witek, the Bohemian violinist, who is popularly known as the concert master of the orchestra; Pasquale Amato, the brilliant Italian barytone from the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, and others.

The auction sale of seats will take place the week after next. The $18 Friday matinee seats will be offered on Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10 A. M.; the $10 rehearsal seats the following day; the $18 Saturday night seats on Thursday and the other Saturday seats on Friday.

There will be the customary twenty-four concerts in both the Friday afternoon and the Saturday night series. The orchestra will make its usual monthly trips, so that it will be out of town on the following Fridays and Saturdays: Nov. 7 and 8, Dec. 5 and 6, Jan. 9 and 10, Jan. 30 and Feb. 1, Feb. 20 and 21, March 20 and 21.

Dr. Muck will make some announcements concerning programs when he arrives the week after next. Novelties will be scarcer than ever, of course, owing to unsettled conditions in Europe, but the library of the orchestra contains some compositions that have never been played here and others that have been performed only once or twice. These, with the great store of classic works, will furnish an abundance of variety.

Symphony Orchestra Season Certain, Says Ellis

"Dr. Karl Muck is on the way to the United States and will be in Bosotn Oct. 6. We have provided for every contingency. At the most not more than four players will be missing from their seats when the rehearsals begin, and they can be replaced without difficulty."

This statement was made by Charles A. Eillis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who reached Boston last night after spending the summer in Europe.

"The three or four places we may have to fill can easily be taken by Boston or New York musicians," Mr. Ellis added, "and even if we had difficulty finding men in these two cities there is an abundance of material in Holland and London."

Of the absent members of the orchestra, Mr. Erisez is known to be serving in the French army. He is the solo clarinetist. It is not known what has become of Walter Habernicht, leader of the second violins, but he may be on his way to America.

Excepting an adventure at Nuremburg, Bavaria, where the military authorities seized an automobile in which he was riding with Mrs. Karl Muck, the Symphony director's wife, and her niece, Manager Ellis had an uneventful two months in Europe. He personally experienced little difficulty in traveling at will through Germany.

During his stay at Berlin, which lasted three weeks, Mr. Ellis saw no signs of popular disaffection against the Kaiser. He saw no "widow's weeds" or sorrowing processions of the populace. The residents of the German capital, he thought, were thoroughly familiar with the gravity of the war and were facing the situation bravely.

RECORD. SATURDAY.
SEPTEMBER 26

phony to Have Fine Programmes and Excellent Soloists Despite the War

FAVORITE WOMEN LIEDER SINGERS TO APPEAR AT THE SYMPHONY.

ELENA GERHARDT.
Who returns to the Symphony audiences, who admire her greatly.

JULIA CULP.
The most popular concert singer Boston has heard in many years.

The announcement of the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their season this winter shows that although a few men will be away from their regular stands the season will be as brilliant as it has been in years past.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the Orchestra, is back in this country from his trip to Europe, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, will be here the week after next. They have filled the few missing places in the Orchestra satisfactorily.

What is of even greater importance is that they have engaged a notable list of singers. Three women singers only are on the Symphony list this year. There are Mesdames Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt, easily the two most popular lieder singers, with the exception of Dr. Wuellner, whom Boston has heard in recent years. The third singer is Mrs. Florence Hinkle, who, it will be remembered, was not even dimmed by Tita Ruffo when she sang at his concert.

The admirable Pasquale Amato, whom Boston knows now only as an opera singer, will debut with the Symphony this winter. The piano soloists are Bauer, Borwick, Busoni and Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Kreisler, Thibaud and Anton Witek, concert master.

Undoubtedly the advent of Dr. Muck will mean the announcement of the programs. On account of the troubles in Europe there will probably be few novelties, but the immense Symphony library can be drawn upon for an almost infinite variety of classics and popular works that have been played only a few times.

The prospectus announces that the four annual auction sales will be held week after next. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Oct. 5, beginning at 10; the $10 seats, Tuesday, Oct. 6, at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 8, at 10, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 9. The sales will be held, as usual,. in Symphony Hall.

UNDAY GLOBE

SEPTEMBER 27.

MPHONY ORCHESTRA'S SEASON WILL BE BRILLIANT IN SPITE OF THE WAR

JACQUES THIBAUD
Violinist.

PASQUALE AMATO.
Baritone.
©-mishkin

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH
Pianist.

JULIA CULP
Mezzo Soprano.

FLORENCE HEMPLE.
Soprano.

ELENA GERHARDT.
Mezzo Soprano.

Some of the Famous Soloists to be Heard With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open on the date originally set, Friday afternoon, Oct 16. Contrary to the impression held by some that the European war has wrought havoc with the membership of the orchestra, there will be no more changes in the personnel than are usual at the beginning of a season. The members detained in Europe are few in number and their places have been satisfactorily filled in Berlin by Dr Muck and Mr Ellis, who had sufficient warning to accomplish all they desired. The names of the new members will be announced directly after the arrival of Dr Muck, who should reach Boston not later than Tuesday, Oct 6.

The auction sales of the concerts will be held in Symphony Hall, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Oct 5, 6, 8 and 9, all of them beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning. It had been originally announced that the sales would take place beginning Sept 21, but at that time it was expected the Orchestra would spend the first fortnight of October giving a series of concerts in the West.

As in former years the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold Monday and the $10 seats Tuesday. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday and the $10 seats Friday.

The Symphony season in Boston will extend from Friday, Oct 16, until Saturday, May 8. In that time the usual 24 public rehearsals will be given on Friday afternoons and the 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The usual five Southern trips will be made in November, December, January, February and March respectively, and the usual Western trip in the last week in January. This will give six weeks without concerts, the dates being Nov 7-8, Dec 5-6, Jan 9-10, Jan 30-Feb 1, Feb 20-21 and March 20-21.

Dr Muck sailed with Mrs Muck from Rotterdam yesterday. They are coming on a slow ship, for Holland is the only practical means of exit from Europe for Germans. On their arrival here they will take possession of the house in the Fenway which they bought last Spring.

As to Dr Muck's plans for the season, it is impossible to say anything at this time. Under normal conditions, he talks little about what he intends to do and under present conditions he will probably talk less. One natural result of the war will be a shortage in the usual number of novelties to be played during the season. It is almost impossible to get music from Europe, and unless Dr Muck brings some pieces himself, the chances are that the number of new works played will be very small.

Insofar as the work of the orchestra is concerned it will give a total of 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in Boston. New York will have two series of 10, Providence a series of six, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington and Brooklyn each a series of five. Worcester, New Bedford and Hartford a series of three, while single concerts will be given in various cities in New England, in addition to the concerts of the January trip in the Middle West.

The management has used its usual care in its choice of soloists for the Boston season. Ten outside artists have been selected, comprising four singers, four pianists and two violinists, and to the number of violinists must be added, naturally, Mr Witek, the eminent concert master of the orchestra, and Mr Noack, the second concert master, while undoubtedly Mr Warnke, the solo 'cellist, will also appear.

The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato. The pianists are Harold Bauer, Ferruccio Busoni, Leonard Borwick and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud.

Of these, four are newcomers to Symphony concerts, although all of them have appeared more or less in Boston. Florence Hinkle, who is unquestionably the foremost American soprano who gives her time exclusively to concert work, has been heard here often in choral concerts and her art is justly admired. Pasquale Amato, principal baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, has been heard here often, both with the Metropolitan and Boston Opera Companies. Mr Amato, moreover, in addition to his eminence as an operatic singer, has of late devoted much time to concert work.

Leonard Borwick, the English pianist who is to appear with the orchestra, will be a newcomer to the vast majority of Symphony patrons. Although his name was known to those who make it their business to follow music, so far as the great public was concerned, he was entirely an unknown quantity when, quite unheralded, he gave, two years ago, successful recitals in New York and one in Boston.

The other newcomer in the list of soloists is Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist. Mr Thibaud has played in Boston but twice, once 10 years ago and last Winter, when he shared a program with Harold Bauer at one of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall.

The other soloists are too well known and have too large a following in Boston to need preliminary heralding. Miss Culp has been an honored visitor here several times in the past two years, Miss Gerhardt, who, with Miss Culp, upholds the highest ideals of German song, returns after a year's absence. Harold Bauer and Mr Busoni are always welcome visitors to Boston and the return of Mr Gabrilowitsch, after an absence of several years, will be warmly welcomed.

The management of the orchestra takes the responsibility of announcing Mr Kreisler as a soloist, in the firm belief that he will be here in January, the appointed time. None of the reports of his death or injuries in battle have been confirmed. On the other hand, word was received from him, since Sept 1, that he might come to America earlier than he planned.

DRAMATIC PAGE OF THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER

SYMPHONY TO OPEN BRILLIA

The European War Has Not as Yet Caused Withdrawal of Any Men Who Last Spring Signed Co

Leonard Borwick.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, soloist.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, mezzo soprano.

Miss Julia Culp, mezzo seprano.

BY OLIN DOWNES

With the opening of the 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, only less than two weeks off. it is possible to say that this season will be at least as brilliant as any recent seasons of the orchestra, not only in the quality of the orchestral performances—for, contrary to previous report. the personnel of the Boston Symphony will be no more altered this season than has been the case in several former seasons, when necessary changes were made in its ranks—but also in regard to the soloists engaged.

As heretofore, these soloists are of the very highest rank; and, again, in spite of alarming war-talk, the European conflict has not up to the present time made necessary a single substitution in the list of those who last spring signed agreements to appear this season.

The list of soloists comprises four singers, four pianists and two violinists, exclusive of the customary appearances each season of Mr. Witek, the admirable concert-meister of the orchestra; Mr. Noack, the second concert-meister, and Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist, who will undoubtedly appear. The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato. The pianists are Harold Bauer, Ferrucio Busoni, Leonard Borwick and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud.

Of these soloists, four are new to Boston Symphony audiences, although all of them have made appearances in Boston. Florence Hinkle has grown more esteemed as a concert artist with the passing of each season.

Mr. Thibaud, although he has played ere this in Boston, has not yet appeared with the Boston Symphony. For this appearance the local public has waited long enough, since Mr. Thibaud, a violinist of the French school, unites with the artistic qualities of this school that thoughtfulness and solidity of style not often found in such association. Mr. Thibaud played in Boston with Harold Bauer at one of the Sunday afternoon concerts last season, and previous to that time had not played in Boston for 10 years. He has not been called to service in the French army, and will fulfil his American engagements.

Mr. Amato of the Metropolitan Opera Company is too well known, both in concert and on the operatic stage, to Bostonians to require any further introduction, and his art bears closer examination on the concert platform than that of most opera singers of the day. Both Miss Culp and Miss Gerhardt have enjoyed exceptional success in recent seasons in Boston.

The management of the orchestra takes the responsibility of announcing Mr. Kreisler as a soloist, in the firm belief that he will be here in Boston in January. None of the reports of his death or injuries have been confirmed. On the other hand, word was received from him, since the first of September, that he might come to America earlier than he had planned.

World-Famed Pianist Coming

The pianists offer in themselves a remarkable group. Leonard Borwick will visit Boston for the second time, and will appear for the first time with the orchestra. To those who make it their business to follow music, his name is well known, but with the exception of a recital he gave in Boston two years ago, when, being unheralded in the usual manner of managers, his audience was a small one, his name is not one which carries a definite impression with it to those who are not in the habit of keeping in touch with musical events.

Mr. Borwick was so successful with the press in both cities that he was immediately noted as one to be engaged, when the future should make it possible, to appear with the local orchestra.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the Russian, one of the most poetic and distinguished of modern virtuosi, has not been heard here for several seasons. This is equally true of Mr. Busoni, composer, pianist, musical essayist—what is he not?

A technician who stands supreme even among the astonishing virtuosos of this century, a man of commanding individuality and of an intellectual equipment which would be uncommon, not only among musicians, but in any circles, he is in some respects one of the most interesting figures of the musical world. His singular conceptions as a composer are not more surprising than his mastery of the piano, and it is thought likely that Mr. Busoni will take part in the performance of one of his own works when the occasion arrives. Harold Bauer is now one of the most esteemed of contemporary pianists, a his eclecticism, his intelligence, endless resources of tone color at t key-board, have given him a large a persistent following.

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1914

FOR the first time in its thirty-four years of existence the Symphony Orchestra, from conductor and manager down to the least of its members, has striven with unexpected and untoward circumstance, imposed by no fault of its own or of its public, but by sheer implacable fate, and conquered it. The circumstance was the European war—the first general war that the world has known since the orchestra came into being. And if ever there was an international organization, it is the hundred-odd players that make the band. No one has yet computed the number of nationalities in the orchestra. At the least, it contains Prussians and Bavarians, Slavs, Czechs, French, Belgians and Hollanders and here and there a native-born or a naturalized American. Worse still under the untoward circumstance, it is the custom of members of the orchestra not a few, to pay summer visits to Europe, and to go where and when they will, leaving no word behind but a pledge to be at their desks on the appointed day for the first rehearsal of the autumn.

Foiling Fate

When the war began, it was certain that one and another player in the band would be called to service in the army of his country and dutifully answer the call. All such, however, could be traced, since they would certainly notify either Dr. Muck in Baireuth or Berlin or the offices of the orchestra in Boston. Far more difficult was it likely to be to discover who among the players were merely dwelling or travelling in Europe; where they were; and what the prospect of their timely return to Boston in the midst of disorganized railway traffic on land and steamship service on sea. When once the first surprise and confusion of the outbreak of the war had passed, and when once it had been agreed between Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, that the concerts must proceed in the face of every obstacle, the two men set themselves to their two-fold task—to sort out the drafted and to find the scattered and assure their return in the first days of October. From Munich to Rotterdam and from Baireuth to Berlin, going in and out of Germany as need came, using the advantages of neutral countries, enduring the difficulties of belligerent lands, conductor and manager have pursued their work. Only within the last fortnight have they been sure that they had accomplished it. War or no war, the Symphony Concerts in Boston and in all cities that the orchestra regularly visits, have not to be abandoned, postponed or diminished. Like the other strong and illustrious institution of music in America—the Metropolitan Opera House—it has thrown off the fate that plucked at it.

Loyalties and Zeal

As inquiries proved and as information from the men gradually came, the number of the drafted within the orchestra was relatively few; while not all who were "called" or who offered themselves for service in their respective armies, were accepted. As it is, none of the "principals" (as the English say) in the several choirs will be missing, except Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, who is in the hospital service of France, and a new first trumpet of rare abilities, who is with his regiment holding back the Slavs from East Prussia. Among new men and old the other absentees by reason of military duty will be few—perhaps no more than four—and it has been relatively easy to find substitutes for them. Many opera houses on the Continent are closed; most series of concerts have been abandoned; for a year or more orchestras will exist as in suspended animation. When Dr. Muck proffered an idle player in any of these bands a substitutes job in Boston for the current season he was glad to accept.

Yet even so, the newcomers (who cannot be announced until the conductor brings their names and quality), will be surprisingly few. One by one the members of the orchestra who were merely detained in Europe by the exigencies of war-time, made known their whereabouts to Dr. Muck or Mr. Ellis, announced their arrangements for their return to Boston or asked for aid in the making of them. One and all were quietly but intently loyal to the orchestra and never have its members better proved their underlying esprit de corps. If they were "called," they went to the colors because their duty to their countries overrode their obligations to their profession. If they were free to return, there was no debate of wearisome journeys, of crowded "liners," of second cabins or "third class." There were only readiness and resolve to be at their posts at the appointed time. If Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis outdid themselves in work to reassemble the orchestra, the men lagged not a whit behind in willing cooperation.

The Annual Schedule

Accordingly the long series of concerts—110 in all—in Boston and in the cities that the orchestra regularly or occasionally visits will proceed almost exactly according to the schedule arranged last spring. Only the one innovation in it—an expedition ten days long into the West before the concerts in Boston began—has been deferred to next autumn. According to the original scheme, the orchestra was to report for duty on Monday next and after a few rehearsals proceed into the West. Now, in order that every man may have all needful time for his return, the first meeting of the orchestra has been deferred to Monday, Oct. 12. The first concerts of the new season befall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and Saturday evening, Oct. 17. Then in the usual succession will come the forty-six concerts in twenty-three pairs that make the series. Six times broken by the monthly visits to New York and other cities southward and by the midwinter journey into the nearer West, it will end on Friday and Saturday, May 7 and 8. Not even for Christmas Day is its course to be interrupted. This year the festival falls on a Friday; but the concert that the schedule assigns to that day will be set neither forward nor back. The presumption is that the audience will be more numerous and more interested than it would be on the afternoon before Christmas.

In the other cities that the orchestra regularly visits, the concerts will follow the schedule announced. In them for the most part every ticket is already taken by subscriptions continued from year to year. Here in Boston, where the outmoded and inconvenient system of annual sales and of bids and premiums still and mistakenly prevails, the auctions of the tickets will begin at Symphony Hall on Monday, Oct. 5 (for the higher-priced places at the afternoon concerts); continue on Tuesday, Oct. 6 (for the lower-priced seats at the afternoon concerts); be resumed on [illegible] Oct. [illegible] places at the evening concerts) and en Friday, Oct. 9 (for the less costly sitt at the evening concerts). Neither p pectus nor schedule now hints that regular course and the usual fortune the orchestra might have been gravely turbed by the war.

An Orchestra at Its Acme

Needless, almost, to say, the slight cha in the personnel of the orchestra wil no respect lessen the quality of its formances. The few substitutes, b themselves worthy of the places they are to fill, will be readily sorbed into the several choirs. Not long does a musician of mettle w with the Symphony Orchestra than feels the stimulus of the association.
no longer need he work under Dr. M to give back the best that is in
From the virtual reorganization of orchestra in the first days of Gericke's first conductorship, the n so far as they may, have made the chestra what it is by their techn skill, their musical sensibility, th reciprocating imagination, their es de corps and their "honneur d'artis as the fine French saying has it.
conductors in their turn, have made orchestra a homogeneous, pliant, se tive and manifold instrument, perfec adjusted for the eloquence of their m cal utterance, for the heights and depths, the power or the fineness of th musical understanding, sympathy intuition. The Symphony Orchestra st at the acme of its powers at the end last season. It played as never befor had played in every essential quali
Dr. Muck had wrought it into his o image—the image of a conductor wh understanding and self-discipline, d vination and discrimination ear and i agination, power of coördination a power of impartment, range of symp thy and elasticity of mastery make h ne of the two or three conductors of t rst rank that the world now hol Vho, after all, but Mr. Nikisch and M ingartner may sit beside him?

military service in time for the opening performance.

Cunard Line, after having spent his Summer abroad

EN BRILLIANT SEASON

Men Who Last Spring Signed Contracts to Play in Famous Orchestra

mezzo rano.

Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano.

Mis Julia Culp, mezzo soprano.

which wou be uncommon, not only among mus ans, but in any circles, he s in some repects one of the most interesting figues of the musical world. His singular conceptions as a composer are no nore surprising than his nastery of th piano, and it is thought kely that Mr Busoni will take part n the performnce of one of his own vorks when th occasion arrives. Harold Bauer is now one of the most esteem ed of contemporary pianists, and his eclecticism, his intelligence, his endle ss resources of tone color at the key-b oard, have given him a large and persis tent following.

Dr. Muck Sails for Hub

Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Rotterdam with Mrs. Muck. They are coming on a slow ship, for Holland is the only practicable means of exit for Germans from Germany. When they arrive in Boston Dr. and Mrs. Muck will take possession of the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring.

The Bayreuth festival, where Dr. Muck was conducting the performances of "Parsifal," was brought to a sudden close Aug. 2, as a large part of the orchestra of the opera house there was subject to mobilization, with many of the solo singers. Dr. Muck stayed several more weeks in Bayreuth, while Mrs. Muck took a hurried trip to Graz with her niece, whose father, a colonel in the Austrian army, was about to leave for the front. For the past several weeks Dr. and Mrs. Muck have been in Berlin.

There was at no time any question of Dr. Muck's return to this country, and the fact that doubt was expressed regarding it was due to the absolute lack of communication overseas through August. As to Dr. Muck's plans for the season it is impossible to say anything at this time. Under normal conditions he talks very little about what he intends to do, and under present conditions he will probably talk less.

No Dearth in Novelties

Some fear that as a result of the war there will be a shortage in the number of novelties heard during the season. While this is a possibility, there is no need of such a lack in the programmes. The library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains a considerable number of works which have never been played here—among them several important scores by Jean Sibelius. Not only that, but it is also true too many works of real value are played once a season at the Boston Symphony concerts and then, having been commended, are shelved for seasons, before the public has an opportunity to become actually acquainted with them.

There are a large number of such works, and a rehearsing of them would be welcome. As Dr. Muck's programmes have of late become increasingly catholic in their character, it is more than likely that he will take the present opportunity of reviving some important compositions.

The first public rehearsal of present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and the first concert on the following Saturday evening. The annual auction sale will begin in Symphony Hall, Monday, Oct. 5, and continue Tuesday, Oct. 6, Thursday, Oct. 8, and Friday, Oct. 9.

On Monday the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday the $10 seats; on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats. With the exception of the special tour of the West, which had been planned for the first fortnight of October, all the concerts arranged for will be given and on the dates set last Spring when the schedule was made. Boston will have its usual quota of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The rehearsals will run from Oct. 16 to May 7 and the concerts from Oct. 17 to May 8. As in recent years, there will be six weeks during the season when the orchestra will be away, five times on Southern trips and once on the regular trip to the Middle West.

The dates that the orchestra will be away are Nov. 7—8, Dec. 5—6, Jan. 9—10, Jan. 30—Feb. 1, Feb. 20—21 and March 20—21. The total number of concerts will be 110. Outside of Boston, the orchestra will give its usual duplicate series of five concerts each in New York, its series of eight in Cambridge, six in Providence, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Brooklyn, and three each in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford. Single concerts in addition to those in the West will be given in various cities in New England.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Word was received by C. A. Ellis yesterday that Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Rotterdam on the Ryndam Sunday. The ship was scheduled to have sailed Saturday, but she evidently was delayed a day. This will bring Dr. Muck to Boston about Oct. 8.

Concert-master Witek and Harpist Alfred Holy were expected to arrive in New York by the Noordam yesterday, but it turns out that the ship scheduled to sail Sept. 19 did not get away from Rotterdam until Sept. 24. A letter has been received from Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violinists, dated three weeks ago, when he was still in Ischl, Austria, where he spends his summers. It is hoped that he will be able to reach Boston before the opening of the Symphony season. Pierre Fosse, the third oboe of the orchestra, one of the few who are serving, is in the 14th Company of the 109th Regiment of French Territorials, and is stationed at Chatillon. This is near Lyons, so it seems that Mr. Fosse has not yet been sent to the fighting line.

---

re were only be at their If Dr. Muck ves in work a, the men willing coof concerts— e cities that occasionally ctly according last spring. —an expedi- West before —has been rding to the was to re- t and after the West. may have n, the first een deferred concerts of iday after- ening, Oct. ession will n twenty- eries. Six sits to New rd and by he nearer Saturday, Christmas pted. This riday; but assigns to rward nor the audi- more in- the after-orchestra vill follow m for the taken by r to year. noded and sales and nd mis- the tick- on Mon- places at on Tues- seats at aces at the evening concerts) and end on riday, Oct. 9 (for the less costly sittings the evening concerts). Neither prospectus nor schedule now hints that the regular course and the usual fortunes of he orchestra might have been gravely disturbed by the war.

n Orchestra at Its Acme

Needless, almost, to say, the slight changes the personnel of the orchestra will in o respect lessen the quality of its performances. The few substitutes, being themselves worthy of the places that hey are to fill, will be readily absorbed into the several choirs. Not for long does a musician of mettle work with the Symphony Orchestra than he feels the stimulus of the association. For o longer need he work under Dr. Muck o give back the best that is in him. rom the virtual reorganization of the orchestra in the first days of Mr. Gericke's first conductorship, the men, so far as they may, have made the orchestra what it is by their technical skill, their musical sensibility, their reciprocating imagination, their esprit de corps and their "honneur d'artiste," as the fine French saying has it. The conductors in their turn, have made the orchestra a homogeneous, pliant, sensitive and manifold instrument, perfectly adjusted for the eloquence of their musical utterance, for the heights and the depths, the power or the fineness of their musical understanding, sympathy and intuition. The Symphony Orchestra stood at the acme of its powers at the end of last season. It played as never before it had played in every essential quality. Dr. Muck had wrought it into his own image—the image of a conductor whose understanding and self-discipline, divination and discrimination, ear and imagination, power of coördination and power of impartment, range of sympathy and elasticity of mastery make him of the two or three conductors of the rank that the world now holds. after all, but Mr. Nikisch and Mr. tner may sit beside him?

[8]

Novel and Revived Pieces

Almost needless again to say, Dr. Muck has been too busy with the reassembling of his men to put together programmes, to announce novel pieces, or to scheme out the details of the concerts. The European publishers of music from Belaieff in Petrograd to Novello in London are likely to despatch him few new scores in the course of the winter to come. Such "first times" as he chooses to include in his programmes must be for pieces that he has already in his hands; that lie on the shelves of the library at Symphony Hall; or that American publishers of music can submit to him. The probability is that revivals of forgotten or neglected music will be more numerous than productions of new. In that same library lie at least a hundred, perhaps two hundred, scores of pieces that have been played once at the Symphony Concerts and, whatever their deserts, put aside and forgotten. Through last season and the season before, Dr. Muck rediscovered not a little of such music and his audiences heard it gladly. He is likely to restore still more to the "active" repertory in the six months to come. To all hearing intents and listening purposes these pieces are "novelties," a little softened and haloed by the lapse of the years.

Assisting Singers

Ten "assisting artists," beside Mr. Witek, Mr. Noack and Mr. Warnke of the orchestra itself, who are likely to have their annual concertos, are now announced for the concerts. Three "women singers" and one "man singer" have been engaged: Mmes. Culp, Gerhardt and Hinkle and Mr. Amato. Curiously, as the choice of singers has run in some preceding seasons, only one of the four—Mr. Amato—comes from the Metropolitan, or any other, opera house. Mme. Culp and Miss Gerhardt are concert-singers and nothing else, each in prime of voice and faculty, each of acknowledged rank, and each established with the public that is once more to take its pleasure in them. Miss Hinkle deserves the distinction that has fallen to her. On no other ground than the proved qualities of her voice, artistry and imagination, by no other title than her just rise and progress, she—an American singer and in the concert room only—has been called to the most

Pianists and Violinists

Four pianists and two violinists fill the list of the virtuosi out of the swarm that will descend upon America this season. The pianists are Mr. Bauer, as he proved last year in the glowing noon of all his powers; Mr. Busoni, now revisiting America as insistently as he refused to come to it—Busoni, the unusual and maybe the freakish, but the Busoni who alway interests by the play of an uncommon mind over music and technic; Mr. Gabrilowitsch, returning after long absence, with maturer insight and power added to his remembered felicity and charm, and Mr. Borwick—that rare being, an English pianist of genuine individuality and distinction, even though they express themselves through class poise—only once heard here in a passing and little heeded recital.

The violinists are the two masters in the middle generation of a finesse, a sensibility, a subtle feeling and a penetrating eloquence with their music and their instrument that neither the waning elders, like Mr. Ysaye, nor the rising youngsters like Mr. Zimbalist can match. For they hold the secrets of the manifold beauty and the manifold moods of the voice of the violin. Cedent artes patriæ and for the moment Mr. Kreisler has gone to the Austrian and Mr. Thibaud to the French colors. Each is in service that is not likely to imperil life or limb, and each has reason to believe that he will be released in time to keep his engagements. After all, violinists are but men, acting as men, when duty to their country calls them. Therefore is Mars ruefully kind to them. H. T. P.

orecasting the "Symphonies"

The Two New-Coming Pianists

Ossip Gabrilowitsch
Who Returns After Long Absence

Leonard Borwick
Who Is Virtually Unknown to Boston

BOSTON AMERICAN, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1914.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS ASSURED FOR BOSTON

DR. MUCK AND MR. ELLIS HAVE FOUND SONGBIRDS TO TAKE PLACES OF THOSE CALLED TO BATTLEFIELDS

JULIA CULP, MEZZO SOPRANO SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
© Champeau Studios, N. Y.
DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FLORENCE HINKLE, MEZZO SOPRANO SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ELENA GERHARDT, SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Trio of soloists in this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous conductor, Dr. Muck.

In less than two weeks the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will begin. The first rehearsal is set for Friday afternoon, October 16, and the first concert for the following evening.

What the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to mean to Boston in the thirty-three years it has been playing was brought home very keenly to its friends and patrons when, during August, there was doubt expressed whether it would be able to give its concerts during the coming Winter or at best could give only a part of them on account of the war in Europe. Such a result of the war was regarded as a truly great calamity, but fortunately the fears turned out to be unfounded.

Dr. Muck and a number of the more prominent members of the orchestra were in Europe and during the time when communications were interrupted, it was impossible to know what men and how many would be called out for military service in France, Austria, Germany and Belgium. As it has turned out, however, very few have so been called. Fortunately for the orchestra, Mr. Ellis, its manager, was in Europe and in Germany when the war began and he and Dr. Muck were able successfully to fill such places as were left vacant.

The annual auction sales will begin in Symphony Hall Monday, October 5, and continue Tuesday, October 6, Thursday, October 8, and Friday, October 9. On Monday the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, on Tuesday the $10 seats, on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats.

With the exception of the special tour of the West, which had been planned for the first fortnight of October, all the concerts arranged for will be given and on the dates set last Spring when the schedule was made. Boston will have its usual quota of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The rehearsals will run from October 16 to May 7 and the concerts from October 17 to May 8.

Dr. Muck sailed with Mrs. Muck from Rotterdam yesterday. They are coming on a slow ship, for Holland is the only practical means of exit from Europe for Germans.

The Bayreuth Festival, where Dr. Muck was conducting the performances of "Parsifal," was brought to a sudden close August 2, as a large part of the orchestra was subject to the call of mobilization and many of the men artists also. Dr. Muck stayed well into August, but Mrs. Muck took a hurried trip to Graz with her niece, whose father, a colonel in the Austrian army, was about to leave for the front. For the past several weeks both she and Dr. Muck have been in Berlin.

The following soloists have been engaged: Singers, Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato; pianists, Harold Bauer, Ferruccio Busoni, Leonard Borwick and Ossip Gabrilowitsch; violinists, Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud.

Of these four are newcomers to Symphony concerts, although all of them have appeared more or less in Boston. Florence Hinkle, who is unquestionably the foremost American soprano who gives her time exclusively to concert work, has been heard here often in choral concerts and her art is justly admired. Pasquale Amato, principal baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, has been heard here often both with the Metropolitan and Boston Opera Company.

Mr. Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, who is to appear with the orchestra, will be a newcomer to the vast majority of Symphony patrons. The other newcomer in the list of soloists is Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist. Mr. Thibaud has played in Boston but twice, once ten years ago and last Winter, when he shared a program with Harold Bauer at one of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall.

From POST
Address: New York City
Date SEP 19 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual number of concerts this year, but the preliminary trip to the West which had been planned has been postponed on account of the war. Dr. Muck sails for this country at the end of this month, and the orchestra, with its personnel practically unchanged, will begin rehearsals in October, the first Boston concert being given October 16. The subscription for the concerts in Carnegie Hall, November 5 and 7, December 3 and 5, January 7 and 9, February 18 and 20, and March 18 and 20, has been completely filled.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1914.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Word was received by C. A. Ellis yesterday that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Rotterdam on the Ryndam Sunday. The ship was scheduled to have sailed Saturday, but she was delayed a day. This will bring Dr. Muck to Boston about the 8th. Concert Master Witek and Harpist Alfred Holy were expected to arrive in New York by the Noordam yesterday, but the ship scheduled to sail the 19th did not get away from Rotterdam until the 24th. A letter has been received from Otto Roth when he was still in Ischl, Austria. It is hoped that he will be able to reach Boston before the opening of the season. Pierre Fosse, the third oboe of the orchestra, one of the few who are serving, is in the 14th company of the 109th regiment of French Territorials and is stationed at Chatillon. This is near Lyons, so Mr. Fosse has not yet been sent to the fighting line.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 29.

DR. MUCK EXPECTED TO REACH BOSTON OCT. 8

Word was received by C. A. Ellis yesterday that Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Rotterdam Sunday. This will bring Dr. Muck to Boston about Oct. 8.

Concert-Master Witek and Harpist Alfred Holy were expected to arrive in New York by the Noordam yesterday, but it turns out that the ship did not sail until Sept. 24, five days behind schedule time.

A letter has been received from Otto Roth, one of the first violinists, dated three weeks ago, when he was still in Ischl, Austria, where he spends his summers. It is hoped that he will reach Boston before the opening of the Symphony season.

Pierre Fosse, the third oboe of the orchestra, one of the few members who are serving under the colors, is in the Fourteenth Company of the 109th Regiment of French Territorials, and is stationed at Chatillon. This is near Lyons, so it seems that Mr. Fosse has not yet been sent to the fighting line.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 28,

CONCERTS AND OPERA

SYMPHONY STANDARDS AND THE "SOLOISTS"

So Far This Year Theory and Practice Go Hand in Hand—Miss Garden's Wagnerian Ambition—New Pieces for New York—A Letter from Miss Hempel—The Discoverer of Mme. Melba—Items from the Opera Houses

IT is good to run through the list of "assisting artists" announced for the new series of Symphony Concerts and the pleasanter for the contrast it affords with one and another similar list in recent years. For once conductor and manager have consistently and resolutely adhered to the principles of choice that they are accustomed to profess. As theory goes, there should not be too many "soloists," since the essential interest of the concerts lies in conductor, orchestra and programmes, while they should all be singers, pianists or violinists of the first rank or at the least worthy to appear in such distinguished circumstance. The incidental contributors of concertos from the orchestra aside, only ten "assisting artists" have been engaged for the twenty-four pairs of concerts. For fully half of them, then, Dr. Muck, the orchestra and the composers, will have a clear field and they usually till it more fertilely than does any singer or virtuoso. Every one of the soloists, moreover, from the established Amato, Bauer and Kreisler through the rising or risen Thibaud, Borwick and Miss Hinkle deserves the call that he or she has received. For once excellent theory has become

If only these happy conditions continue through the six months of the actual concerts, then will the much-mooted standard for "soloists" seem clearer and firmer than it has for many a season. Yet in some autumns past, the announced list has been as encouraging as it is now, only to be amplified by this singer or that virtuoso as the concerts run their course. Often, these "added artists"—as the vaudeville theatres would call them—have scantily deserved the distinction that they receive. One or another circumstance not to be evaded; one or another influence not to be overcome; one or another obligation better left unfulfilled has thrust them into the concerts. Once heard, they have proved clearly unworthy of their distinction and even the powers that sought it for them have sometimes repented of their unwisdom. The audiences, however, have heard, judged—and also gossipped.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 1

MUSICIANS APPLY FOR SYMPHONY PLACES

Applications Being Received From All Over Europe in Greater Numbers Than Ever Before.

One of the interesting results of the war, in its effect on not only Europe, but this country, is the abnormal number of applications for places which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has received from musicians from all parts of the world.

Under usual conditions, there are always, at the beginning of each season, many such applications, but this year the number far exceeds any records of the past. This was due partly to the various rumors that the Orchestra would be short of men at the opening of the season; but the chief cause is the cessation of practically all musical activity in Europe. Evidently there are plenty of musicians in Germany, Austria and France who have not been called to the colors, and are quite willing to leave their native countries to serve the cause of art in the United States.

If the applications received this year are any indication of what will happen at the end of the war, America will be fairly swamped with good orchestral musicians in another season.

Subscribers to last season's Symphony Concerts in Cambridge have until next Monday, October 5th, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they then occupied. The usual series of eight concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, and the soloists will be Florence Hinkle, Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Anton Witek, Edward Morris, Irma Seydel and Ruth Deyo.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 3,

SYMPHONY SALE DUE NEXT WEEK

Seats for All the Boston Concerts Will Be Auctioned Off.

Symphony Hall will be a scene of activity the coming week, when the season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be sold. So far as preliminary indications can count, there is every reason to believe that the sales will be very successful.

The sales will be held for four days. Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $18 seats for the twenty-four rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. As in the past, the $18 seats comprise the entire floor back as far as KK—in other words, the entire floor except the last nine rows and the entire first balcony except the last five rows. The last five rows of the first balcony and the last nine rows on the floor are the only seats for the rehearsals for which the upset price is $10. The entire second balcony for the rehearsals is withheld for the 25-cent rush admissions on the day of the rehearsals.

Thursday at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the twenty-four concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the rehearsals. Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the concerts will be put on sale. These include not only the last nine rows of the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony, but the entire second balcony.

As already announced, the first public rehearsal will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and the first concert on the following evening. The dates on which the orchestra will be away are: Nov. 7 and 8, Dec. 5 and 6, Jan. 9 and 10, Jan. 30 and Feb. 1, Feb. 20 and 21, and March 20 and 21. The soloists who have been engaged are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle, Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Leonard Borwick, Ferruccio Busoni, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Fritz Kreisler, Jacques Thibaud and Anton Witek.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in Boston next Tuesday or Wednesday.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 5,

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

Auction for Rehearsals Opens This Morning

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

For guidance of those who are looking for special seats, it may be said that the sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2:30 and 3; the left balcony one-half to three-quarters of an hour later, and finally the centre balcony will be sold last.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years. Each seat will be sold to the highest bidder, and the cost of the seat will be the premium bid per seat, added to the upset price of $18 per seat. No more than four seats can be bought on one bid.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 5

AUCTION SALE TODAY OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold.

These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

For guidance of those who are looking for special seats, it may be said that the sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2.30 and 3; the left balcony, half to three-quarters of an hour later; and finally the centre balcony will be sold.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 5.

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS BEGINS TODAY

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

The sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2:30 and 3; the left balcony half to three-quarters of an hour later; and, finally, the centre balcony will be sold last.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 5,

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS THIS MORNING

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years. Each seat will be sold to the highest bidder and the cost of the seat will be the premium bid per seat added to the upset price of $18 per seat.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 6,

HIGH BID $112 FOR SYMPHONY

Prices Rule Lower Than They Were Last Season

Sensational features of the auction sale of the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, were the bidding of a premium of $108 for three seats, Nos. 15, 16 and 17 in row N on the right of the middle aisle, in the morning, and the bidding of premiums of $112 for seat No. 5 in row A on the left of the first balcony, and $100 for seat No. 6, just by it, in the afternoon. These bids, as those in the morning, resulted from the rivalry of agents who had evidently been instructed to buy certain seats at any cost.

PRICES BIT LOWER

The prices as a whole were about equal, or a little lower than last year. The second highest price bid in the morning was $72 for two seats on opposite sides of the middle aisle in row K. As usual, the bidding did not begin in real earnest until about four of the first rows of seats on the floor had been disposed of. The price bid for the first seat in row A was $10.50. In row D the price from $17.50 to $27; in row E there was paid as a premium from $18 to $24; in the next row, $17.50 to $36. The average price in row H was $35 to $40, one seat in this row bringing $42.50 and a seat in row I bringing $47.50.

This afternoon the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold.

New Men Arriving

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the Ryndam. With him will come seven new members of the Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck and Mr. Witek, the concert master, have spent much time since the outbreak of the war in securing these musicians.

There are two new first violins, a new viola, a new 'cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernst Schmidt, who has been concert master of the Darmstadt orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city, and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. M. J. Van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the new 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, who does not return, is an artist of international reputation. He was for a number of years the first 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin.

The new second harpist is V. Klicka; he is a well-known harp virtuoso and the orchestra is very lucky in securing his services. He had many engagements in Europe which, of course, have been cancelled by the war, and he was glad of the opportunity to come to Boston. The new clarinet, who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who has been the past season the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London.

Messrs. Sauvlet and Van Veen are Dutch, Malkin and Sand are Russian, Klicka is Bohemian, Schmidt is German, and Stanislaus is English.

On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

From POST
Address: New York City
Date SEP 19 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual number of concerts this year, but the preliminary trip to the West which had been planned has been postponed on account of the war. Dr. Muck sails for this country at the end of this month, and the orchestra, with its personnel practically unchanged, will begin rehearsals in October, the first Boston concert being given October 16. The subscription for the concerts in Carnegie Hall, November 5 and 7, December 3 and 5, January 7 and 9, February 18 and 20, and March 18 and 20, has been completely filled.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 29. 1914.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Word was received by C. A. Ellis yesterday that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Rotterdam on the Ryndam Sunday. The ship was scheduled to have sailed Saturday, but she was delayed a day. This will bring Dr. Muck to Boston about the 8th. Concert Master Witek and Harpist Alfred Holy were expected to arrive in New York by the Noordam yesterday, but the ship scheduled to sail the 19th did not get away from Rotterdam until the 24th. A letter has been received from Otto Roth when he was still in Ischl, Austria. It is hoped that he will be able to reach Boston before the opening of the season. Pierre Fosse, the third oboe of the orchestra, one of the few who are serving, is in the 14th company of the 109th regiment of French Territorials and is stationed at Chatillon. This is near Lyons, so Mr. Fosse has not yet been sent to the fighting line.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 29,

DR. MUCK EXPECTED TO REACH BOSTON OCT. 8

Word was received by C. A. Ellis yesterday that Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Rotterdam Sunday. This will bring Dr. Muck to Boston about Oct. 8.

Concert-Master Witek and Harpist Alfred Holy were expected to arrive in New York by the Noordam yesterday, but it turns out that the ship did not sail until Sept. 24, five days behind schedule time.

A letter has been received from Otto Roth, one of the first violinists, dated three weeks ago, when he was still in Ischl, Austria, where he spends his summers. It is hoped that he will reach Boston before the opening of the Symphony season.

Pierre Fosse, the third oboe of the orchestra, one of the few members who are serving under the colors, is in the Fourteenth Company of the 109th Regiment of French Territorials, and is stationed at Chatillon. This is near Lyons, so it seems that Mr. Fosse has not yet been sent to the fighting line.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 28,

CONCERTS AND OPERA

SYMPHONY STANDARDS AND THE "SOLOISTS"

So Far This Year Theory and Practice Go Hand in Hand—Miss Garden's Wagnerian Ambition—New Pieces for New York—A Letter from Miss Hempel—The Discoverer of Mme. Melba—Items from the Opera Houses

IT is good to run through the list of "assisting artists" announced for the new series of Symphony Concerts and the pleasanter for the contrast it affords with one and another similar list in recent years. For once conductor and manager have consistently and resolutely adhered to the principles of choice that they are accustomed to profess. As theory goes, there should not be too many "soloists," since the essential interest of the concerts lies in conductor, orchestra and programmes, while they should all be singers, pianists or violinists of the first rank or at the least worthy to appear in such distinguished circumstance. The incidental contributors of concertos from the orchestra aside, only ten "assisting artists" have been engaged for the twenty-four pairs of concerts. For fully half of them, then, Dr. Muck, the orchestra and the composers, will have a clear field and they usually till it more fertilely than does any singer or virtuoso. Every one of the soloists, moreover, from the established Amato, Bauer and Kreisler through the rising or risen Thibaud, Borwick and Miss Hinkle deserves the call that he or she has received. For once, excellent theory has become

If only these happy conditions continue through the six months of the actual concerts, then will the much-mooted standard for "soloists" seem clearer and firmer than it has for many a season. Yet in some autumns past, the announced list has been as encouraging as it is now, only to be amplified by this singer or that virtuoso as the concerts run their course. Often, these "added artists"—as the vaudeville theatres would call them—have scantily deserved the distinction that they receive. One or another circumstance not to be evaded; one or another influence not to be overcome; one or another obligation better left unfulfilled has thrust them into the concerts. Once heard, they have proved clearly unworthy of their distinction and even the powers that sought it for them have sometimes repented of their unwisdom. The audiences, however, have heard, judged—and also gossipped.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER.

OCTOBER 1

MUSICIANS APPLY FOR SYMPHONY PLACES

Applications Being Received From All Over Europe in Greater Numbers Than Ever Before.

One of the interesting results of the war, in its effect on not only Europe, but this country, is the abnormal number of applications for places which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has received from musicians from all parts of the world.

Under usual conditions, there are always, at the beginning of each season, many such applications, but this year the number far exceeds any records of the past. This was due partly to the various rumors that the Orchestra would be short of men at the opening of the season; but the chief cause is the cessation of practically all musical activity in Europe. Evidently there are plenty of musicians in Germany, Austria and France who have not been called to the colors, and are quite willing to leave their native countries to serve the cause of art in the United States.

If the applications received this year are any indication of what will happen at the end of the war, America will be fairly swamped with good orchestral musicians in another season.

Subscribers to last season's Symphony Concerts in Cambridge have until next Monday, October 5th, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they then occupied. The usual series of eight concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, and the soloists will be Florence Hinkle, Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Anton Witek, Edward Morris, Irma Seydel and Ruth Deyo.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 3.

SYMPHONY SALE DUE NEXT WEEK

Seats for All the Boston Concerts Will Be Auctioned Off.

Symphony Hall will be a scene of activity the coming week, when the season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be sold. So far as preliminary indications can count, there is every reason to believe that the sales will be very successful.

The sales will be held for four days. Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $18 seats for the twenty-four rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. As in the past, the $18 seats comprise the entire floor back as far as KK—in other words, the entire floor except the last nine rows and the entire first balcony except the last five rows. The last five rows of the first balcony and the last nine rows on the floor are the only seats for the rehearsals for which the upset price is $10. The entire second balcony for the rehearsals is withheld for the 25-cent rush admissions on the day of the rehearsals.

Thursday at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the twenty-four concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the rehearsals. Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the concerts will be put on sale. These include not only the last nine rows of the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony, but the entire second balcony.

As already announced, the first public rehearsal will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 16, and the first concert on the following evening. The dates on which the orchestra will be away are: Nov. 7 and 8, Dec. 5 and 6, Jan. 9 and 10, Jan. 30 and Feb. 1, Feb. 20 and 21, and March 20 and 21. The soloists who have been engaged are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle, Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Leonard Borwick, Ferruccio Busoni, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Fritz Kreisler, Jacques Thibaud and Anton Witek.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in Boston next Tuesday or Wednesday.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 5,

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

Auction for Rehearsals Opens This Morning

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

For guidance of those who are looking for special seats, it may be said that the sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2:30 and 3; the left balcony one-half to three-quarters of an hour later, and finally the centre balcony will be sold last.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years. Each seat will be sold to the highest bidder, and the cost of the seat will be the premium bid per seat, added to the upset price of $18 per seat. No more than four seats can be bought on one bid.

ADVERTISER.

OCTOBER 5

AUCTION SALE TODAY OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold.

These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

For guidance of those who are looking for special seats, it may be said that the sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2.30 and 3; the left balcony, half to three-quarters of an hour later; and finally the centre balcony will be sold.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 5.

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS BEGINS TODAY

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

The sale up to the time of recess, approximately 1 o'clock, will cover the floor back to the broad aisle, or row W. The right balcony will be put on sale between 2:30 and 3; the left balcony half to three-quarters of an hour later; and, finally, the centre balcony will be sold last.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 5,

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS THIS MORNING

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season will open at Symphony Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These seats comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows under the second balcony.

The rules governing the sale are the same as in past years. Each seat will be sold to the highest bidder and the cost of the seat will be the premium bid per seat added to the upset price of $18 per seat.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 6,

HIGH BID $112 FOR SYMPHONY

Prices Rule Lower Than They Were Last Season

Sensational features of the auction sale of the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, were the bidding of a premium of $108 for three seats, Nos. 15, 16 and 17 in row N on the right of the middle aisle, in the morning, and the bidding of premiums of $112 for seat No. 5 in row A on the left of the first balcony, and $100 for seat No. 6, just by it, in the afternoon. These bids, as those in the morning, resulted from the rivalry of agents who had evidently been instructed to buy certain seats at any cost.

PRICES BIT LOWER

The prices as a whole were about equal, or a little lower than last year. The second highest price bid in the morning was $72 for two seats on opposite sides of the middle aisle in row K. As usual, the bidding did not begin in real earnest until about four of the first rows of seats on the floor had been disposed of. The price bid for the first seat in row A was $10.50. In row D the price from $17.50 to $27; in row E there was paid as a premium from $18 to $34; in the next row, $17.50 to $36. The average price in row H was $35 to $40, one seat in this row bringing $42.50 and a seat in row I bringing $47.50.

This afternoon the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold.

New Men Arriving

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the Ryndam. With him will come seven new members of the Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck and Mr. Witek, the concert master, have spent much time since the outbreak of the war in securing these musicians.

There are two new first violins, a new viola, a new 'cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernst Schmidt, who has been concert master of the Darmstadt orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city, and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. Van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the new 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, who does not return, is an artist of international reputation. He was for a number of years the first 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin.

The new second harpist is V. Klicka; he is a well-known harp virtuoso and the orchestra is very lucky in securing his services. He had many engagements in Europe which, of course, have been cancelled by the war, and he was glad of the opportunity to come to Boston. The new clarinet, who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who has been the past season the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London.

Messrs. Sauvlet and Van Veen are Dutch, Malkin and Sand are Russian, Klicka is Bohemian, Schmidt is German, and Stanislaus is English.

On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 3.

DR MUCK DUE BY NEXT WEEK.

Symphony Musicians Reach New York.

Prof George G. Wilson Tells of The Hague Work.

Harvard Man Was Counsel to Dr van Dyke.

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was also a passenger, and with him were 10 others of the orchestra. He said that only one man would be absent when the first concert was given. He is the first clarinetist, whose place will be taken by a Russian artist. Mr Witek also said that Dr Muck would arrive on board the Ryndam of the Holland America Line, which is expected some time next week.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Tickets.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is due to arrive here next Tuesday. The first rehearsal has been called for October 12. Four days later the symphony officially begins its season.

Tickets to subscribers will be mailed this week. Subscribers who have not yet taken up their tickets should do so immediately, as the persons on the waiting list will be allotted their tickets from the number of unclaimed tickets.

Evening

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON MUSICIANS FOUND

Soloists Marooned Abroad by War All Located by Management.

BOSTON, Oct. 2.—Since the outbreak of the European war local music lovers have feared that the marooning abroad of many members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would prevent this season's concerts. This concern has been put to rest by the announcement that the symphony season will open October 16, the musicians having been rounded up one by one.

The management worked night and day in locating them and for a time it was feared that many had enlisted in the armies of their countries. Dr. Muck will be on hand for the first concert.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season of five concerts on the date originally planned, with its personnel practically intact. The only difficulty now is that the Academy of Music cannot hold all those who wish to attend the concerts. The late Professor Hooper spent much time attempting to induce the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a second series here each season, but the time could not be found for it.

Dr. Muck is due to arrive in New York from Europe the middle of next week.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 4 - 1914

OCT 4 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Carnegie Hall the coming season will be sent by registered mail to subscribers within a few days. The management wishes to give a final notice to such subscribers as have not taken up their tick-

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date OCT 4 - 1914

The Boston Symphony.

The tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Carnegie Hall the coming season will be sent by registered mail to sub- [illegible] within a few days. The man- [illegible] wishes to give a final notice [illegible] such subscribers as have not taken up their tickets that failure to do so immediately will result in the allotment of such tickets to persons on the waiting list.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive here from Europe on Tuesday, and on his arrival it will be possible to announce his musical plans for the season. The first rehearsal of the orchestra has been called for October 12, and the season begins in Boston on October 16.

BROOKLYN EDIT

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 4 - 1914

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

It is a matter of congratulation with the musical public of Brooklyn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beginning its regular season on the date originally intended, with its personnel virtually intact.

The only difficulty now is that the Academy of Music cannot hold all those who wish to attend the five concerts. The late Professor Hooper spent much time attempting to induce the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a second series of concerts in Brooklyn each season, and while the management was more than willing to undertake such a series, unfortunately time could not be found for it. The subscription for this season is like that of a year ago—everything sold.

Dr. Muck is to arrive in New York from Europe this week, and with his arrival the ranks of the orchestra will be complete. The first rehearsal has been called for Monday, October 12, and the season of the orchestra begins in Boston the following Friday, October 16.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Regarding the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ellis writes that "no more changes have been made than usually take place at the beginning of a season. Dr. Muck has been able to secure musicians of distinguished standing to take the place of the few men who are serving in various armies in Europe." He is due here next Tuesday.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 3 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tickets for the Carnegie Hall season will be sent by registered mail to subscribers in a few days. Subscribers' tickets now unclaimed will soon be sold to those on the waiting list.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

The tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Carnegie Hall the coming season will be sent by registered mail to subscribers within a few days. The management wishes to give a final notice to such subscribers as have not taken up their tickets that failure to do so immediately will result in the allotment of such tickets to persons on the waiting list. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive here from Europe next Tuesday, and on his arrival it will be possible to announce his musical plans for the season. The first rehearsal of the orchestra has been called for October 12 and the season begins in Boston October 16.

Arrangements have been completed whereby the artistic services of Felice Lyne, the coloratura soprano of the London, Boston and Champs Elysees operas, has been secured by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, for a short tour of New England the latter part of November.

From CITIZEN OCT 4 1914
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Fine Programme Will Be Given in Brooklyn as Originally Planned.

It is a matter of congratulation with the musical public of Brooklyn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beginning its regular season on the date originally planned, with its personnel practically intact. The five concerts which the orchestra gives in Brooklyn each year have become the center about which revolves the musical life of this city. The only difficulty now is that the Academy of Music cannot hold all those who wish to attend the concerts.

The late Professor Hooper spent much time attempting to induce the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a second series of concerts in Brooklyn each season and while the management was more than willing to undertake such a series, unfortunately time could not be found for it. The subscription for the coming season is like that of a year ago—everything sold.

Dr. Muck is due to arrive in New York from Europe the middle of the week, and with his arrival the ranks of the orchestra will be complete. The first rehearsal has been called for Monday, Oct. 12, and the season of the orchestra begins in Boston the following Friday, Oct. 16.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already thoroughly assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years and at the end of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left. The seats which have not already been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office, in the Heppe piano rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 27 1914

There is every indication that the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will show an improvement even over last year, when the high-water mark of subscription and single sales was reached. Last year's subscribers have been renewing their subscriptions for the coming season since last spring and very few have given up their seats, while the number of new subscribers will be considerable. The orchestra will give its usual series of six concerts on Tuesday evenings in Infantry Hall, the dates being Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 29, Feb. 2, March 2 and April 13, and the general sale of tickets will open at Seddon's News Stand, Butler's Exchange, Oct. 12.

Despite all reports and rumors to the contrary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season with its personnel intact. Several changes have been made in the membership and of these two or three were unexpected, owing to so many of the younger members having been summoned to military service in their several countries. All of their places, however, have been filled satisfactorily by Dr. Muck, who has been in Berlin busily preparing for the season since the middle of August. Dr. Muck is on his way to America and should arrive in Boston, Oct. 5. On his arrival, it will be possible to make more definite announcements as to his plans for the winter.

The list of soloists for Providence is not yet complete. Up to the present those engaged are Madame Schumann-Heinck, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 20 1914

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes a preliminary announcement of the series of concerts which it will give in Providence during the coming season. The regular season of the orchestra in Boston will open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16. The membership, despite the war, will be practically the same as last year, as nearly all of the musicians who were abroad have returned or are on their way to this country. Dr. Muck, who is now in Berlin, will sail for this country the end of this month.

As last season, the orchestra will give a series of six concerts. They will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 29, Feb. 2, March 2 and April 13.

Among the soloists already engaged are Madame Schumann-Heink, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek.

There has been a large and gratifying subscription already made for these concerts, but the sale of season tickets will open Monday evening, Oct. 12, at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street.

k, 1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date 1914

Die beiden erſten Konzerte des Boſtoner Orcheſters werden am 16. und 17. Oktober gegeben werden. Die Daten der New Yorker Konzerte ſind wie folgt vertheilt: 5. und 7. November, 3. und 5. Dezember, 7. und 9. Januar, 18. und 20. Februar und 18. und 20. März. Beide Serien der New Yorker Konzerte ſind bis auf den letzten Sitz ausverkauft.

ork, 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 27 1914

* * *

With the arrival of Doctor Muck from Europe, October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members only four have been pressed into military service in Europe, and Doctor Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Doctor Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago was due entirely to lack of news from the other side.

As already announced, the subscription for the series of concerts to be given in Philadelphia is gratifyingly large. Subscribers will be notified shortly from the Philadelphia office regarding their tickets. The seats in the house not taken by subscription will be placed on sale at Heppe's music store, Monday, October 12. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Mr. Kreisler's coming to America this winter, despite the number of times he is reported to have been killed or mortally wounded in battle.

* * *

ork, 1884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members, only four have been pressed into military service in Europe and Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt, which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago, was due entirely to lack of news from the other side.

As already announced the subscription for the series of concerts to be given in Philadelphia is gratifyingly large. Subscribers will be notified shortly from the Philadelphia office regarding their tickets. The seats in the house not taken by subscription will be placed on sale at Heppe's music store, Monday, October 12. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amator, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Mr. Kreisler's coming to America this Winter, despite the number of times he is reported to have been killed or mortally wounded in battle.

* * *

The re-allotment of seats to former

Esta 884

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that that institution will give during the current season its usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere. The war made it necessary to postpone for a year the preliminary trip to the West planned last spring, because it was impossible to get all the members of the orchestra back from [illegible]

Established

---

personnel practically unchanged, and Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor.

Dr. Muck sails for this country the end of this month and rehearsals will begin in Boston the second week of October. The first Boston concerts will be given as planned last year—Friday afternoon October 16, and Saturday evening, October 17.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 27 1914

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now on his way to America and is due to arrive Oct. 5. By that time the roster of the orchestra will be practically complete. The losses to the orchestra by the war have turned out to be very small, and such vacancies as have occurred have been satisfactorily filled by Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin in the early part of September. The coming season in Brooklyn should be as successful as last year. It could not be more so, for the house was entirely sold out, and that is the condition that is the case to-day. As already announced, the soloists are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no doubt that Mr. Kreisler will come to America at the time he planned, in January. As a matter of fact, recent advices from Vienna intimate that he may be here earlier. The dispatches regarding his death or severe injuries in the campaign in Galicia are, to say the least, unconfirmed.

Est 1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 1914

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductorr of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now on his way to America and is due to arrive October 5. By that time the roster of the orchestra will be practically complete. The losses to the orchestra by the war have turned out to be very small and such vacancies as have occurred have been satisfactorily filled by Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Much in Berlin in the early part of September.

The coming season in Brooklyn should be as successful as last year. It could not be more so, for the house was entirely sold out, and that is the case to-day. As already announced, the soloists are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no doubt that Mr. Kreisler will come to America as early as the time he planned, in January. Recent advices from Vienna intimate that he may be here earlier. The dispatches regarding his death or severe injuries in the campaign in Galicia are, to say the least, unconfirmed.

E 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date 25 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL OPEN BRILLIANTLY

Orchestra Will Inaugurate a 34th Season as Complete as Predecessors—Kreisler Announced.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Sept. 27.

The opening of the Symphony Orchestra's 34th season, now less than two weeks distant, promises to be at least as brilliant as any in its history, for contrary to previous reports, its personnel will be no more altered than has been the case in several former seasons. As heretofore the soloists engaged are of the very highest rank and in spite of alarming war talk, not a single agreement made last Spring has been cancelled.

Mr. Witek, the admirable concert-meister of the orchestra; Mr. Noack, the second concert-meister, and Mr. Warnke, the first cellist, will undoubtedly appear. The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato. The pianists are Harold Bauer, Ferrucio Busoni, Leonard Borwick and Ossip Gabrielowitsch. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Jacques Thibaud. The management takes the responsibility of announcing Mr. Kreisler as a soloist. None of the reports of his death or injuries have been confirmed.

Estal 34

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 27 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members, only four have been pressed into military service in Europe and Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Mr. Kreisler's coming to America this winter, de

E 1

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 27 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members only four have been pressed into military service in Europe and Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago was due entirely to lack of news from the other side.

As already announced, the subscription for the series of concerts to be given in Philadelphia is gratifyingly large. Subscribers will be notified shortly from the Philadelphia office regarding their tickets. The seats in the house not taken by subscription will be placed on sale at Heppe's Music Store, Monday, October 12.

The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Mr. Kreisler's coming to America this winter, despite the number of times he is reported to have been killed or mortally wounded in battle.

Es 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

9 and 10.

* * *

With the arrival of Dr. Karl Muck from Europe on October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members only four have been pressed into military service in Europe, and Dr. Muck and Manager Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago was due entirely to lack of news from Europe. The subscription for the series of concerts to be given in Philadelphia is gratifyingly large. The seats in the house not taken by subscription will be placed on sale on Monday, October 12. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Kreisler's coming to America this winter, despite the number of times he is reported to have been killed or mortally wounded in battle.

Estal 84

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe October 5, the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members only four have been pressed into military service in Europe, and Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago was due entirely to lack of news from the other side.

As already announced, the subscription for the series of concerts to be given in Baltimore is gratifyingly large. Subscribers will shortly be notified regarding their tickets by the Baltimore office. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no question about Mr. Kreisler's coming to America this winter, despite the number of times he is reported to have been killed or mortally wounded in battle.

Est 1884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 27 1914

* * *

A history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in preparation for publication this fall by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The book, which is written by Mark A. deWolf Howe of Boston, author of the "Charles Elliott Norton Letters," is being undertaken in a certain sense in honor of the 80th birthday of Henry L. Higginson, the founder and maintainer of the orchestra. Mr. Howe will deal largely with the inception of the idea of forming an orchestra which came to Mr. Higginson as long ago as the late 50s, when he was a student of music in Vienna.

* * *

The first rehearsal for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been called for Oct. 12, and the regular season of concerts will begin with the first public rehearsal, on Friday, Oct. 16.

Dr. Carl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, has sailed from Europe, and is due to arrive in this country on Oct. 5, while C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has already returned from Europe, where he had been since June. He reported that the few vacancies in the ranks of the orchestra caused by the war have been filled quite to the satisfaction of the conductor, and that the total number of changes in the personnel this year is no greater than often takes place at the beginning of a season.

Dates of the six concerts to be given

E 1884

[12]

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 26 1914

Boston Orchestra

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe on October 5 the roster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be complete. Of last year's members, only four have been pressed into military service in Europe, and Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis, who was with Dr. Muck in Berlin, have been able to fill these vacancies satisfactorily. The doubt which surrounded the future of the orchestra a few weeks ago was due entirely to lack of news from the other side. The soloists announced at present are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler.

Estal 384

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 27 1914

* * *

A communication from Symphony Hall, Boston, enumerates the whereabouts of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were in Europe at the outbreak of the war, some of whom have already returned to Boston. In the list is Anton Witek, the concert-meister, who with Mme. Witek, pianist, was in Sweden when hostilities began. They returned at once to Berlin, where they have since been detained. A letter from Mr. Witek to Herwegh von Ende of New York announces their intended sailing on a Holland-American liner on Oct. 10, but it is possible they may succeed in obtaining an earlier passage.

Alfred Holy, the harpist, succeeded in making his way to Rotterdam and is now with the Witeks. O. Roth, first violinist, after long delays in Ischl and Munich, is on his way back to Boston, and Messrs. Longy, Lenom and Muller of the wood-wind choir have already returned there. Mr. Fosse of the oboes was called to the French colors and Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, was drafted into the French hospital service.

Nothing definite is known of Mr. Koessler of the violins or Mr. Agnesy of the double-basses, and it is thought they may have been called to the colors. Messrs. Stumpf, the bass clarinet: Habenicht, leader of the second violins; Blumeneau of the violas, and Steinke of the celli were all in Berlin recently, and it is considered hardly likely that they will be called out so late in the day, with the Landwehr and Landsturn already in the field.

A new trumpeter of remarkable skill, who had been engaged for the orchestra by Dr. Muck, was ordered to his regiment and was obliged to defer the fulfillment of his contract.

* * *

1884

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

MR. C. A. ELLIS BACK.

Boston Symphony Manager Says Nearly All Musicians Are Coming Back.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday on board the Mauretania, after having spent his summer abroad in quest of new solo artists to appear with the orchestra during the coming season. The outbreak of the war caused a change of activities for Mr. Ellis, who turned from his search for new talent to a relief expedition for the members of the orchestra. Many of the musicians were abroad and most of them were in Germany, according to Mr. Ellis, when war started.

"We open our season in Boston October 16," he said, "and I do not think there will be more than one or two absentees. Dr. Muck, the conductor, will arrive in New York October 8. Mr. Anton Witek, concert master, will return about the same time. Mr. Georg Drisie, first clarionettist, will not be here. He is fighting for France."

Mr. Ellis started for Boston at five o'clock.

1884

BOSTON AMERICAN,
OCTOBER 5, 1914.

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Seats Bring Big Premium

Prices ranged slightly higher than last year in the bidding today for the $18 seats for Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphonoy Orchestra.

In the first row, the highest price was $20 premium for a seat on the left side. In Row B, $27.50 was bid for three seats on the left aisle. In Row C, the premiums ranged up to $32.50 for two seats in the centre. Four seats divided by the centre aisle brought $31.50 each.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
OCTOBER 5,

SYMPHONY LEADER DUE IN NEW YORK ON WAY TO BOSTON

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is expected to reach New York Tuesday on the Ryndam. With him will come seven new players. Dr. Muck and Mr. Witek, the concert master, have spent much time since the outbreak of hostilities in Europe in securing these musicians.

There are two new first violins, a new viola player, a new cellist, a new clarinetist, a new oboist and a second harpist. The first violins are Ernst Schmidt, who has been concert master of the Darmstadt orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city, and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist comes from the some orchestra as Mr. Sauvlet.

Josef Malkins, the new 'cellist, taking the place of Mr. Urack, who does not return, was for a number of years the first 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin. The new second harpist is V. Klicka.

The new clarinet who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who has been the past season the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera. The new oboist, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who has been first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London.

Messrs. Sauvlet and Van Veen are Dutch, Messrs. Malkin and Sand are Russian, Mr. Klicka is Bohemian. Mr. Schmidt is German, and Mr. Stanislaus is English.

On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

THREE SEATS FOR SYMPHONY BRING $108 PREMIUM

Bidding for Rehearsal Chairs Said by Official to Be Satisfactory and Ticket Agents Are Not Given Full Sway to Buy

CROWDS ATTEND SALE

Three main aisle seats, halfway down the main floor section of the house, brought a premium of $108 in the auction sale of Symphony orchestra rehearsal tickets this morning at Symphony hall. The locations are designated N 15, 16 and 17. The officials of the orchestra commented on this premium as unusual and they called the sale as a whole satisfactory.

Bidding for seats began at Symphony hall this morning with a large number of individual buyers present to purchase locations in the front of the house. Ticket agents were in evidence with their orders for places in the middle of the house, but the purchasing did not seem to be given into their hands by the patrons of the concerts so extensively as usual. Women especially came out in large numbers to take part in the auction.

The prices were quite as large as in former sales and the preference for center aisle seats took shape in offers of premiums running, as last year, up to $45 and a little over. Seats at the ends of the rows and in the three and four seats in from the aisles went for a premium of $15 and even lower.

The sale this morning was for the floor seats, which were put up at a starting price of $15. The first seats offered, the front row, right, A 1, went at a premium of $10.50. The middle of the row went for $22.50. Offers gradually rose as the auctioneer proceeded to the rows farther back, until he received $24 premium for I 1 and $47 for I 18, and in the center aisle. Each bidder was allowed four seats, but many single sales were made.

The seats on the floor at the back of the hall and the balcony seats which have a starting price of $10 are to be sold at auction on Tuesday morning.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 20 1914

PROVIDENCE musical circles found cause for satisfaction in two announcements of the past week, both of which tend to relieve the anxiety that had been felt as to the European war's effect on the local concert season. They were of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of six concerts, the first of which will be on Oct. 20, and of the Steinert series of four popular priced concerts beginning Nov. 10.

Thus it is indicated that earlier fears of a dearth of music were unfounded, and with these two fixtures supplemented by the appearance of the Providence Symphony Orchestra, whose rehearsals will soon begin, and other local events the season promises to be quite equal to former years.

Indeed, managers the country over are now predicting an unusually large number of European soloists for the American stage this winter, as those who have not been called on to serve in the armies are reported to be hastening westward to pick up American dollars. It may well be, therefore, that other announcements of concerts will add to the local programme.

* * *

Previous doubt as to the prospects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were set at rest by the authoritative statement that, aside from the abandonment of the preliminary western tour, the season will be according to schedule. The six Providence concerts, in Infantry Hall, will be on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 29, Feb. 2, March 2 and April 13. Among the soloists already engaged are Mme. Schumann-Heink, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek. The sale of season tickets will open Monday morning, Oct. 12, and a considerable subscription list is already reported.

Although Dr. Muck is now reported to be in Berlin, he expects to sail for Boston late in September. The Boston season will open Oct. 16, and 24 pairs of concerts will carry the orchestra's schedule into May.

There will be but few changes in the members of the orchestra, as it has been enrolled under Dr. Muck, who has engaged players in Berlin as substitutes for those who answered the call of the Kaiser. A new first clarionet must be found to fill the place of Mr. Grisez, who is now in the Hospital Corps of the French army.

* * *

, 1884

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 5, 1914

NEWS OF MUSIC

CHANGES AMONG THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Second Harp at Last, and a New First 'Cellist in Place of Mr. Urack—Other Newcomers — Kreisler's Wife Writes That He Is Relatively Unhurt—Warnings, Anecdotes and Items

A LETTER from Dr. Muck received at Symphony Hall this morning announces the new men whom he has been engaging through the last two months for the Symphony Orchestra. One of them is a second harpist of which the band has stood these many years in need; another is a new violoncellist for the first desk to take the place of Mr. Urack, whose connection with the orchestra is ended; and a third is the first clarinet in lieu of the absent Grisez, who is in service in the French army. The new harpist is a Bohemian, Mr. Klicka, of high reputation in Germany and Austria, whom the war has set free from his engagements at home. The new violoncellist is Mr. Malkan, a virtuoso of European standing in orchestral and chamber concerts and not so long ago first 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin. The new first clarinet is Mr. Sand, a Russian from the Deutsche Opernhaus at Charlottenburg.

Furthermore, Dr. Muck has engaged two new players for the first violins—Mr. Schmidt, late the concert-master of the orchestra at Darmstadt upon which the Grand Duke of Hesse and Mr. Weingartner equally lavish their cares; and Mr. Sauvlet from The Hague. From The Hague also will come a new viola player, Mr. van Veen; and Mr. Stanislaus of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London will take Mr. Fossé's place among the oboes while the French virtuoso is in the field. Eight of the established members of the orchestra, some of whom seemed liable to military service, arrived in Boston on Saturday ready for their work and "militarfrei" for it, viz.: Mr. Witek, the concert master; Mr. Holy, the harpist; Mr. Koessler, Mr. Habenicht, Mr. Baraniecki and Mr. Suelzen of the violins; Mr. Blumeneau of the violas, and Mr. Stumpf, the bass clarinet. Needless to say to anyone but the makers of "war news" and those unaccustomed to the use of "papers," they had no trouble whatever in leaving Germany. Sundry other players, old, new and as little hampered, are expected in New York tomorrow with Dr. Muck.

A Letter About Kreisler

Mrs. Kreisler's family, who live in New York, received a letter from her on Saturday, written in Vienna on Sept. 16, which sets at rest the current reports that her husband, the violinist, has been killed or grievously wounded in his service in the Austrian army. Mrs. Kreisler says:

Fritz was called to the front almost immediately, and since the nineteenth of August has been actively engaged at the battle of Lemberg. He was very lusty until the night of the figth of September, and then, in a night attack of Cossacks, was ridden over and met with rather a serious and painful accident, tearing a sinew of a muscle in his leg and a bruise of his shoulder. The latter was slight, but the leg will keep him limping for six to eight weeks. He looks very worn, and for nearly three weeks he never got out of his clothes or shoes, nor had more than three or four hours of sleep, and always under the stars, sometimes without food for days at a stretch.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 5. 1914

SYMPHONY SEATS AT $108

Stranger Takes Three at That Premium

Row N Choice of Man Who Is Unknown

Sum of $72 Was the Second Best Price

Average for Rehearsal Lower Than In 1913

Many familiar faces were to be seen in Symphony Hall this forenoon at the auction sale of the Symphony rehearsal seats. There also were many strangers, and it remained for one of the latter to pay a premium exceeding all others of recent years for rehearsal seats. The bidding ceased only when $108 was reached and the choice was row N, 15, 16 and 17, on the right of the middle aisle. The buyer remained but a short time after securing his seats; none of the attachés of the hall knew him, and he even refused to give his name when making his deposit at the desk.

An hour before this price was paid it was thought that the record figure for the day had been reached, when $72 premium was paid for two seats opposite each other on the middle aisle in K. This price was $1 less than the high price of last year at the same rehearsal sale, when $73 was paid for a centre aisle seat in M.

The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation for two or three rows. There was no spirited bidding until the seventh or eighth rows were reached, and, while premiums began to improve, they were lower, row by row, than the prices of last year.

Middle aisle sittings were in demand. In D, the lowest premium was $17.50, while the highest was $27; in E the prices ranged from $18 to $34; the range of prices here last year was from $22 to $43. The range in F was from $17.50 to $36, against $26.50 to $36 a year ago; in G the lowest price was 18, while the low price last year was $31; but, on the other hand, the high price in the row was $45 this year, against $43 last. The high price in H was $42, paid for a seat at the left of the centre aisle, and $47.50 was paid for the same seat in the row behind. Two sittings in J (opposite seats on the centre row) brought $45 each. The first place to be auctioned in the extreme right of K was taken for $31.50, and successively the prices were $26, $31, $32, $33. Then followed spirited bidding for seats exactly in the middle which went for the $72 premium, already noted.

The peculiarities of bidding, often due to the insistence of an old patron upon having the seats of former years, was illustrated by the prices in L, for relatively the same seats, which went for $40, and at this premium a patron took three. This was again noticed when the places back of the $108 seats were sold at a premium of $47. Then the prices gradually decreased. The sale tomorrow will be for the $10 rehearsal seats.

Tonight Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Symphony Orchestra will go to New York to meet Conductor Muck of the orchestra, who is expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam. Dr. Muck is accompanied by his wife. Others of the Symphony band who are expected on the same boat are Mr. Saud, a new clarinet player, who belongs in Petrograd, but whom Dr. Muck found in Berlin; Mr. Seydel, a contra bass, who is accompanied by his daughter, Miss Irma Seydel, an accomplished violinist, and Otto Roth, for many years one of the first violins of the Symphony band. Mr. Roth was marooned in the Tyrol for some time.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 20 1914

MUSIC NOTES.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in America next month. The coming season in Brooklyn is expected to be as successful as last year. As already announced, the soloists are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. There seems to be no doubt that Mr. Kreisler will come to America at the time he planned, in January. Recent advices from Vienna intimate that he may be here earlier. The despatches regarding his death or severe injuries in the campaign in Galicia are unconfirmed.

Esta 884

BOSTON TRAVELER.

OCTOBER 5,

SYMPHONY SEATS BRINGING RECORD PRICES AT AUCTION

All records for several years for bids on Symphony rehearsal season tickets were broken at the opening of the auction in Symphony Hall today, when a keen competition between two bidders resulted in the sale of three aisle seats in row "N" for $126 each. The bid was $108, to be added to the $18 ticket price. There was also a large bid in row "X," where four seats sold for $90 each.

The bidding started off slightly below normal, and below that of last year, but as the more choice seats in the centre of the house were reached the figures jumped into slightly better than normal.

Today was devoted to the sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold later. The auction sale will occupy four days of this week.

Dr. Karl Muck, thec onductor of the orchestra, is expected to reach New York tomorow on the Ryndam. With seven new members of the orchestra the two new first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernest Schmidt, who has been concertmaster of the Darmstadt orchestra, and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra os Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the ne wcellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack who does not return, was for a number of years the first cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Wietk trio in Berlin. The new second harpist is V. Klicka, the new clarinet who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who has been the past season the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London.

RECORD, MONDAY,

OCTOBER 5 1914

Average Prices Paid for Seats for Symphony

The opening of the auction sale of seats for the Symphony this morning brought out bidders, who paid about the same prices on premiums as on the opening sale of seats last year.

This morning the seats sold were the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. Bidding as usual was on the premiums to be added to the seat's face value of $18. The sharpest bidding was for aisle seats.

In the first row the highest price was $20 premium for a seat on the left aisle. In row B bids ranged from $12.50, in the center, to $27.50 for three seats on the left aisle.

In row C bids ranged from $20.50 up to $32.50, the latter being for two seats in the center, while four seats divided by the center aisle brought $31.50 each and two seats on the left aisle brought $31. In row D the highest price was $32.50 for a seat in the center, while a seat on the center aisle brought $31,50.

Up to the intermission for lunch all the seats up to row U, inclusive, had been sold, the highest price being $108 premium for three seats in row N, bordering on the right of the center aisle.

The next highest price was $72 for four seats in row K, divided by the center aisle. Last year $68 was the highest price paid in K, and a seat on the left center aisle last year went for $73.

In row G the highest price paid was $45 for two seats bordering th center aisle on the left.

Although the highest bid at the forenoon session was $108 premium against a high $73 last year, the average high price received for seats in other rows was slightly under the average high price received for the corresponding seats last year.

The management, based on today's bidding, estimates that total receipts will be within 5 p.c. of those last year.

RECORD, MONDAY,

OCTOBER 5 1914

NEW SYMPHONY MEN ARRIVE TOMORROW

Dr. Karl Muck, the Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is expected to reach New York Tuesday on the Ryndam. With him will come seven new members of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck and Mr. WiteLk, the concert-master, have spent much time, since the outbreak of the war, in securing these musicians. There are two first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp.

On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 6, 1914.

SYMPHONY SALE BEATS RECORDS

Premium of $112 Paid for A5 —Three Seats Bring $108 Each Over Price.

Records extending over several years were broken yesterday when the auction of $18 seats for the coming Symphony season was held at Symphony Hall. The premiums offered for choice seats have seldom, if ever, been greater.

The record premium was $112, which was paid for seat A5 in the left balcony, constituting a total purchase price of $130. The next highest was $108 each for three seats on the aisle in row N, orchestra. With the $18 added, the purchaser paid $126 for each seat. A6 in the left balcony brought a premium of an even $100, and four seats in X in the orchestra brought $90 cash without the $18.

The bidding started off slightly below normal, and below that of last year, but as the more choice seats in the centre of the house were reached the figures jumped into slightly better than normal.

The day was devoted to the sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold later. The auction sale will occupy four days of this week.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the Rhyndam, with seven new members of the orchestra. There are two new first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernest Schmidt, who has been concertmaster of the Darmstadt orchestra, and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Souvlet. Josef Malkin, the new cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, who does not return, was for a number of years the first cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin. The new second harpist is V.

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 6.

PREMIUM OF $112 FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

Record for Rehearsals of the Orchestra.

General Average Reached at the Auction Below Last Year's.

A premium of $112, which was $39 more than the highest premium paid last year, marked the climax of the opening yesterday of the auction sale of the $18 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals. This price was brought by a seat in the front row of the balcony, on the left side of the hall, A5. The adjoining seat, A6, brought an even $100 premium, while the record high price paid last year was $73, by Clarence W. Barron.

Many regular Symphony patrons were on hand when the bidding opened in the morning, but in spite of the phenomenal prices quoted, the general average fell slightly below that of last Autumn. Premiums of $108 each were paid during the morning for three adjoining seats in row N on the floor, while one agent bought a block of seats in K center at a $72 premium.

Practically the lowest premium of the entire day came with the first sale of seats in row A, where $10.50, the opening premium, continued to be the average for the first row. No spirited bidding occurred until the seventh and eighth rows were reached, when premiums advanced to $26 or $27.

The [illegible] many cases to the desire of old patrons to retain their seats of former years, was clearly illustrated by the seats directly back of $108 ones in N, sold at a premium of only $40. The seats in the balcony, where the day's record of $112 was reached, went at an average premium of from $35 to $40.

Today the sale of the $10 rehearsal seats will take place, including the last nine rows on the floor and the last five in the balcony. Thursday morning is set for the auction of the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

Manager Charles A. Ellis left last night for New York to meet Conductor Carl Muck and several of the band, who are expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 6.

PRICE RECORDS GO AT SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS

Premiums of $112 and $100 Paid for Two Seats in Balcony.

PRICES BOOSTED BY THE BROKERS

Average of Prices Is Only Slightly Above That of Last Year.

Price records of years' standing went by the board yesterday at the annual auction sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With exceptions of remarkably high prices for several seats, however, the general average of the prices was only slightly in excess of that of last year.

The regular attendants of the auction were present in force. It was the spirited bidding of brokers and strangers that sent the price of some seats soaring. Premiums of $112 and $100 were paid for seats A5 and A6 in the front row of the left-hand balcony respectively. The bidders who paid the totals of $130 and $118, counting the regular charge of $18 for the locations, were brokers.

An unidentified purchaser, rumored to be a new arrival from the West, boosted the price of three seats, N 15, 16 and 17, on the right of the middle aisle, up to $108 each before he stifled competition. In both these actions, the bidding was fast and furious, jumping $1 a bid. Usually bids take only 50-cent jumps at a time.

Early in the sale a premium of $72 was reached for two seats opposite each other on the middle aisle in K. The highest bid last year exceeded this amount by only $1.

Muck Due in New York Today With New Players

Accompanied by seven newly-engaged artists to fill the places of musicians permanently marooned in Europe by the war, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of Symphony orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the steamer Ryndam.

Since the outbreak of hostilities, Dr. Muck and Anton Witek, concert master of the organization, traveled through most of Europe to secure the services of these seven musicians.

There are two first violinis, a viola, a 'cello, a clarinet, an oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernst Schmidt, who has been concert master of the Darmstadt orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the new 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, is an artist of international reputation. He was for years the first 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussells quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin.

The new second harpist is V. Klicka, a well known virtuoso. He had many engagements in Europe which, of course, were canceled by the war, and he was glad of an opportunity to come to Boston. The new clarinet, who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who the past season has been the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been the first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London.

Messrs. Sauvelt and van Veen are Dutch, Malkin and Sand are Russians, Klicka is Bohemian, Schmidt is German and Stanislaus is English. On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY. OCTOBER 8.

DR. MUCK BACK FOR SYMPHON SEASON WOR

His Efforts Secured Releas Young Germans for Return to Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the S phony Orchestra, with Mrs. M reached Boston on the Knickerbo Limited last evening from New Y where he had landed in the morn Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Ro dam on the steamer Ryndam Sun Sept. 27. With him on the trip several members of the Boston phony Orchestra, including Mr. S the new first clarinet, and Messrs. S let and Otto Roth of the first violi

Dr. Muck came directly from Be where he had spent the greater pa the time since he left Bayreuth in middle of August. Shortly before ing he went to his summer hom Doblebad, in southern Austria. W Germany ordered the mobilization o army Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck conducting the second performanc "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. Up to the beginning of the performance there much doubt whether it could be g but finally word came that none of members of the orchestra need l Bayreuth before the end of the formance. A good part of the orc tra was in the army within 24 hou

Dr. Muck expressed himself as b unwilling to discuss the war. An tense patriot and an absolute beli in his country, he naturally feels deeply on the subject. He is bitterly disappointed that he is unable to serve Germany in some capacity.

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty and were able to return to their work here in Boston. There were, however, several musicians whom he had engaged to fill vacancies in the orchestra who have been unable to come because of being in the army. These places have been filled satisfactorily and there will be no lessening of the artistic value of the orchestra. As no less than 14 different races are represented in the membership of the orchestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feeling aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this. The men for the most part have been in the orchestra a long time and they are personal friends, and it is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

Dr. Muck will make definite announcements regarding programs in a day or so. Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring. It will probably be a week or so before they get in. In the mean time they are at the Copley-Plaza.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 8.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SCHOENBERG AND STRAVINSKY TO BE HEARD

Dr. Muck Announces Pieces by Them for the Symphony Concerts—Other Novelties in Prospect—"Lucia" and Joy at the Boston Theatre—Saint-Saens Falls Victim to a Prevalent Malady—More Support for the Century Company—Items and Opinions

Though Dr. Muck was as politely reticent and smilingly evasive as it is his habit to be to reporters, when he arrived in Boston yesterday, he let fall to their brethren on the pier in New York a single sentence that means much for the interest of the Symphony Concerts. He had ordered, he said, the scores and the parts of novel pieces by Volbach, Reger, Schönberg, Stravinsky and Ropartz and he intended to put them on his programmes in the course of the season. A piece by Reger new to Boston (which may be either the "Romantic" or the "Ballet" suite) is almost an annual event; and Volbach has long been an interesting but by no means an outstanding figure in the middle generation of German composers. In a sense Reger and Volbach, pleasurable as their music may prove to be, are neither here nor there. The important, the stimulating point in Dr. Muck's saying is that at last the music of Schönberg and Stravinsky is to have a place in the Symphony Concerts.

However their pieces may sound, however they may offend the sensibilities of many a listener, they deserve to be heard because they are the work of men of original imagination, individual method and innovating spirit, who are altering the face of music in our immediate time and may be opening new and lasting paths for it. However distasteful either Schönberg or Stravinsky may be to Dr. Muck personally, he was bound as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts to let his audiences hear their music and judge of it for themselves. Now with his habitual loyalty and his intrinsic "honneur d'artiste," he is ready to fulfil his obligation. For two years the musically curious and the musically openminded in this town have been pressing for the performance of one or another of Schönberg's and Stravinsky's pieces. A little belatedly, but still in time for rejoicing, their reward has come, even as a second harp was vouchsafed the other day to those that have long believed it a cardinal need of the orchestra. The only regret is that to Schönberg and Stravinsky Dr. Muck did not add the third innovator of the day, Scriabine. The compensation is Ropartz —the French composer of the school of Franck, but with an individuality, imagination and a procedure of his own, who has written a remarkable opera and notable symphonic pieces and who has been much too long overlooked in American concertrooms. After all, our good world of music "do move"—and forward. H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's New Pieces

From Symphony Hall this afternoon come other and interesting particulars of the novel pieces that Dr. Muck purposes to include in the Symphony Concerts—if only the publishers of the music can succeed in sending to Boston the scores and the parts that he long since ordered of them. From Schönberg he has chosen the "Five Little Pieces," with which conductors usually make their beginnings with the composer; from Stravinsky one or more of the suites arranged from his ballets and by all odds his most representative work; from Ropartz and from Volbach respectively a symphony. Furthermore, Dr. Muck purposes to make known for the first time in Boston, the prodigious sinfonietta of the youth, Korngold, and a symphonic poem after Ibsen's drama, "Brand," by the Norwegian composer, Sverdrup. And it is not unlikely that the scores and the parts of some of these pieces lie on the shelves of American publishers of music and communication is still open, if slow, with Paris, Berlin and Leipsig.

"Lucia" with Spirit

BOSTON TRAVELER.

OCTOBER 5.

SYMPHONY SEATS BRINGING RECORD PRICES AT AUCTION

All records for several years for bids on Symphony rehearsal season tickets were broken at the opening of the auction in Symphony Hall today, when a keen competition between two bidders resulted in the sale of three aisle seats in row "N" for $126 each. The bid was $108, to be added to the $18 ticket price. There was also a large bid in row "X," where four seats sold for $90 each.

The bidding started off slightly below normal, and below that of last year, but as the more choice seats in the centre of the house were reached the figures jumped into slightly better than normal.

Today was devoted to the sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold later. The auction sale will occupy four days of this week.

Dr. Karl Muck, thec onductor of the orchestra, is expected to reach New York tomorow on the Ryndam. With seven new members of the orchestra the two new first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernest Schmidt, who has been concertmaster of the Darmstadt orchestra, and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra os Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the ne wcellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack who does not return, was for a number of years the first cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Wietk trio in Berlin. The new second harpist is V. Klicka, the new clarinet who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who has been the past season the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London.

RECORD, MONDAY.

OCTOBER 5 1914

Average Prices Paid for Seats for Symphony

The opening of the auction sale of seats for the Symphony this morning brought out bidders, who paid about the same prices on premiums as on the opening sale of seats last year.

This morning the seats sold were the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. Bidding as usual was on the premiums to be added to the seat's face value of $18. The sharpest bidding was for aisle seats.

In the first row the highest price was $20 premium for a seat on the left aisle. In row B bids ranged from $12.50, in the center, to $27.50 for three seats on the left aisle.

In row C bids ranged from $20.50 up to $32.50, the latter being for two seats in the center, while four seats divided by the center aisle brought $31.50 each and two seats on the left aisle brought $31. In row D the highest price was $32.50 for a seat in the center, while a seat on the center aisle brought $31.50.

Up to the intermission for lunch all the seats up to row U, inclusive, had been sold, the highest price being $108 premium for three seats in row N, bordering on the right of the center aisle.

The next highest price was $72 for four seats in row K, divided by the center aisle. Last year $68 was the highest price paid in K, and a seat on the left center aisle last year went for $73.

In row G the highest price paid was $45 for two seats bordering th center aisle on the left.

Although the highest bid at the forenoon session was $108 premium against a high $73 last year, the average high price received for seats in other rows was slightly under the average high price received for the corresponding seats last year.

The management, based on today's bidding, estimates that total receipts will be within 5 p.c. of those last year.

RECORD, MONDAY.

OCTOBER 5 1914

NEW SYMPHONY MEN ARRIVE TOMORROW

Dr. Karl Muck, the Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is expected to reach New York Tuesday on the Ryndam. With him will come seven new members of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck and Mr. WiteLk, the concert-master, have spent much time, since the outbreak of the war, in securing these musicians. There are two first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp.

On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 6. 1914.

SYMPHONY SALE BEATS RECORDS

Premium of $112 Paid for A5—Three Seats Bring $108 Each Over Price.

Records extending over several years were broken yesterday when the auction of $18 seats for the coming Symphony season was held at Symphony Hall. The premiums offered for choice seats have seldom, if ever, been greater.

The record premium was $112, which was paid for seat A5 in the left balcony, constituting a total purchase price of $130. The next highest was $108 each for three seats on the aisle in row N, orchestra. With the $18 added, the purchaser paid $126 for each seat. A6 in the left balcony brought a premium of an even $100, and four seats in X in the orchestra brought $90 cash without the $18.

The bidding started off slightly below normal, and below that of last year, but as the more choice seats in the centre of the house were reached the figures jumped into slightly better than normal.

The day was devoted to the sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold later. The auction sale will occupy four days of this week.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the Rhyndam, with seven new members of the orchestra. There are two new first violins, a new viola, a new cello, a new clarinet, a new oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernest Schmidt, who has been concertmaster of the Darmstadt orchestra, and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Souvlet. Josef Malkin, the new cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, who does not return, was for a number of years the first cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussels quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin. The new second harpist is V.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 6.

PREMIUM OF $112 FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

Record for Rehearsals of the Orchestra.

General Average Reached at the Auction Below Last Year's.

A premium of $112, which was $39 more than the highest premium paid last year, marked the climax of the opening yesterday of the auction sale of the $18 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals. This price was brought by a seat in the front row of the balcony, on the left side of the hall, A5. The adjoining seat, A6, brought an even $100 premium, while the record high price paid last year was $73, by Clarence W. Barron.

Many regular Symphony patrons were on hand when the bidding opened in the morning, but in spite of the phenomenal prices quoted, the general average fell slightly below that of last Autumn. Premiums of $108 each were paid during the morning for three adjoining seats in row N on the floor, while one agent bought a block of seats in K center at a $72 premium.

Practically the lowest premium of the entire day came with the first sale of seats in row A, where $10.50, the opening premium, continued to be the average for the first row. No spirited bidding occurred until the seventh and eighth rows were reached, when pre- [illegible] to $25 or $27.

The [illegible] in many cases to the desire of old patrons to retain their seats of former years, was clearly illustrated by the seats directly back of $108 ones in N, sold at a premium of only $40. The seats in the balcony, where the day's record of $112 was reached, went at an average premium of from $35 to $40.

Today the sale of the $10 rehearsal seats will take place, including the last nine rows on the floor and the last five in the balcony. Thursday morning is set for the auction of the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

Manager Charles A. Ellis left last night for New York to meet Conductor Carl Muck and several of the band, who are expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam.

BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 6.

PRICE RECORDS GO AT SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS

Premiums of $112 and $100 Paid for Two Seats in Balcony.

PRICES BOOSTED BY THE BROKERS

Average of Prices Is Only Slightly Above That of Last Year.

Price records of years' standing went by the board yesterday at the annual auction sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With exceptions of remarkably high prices for several seats, however, the general average of the prices was only slightly in excess of that of last year.

The regular attendants of the auction were present in force. It was the spirited bidding of brokers and strangers that sent the price of some seats soaring. Premiums of $112 and $100 were paid for seats A5 and A6 in the front row of the left-hand balcony respectively. The bidders who paid the totals of $130 and $118, counting the regular charge of $18 for the locations, were brokers.

An unidentified purchaser, rumored to be a new arrival from the West, boosted the price of three seats, N 15, 16 and 17, on the right of the middle aisle, up to $108 each before he stifled competition. In both these actions, the bidding was fast and furious, jumping $1 a bid. Usually bids take only 50-cent jumps at a time.

Early in the sale a premium of $72 was reached for two seats opposite each other on the middle aisle in K. The highest bid last year exceeded this amount by only $1.

Muck Due in New York Today With New Players

Accompanied by seven newly-engaged artists to fill the places of musicians permanently marooned in Europe by the war, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of Symphony orchestra, is expected to reach New York today on the steamer Ryndam.

Since the outbreak of hostilities, Dr Muck and Anton Witek, concert master of the organization, traveled through most of Europe to secure the services of these seven musicians.

There are two first violinis, a viola, a 'cello, a clarinet, an oboe and a second harp. The first violins are Ernst Schmidt, who has been concert master of the Darmstadt orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city; and H. A. Sauvlet, who has been a first violin of the Residenz orchestra at The Hague. H. J. van Veen, the new violist, comes from the same orchestra as Mr. Sauvlet. Josef Malkin, the new 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Urack, is an artist of international reputation. He was for years the first 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, a member of the Brussells quartet, and was formerly with the Witek trio in Berlin.

The new second harpist is V. Klicka, a well known virtuoso. He had many engagements in Europe which, of course, were canceled by the war, and he was glad of an opportunity to come to Boston. The new clarinet, who takes the place of Mr. Grisez, is A. Sand, who the past season has been the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera. The new oboe, who takes the place of Mr. Fosse, is H. H. Stanislaus, who for several years has been the first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London.

Messrs. Sauvelt and van Veen are Dutch, Malkin and Sand are Russians, Klicka is Bohemian, Schmidt is German and Stanislaus is English. On the ship with Dr. Muck will also be Otto Roth, one of the first violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY. OCTOBER 8.

DR. MUCK BACK FOR SYMPHON SEASON WOR

His Efforts Secured Releas Young Germans for Return to Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Sy phony Orchestra, with Mrs. Muc reached Boston on the Knickerbock Limited last evening from New Yor where he had landed in the mornin Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Rotte dam on the steamer Ryndam Sunda Sept. 27. With him on the trip we several members of the Boston Sy phony Orchestra, including Mr. San the new first clarinet, and Messrs. Sau let and Otto Roth of the first violins

Dr. Muck came directly from Berl where he had spent the greater part the time since he left Bayreuth in t middle of August. Shortly before sai ing he went to his summer home i Doblebad, in southern Austria. Whe Germany ordered the mobilization of its army Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck was conducting the second performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. Up to the very beginning of the performance there was much doubt whether it could be given, but finally word came that none of the members of the orchestra need leave Bayreuth before the end of the performance. A good part of the orchestra was in the army within 24 hours.

Dr. Muck expressed himself as being unwilling to discuss the war. An intense patriot and an absolute believer in his country, he naturally feels very deeply on the subject. He is bitterly disappointed that he is unable to serve Germany in some capacity.

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty and were able to return to their work here in Boston. There were, however, several musicians whom he had engaged to fill vacancies in the orchestra who have been unable to come because of being in the army. These places have been filled satisfactorily and there will be no lessening of the artistic value of the orchestra. As no less than 14 different races are represented in the membership of the orchestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feeling aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this. The men for the most part have been in the orchestra a long time and they are personal friends, and it is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

Dr. Muck will make definite announcements regarding programs in a day or so. Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring. It will probably be a week or so before they get in. In the mean time they are at the Copley-Plaza.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 8.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SCHOENBERG AND STRAVINSKY TO BE HEARD

Dr. Muck Announces Pieces by Them for the Symphony Concerts—Other Novelties in Prospect—"Lucia" and Joy at the Boston Theatre—Saint-Saens Falls Victim to a Prevalent Malady—More Support for the Century Company—Items and Opinions

THOUGH Dr. Muck was as politely reticent and smilingly evasive as it is his habit to be to reporters, when he arrived in Boston yesterday, he let fall to their brethren on the pier in New York a single sentence that means much for the interest of the Symphony Concerts. He had ordered, he said, the scores and the parts of novel pieces by Volbach, Reger, Schönberg, Stravinsky and Ropartz and he intended to put them on his programmes in the course of the season. A piece by Reger new to Boston (which may be either the "Romantic" or the "Ballet" suite) is almost an annual event; and Volbach has long been an interesting but by no means an outstanding figure in the middle generation of German composers. In a sense Reger and Volbach, pleasurable as their music may prove to be, are neither here nor there. The important, the stimulating point in Dr. Muck's saying is that at last the music of Schönberg and Stravinsky is to have a place in the Symphony Concerts.

However their pieces may sound, however they may offend the sensibilities of many a listener, they deserve to be heard because they are the work of men of original imagination, individual method and innovating spirit, who are altering the face of music in our immediate time and may be opening new and lasting paths for it. However distasteful either Schönberg or Stravinsky may be to Dr. Muck personally, he was bound as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts to let his audiences hear their music and judge of it for themselves. Now with his habitual loyalty and his intrinsic "honneur d'artiste," he is ready to fulfil his obligation. For two years the musically curious and the musically openminded in this town have been pressing for the performance of one or another of Schönberg's and Stravinsky's pieces. A little belatedly, but still in time for rejoicing, their reward has come, even as a second harp was vouchsafed the other day to those that have long believed it a cardinal need of the orchestra. The only regret is that to Schönberg and Stravinsky Dr. Muck did not add the third innovator of the day, iabine. The compensation is Ropartz he French composer of the school of nck, but with an individuality, imagina-and a procedure of his own, who has ten a remarkable opera and notable phonic pieces and who has been much long overlooked in American concerts. After all, our good world of music nove"—and forward. H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Muck's New Pieces

ROM Symphony Hall this afternoon come other and interesting particulars of the novel pieces that Dr.
k purposes to include in the Sym-y Concerts—if only the publishers the music can succeed in sending oston the scores and the parts that ong since ordered of them. From berg he has chosen the "Five Little " with which conductors usually their beginnings with the composer; travinsky one or more of the rranged from his ballets and by his most representative work;
partz and from Volbach respect-symphony. Furthermore, Dr. poses to make known for the in Boston, the prodigious sin-the youth, Korngold, and a poem after Ibsen's drama,
the Norwegian composer, nd it is not unlikely that the he parts of some of these he shelves of American pub isic and communication is ow, with Paris, Berlin and with Spirit

BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 10.

ANTON WITEK
SYMPHONY SOLOIST

STARS COMING TO SUNDAY CONCERTS

Notable Engagements Made For Matinees at Symphony Hall.

Following the precedent of the last two winters, a series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given during the coming winter at Symphony Hall.

The first concert, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 1, will be given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist. The concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra has become an annual fixture in Boston and always brings out a large audience.

On the following Sunday, Nov. 8, the concert will be given by Mme. Olive Fremstad, late of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian barytone of that institution. Mme. Fremstad is devoting herself this year entirely to concert work, while Mr. Amato is having a series of concert appearances before the opening of the Metropolitan season.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 15, will bring a joint recital by Miss Julia Culp and Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The annual concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the orchestra will be given Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22. It is too far ahead to give any details regarding the program for this concert.

These Sunday concerts will continue well into the spring. Among the concerts which have been arranged are one by John McCormack, another by Harold Bauer, and Miss Maggie Teyte, the annual song recital of Mme. Schumann-Heink, one by Alma Gluck with an assisting artist, and a violin recital by Fritz Kreisler. Paderewski will appear on a Sunday afternoon, also Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, Frieda Hempel, Jacques Thibaud, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Mme. Marie Matzenauer, the mezzo-soprano, and Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, and Elena Gerhardt, while the Handel and Haydn Society will give its usual concerts.

This list will be added to as time goes on. It is hoped that arrangements can be made by which Mme. Sembrich, who is coming to America for a visit, may give one recital in Symphony Hall.

IRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

The thirty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The sale of seats, which has been in progress during the past week, is considered satisfactory in view of prevailing conditions. The orchestra is complete with the possible exception of one double-bass player, Mr. Agnesy, who has not arrived yet. The new members of the orchestra are here and the rehearsals begin Monday morning.

Dr. Muck, following the precedent established by him in past years, has not [illegible] afield for his first program. [illegible] symphony will be Beethoven's [illegible]. The other numbers will be [illegible] "Variations on a Theme by [illegible]," one of Richard Strauss' [illegible], "Don Juan," and Weber's [illegible]" overture.

ADVERTISER

OCTOBER 10

FINAL AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

The auction sale of Symphony tickets was brought to an end yesterday about half-past one, when the $10 seats were sold.

These included the last rows on the floor and in the first balcony, and the whole of the second balcony.

Prices ranged from a premium of $15 for the more desirable seats in the second balcony down to $3 and $4 for the less desirable seats under the balconies.

There are on hand at Symphony Hall a number of tickets both for the Friday rehearsals and the Saturday concerts, which were not taken. These are now on sale at the prices at which they were bid in.

Symphony Hall Concerts.

Following the precedent of the last two winters, a series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given during the coming winter at Symphony Hall.

The first concert, Nov. 1, will be given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist.

On Nov. 8, the concert will be given by Mme. Olive Fremstad and Pasquale Amato.

Nov. 15 will bring a joint recital by Miss Julia Culp and Mme. Olga Samaroff.

First Symphony Programme.

The 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Friday afternoon with the first public rehearsal. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica." The other numbers will be Brahms' "Variations" on a Theme" by Haydn, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

The annual concert for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the orchestra will be given Nov. 22.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 9,

First Symphony Program

At Symphony hall this morning the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were offered at auction to a good-sized assemblage of bidders. The demands for the tickets were said to be about as strong as usual, though premiums were perhaps a little lower.

All arrangements are now complete for the opening of the season. On Monday morning the players of the orchestra will assemble to begin rehearsals of the first program, which, as formerly, will include Beethoven's third or "Eroica" symphony. The other numbers to be presented at the first pair of concerts, which come Oct. 16 and 17, are: Variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss, and overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 9,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's First Programme—Mr. Ganz's Novel Pieces—"Il Trovatore" Lustily Sung—New Work for the People's Choral Union—Mating Mozart and Franck—Items and Opinions

HERE is the programme for the first pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. As Dr. Muck did two years ago, he will begin the season with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and for the first time since his return he will conduct in Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," that he led with masterful musical continuity, rhetorical force and delineative illusion at a concert for the Pension Fund last autumn. The list is:

Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn ("Choral St. Antoni")	Brahms
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss
Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"	Weber

As Mr. Ganz's habit is, novel pieces—this time by the interesting Korngold, the imaginative Blanchet and the pianist himself—stand on the programme of his recital in Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon. It goes:

Chaconne	Bach-Busoni
Sonata in D major	Haydn
Sonata in B minor	Chopin
In the Garden of the old Serail—Serenade in G flat	Blanchet
Etude-Caprice—The Pensive Spinner	Ganz
Elves' Dance	Korngold
Mignon's Song—Rakoczy March	Liszt

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 8,

HIGH SYMPHONY PREMIUM $50

Auction Sale of Saturday Night Concert Seats Tame as Compared to Last Year

A premium of $50 was the highest received this forenoon at the auction sale of the $18 seats at the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. This is in startling contrast to the bid of $139 a year ago, when three seats in row P went at that premium. Sittings in the same row today ranged from $8 for end places at the right to $42 for four, two each on opposite sides of the central aisle.

Bidding for the front rows began as low as $3.50 and the increases were by fifty cents. The highest price received for the first few rows was $22 and $21.50, with scarcely any bids between these and the next ones of $13.50, $11 and $10. It was in row H that the $50 premium was obtained for a single seat at the left of the centre aisle. Neighboring seats sold for $30, while a bid of $3 secured a pair in the same row. In row I $38 was bid for a pair of seats; the highest price received in J was $22, in K $21, in L $22, in M $27.50 and in N $30, which was paid on two occasions. In O the highest figures were $38.50 for four seats and $33.50 for one. In Q the figures ranged between $8 and $22, while slightly higher prices were obtained in R, where $25 and $24.50 were paid for single seats. From these prices there was a gradual recession during the remainder of the morning.

Tomorrow the $10 seats for Saturday nights will be auctioned.

During the sale today Dr. Muck, the conductor, looked into the hall, and friends who spied him gave him a cordial welcome. Another of the band who received an equally cordial greeting was Alvin Schroeder, the 'cellist.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 8, 1914

MUSIC NOTES

Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was at Symphony hall this morning arranging for his first rehearsal. Dr. Muck arrived in Boston Wednesday evening with Mrs. Muck and players in the orchestra who came from Europe to New York on the Ryndam.

Works new to the repertory of the orchestra which Dr. Muck said today he would put on the programs of the concerts this season are the following: Schoenberg, "Five Pieces for Orchestra"; Stravinsky, ballet music; Korngold, sinfonietta; Bollbach, symphony; Ropartz, symphony, and Schelderup, symphonic poem, "Brand." The time when certain of the scores and instrumental parts of these pieces reaches the Symphony librarian from the publishers is said to be uncertain. They will be produced one after another as they become available.

The sale of seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra opened this morning with brisk bidding. The $18 seats are auctioned today and the $10 seats tomorrow.

It was said that the premium bids figured out comparatively stronger than at the sale of public rehearsal tickets early in the week, although the rehearsal sale is always larger in totals as well as in special bids. Among the high offers today for floor seats near the middle and at the front of the house were the center aisle locations in row H, which brought $50 premium.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 9, 1914

SYMPHONY NOVELTIES

New Pieces by Schoenberg, "Musical Anarchist."

Ballet Music by the Young Russian, Stravinsky, Included.

Dr Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, remarked when he was seen in the library of Symphony Hall yesterday that it was a question of how many new works he could perform this season. There are plenty of works to be played, he said, but it remains to be seen whether the music, which he ordered in Germany last Summer, will be delivered. He announces, however, tentatively, a short list of very interesting novelties.

The first on the list is Five Pieces for Orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg. Schoenberg, the most talked about man in music today, is called the "anarchist of modern music." An early quartet of his was played here by the Flonzaley Quartet last Winter. These five pieces that Dr Muck announces are infinitely "more advanced" that the quartet and have stirred some audiences almost to riot.

Another, whose name will be seen on the program in Boston for the first time, is the Russian Stravinsky. He will be represented by some of the music he has written for the Russian Ballet. Eric Korngold, another name new to Boston Symphony programs, is the marvelous youth of Vienna still in his teens. An overture of his was played here last Winter by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Guy Ropartz, one of the younger school of French composers, has had music played here but during the Winter Dr Muck will play his Fourth Symphony. Another new work will be a symphony by Vollbach, who was one of the older and less known German composers.

Finally Dr Muck proposes to play the symphonic poem "Brand," by the Scandinavian composer, Schelderup. Schelderup has already been represented in Symphony programs with some small pieces, but this is the first work of large dimensions that will have been played here. The work is based on Ibsen's play of the same name.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE.

Final Sale of Seats for Saturday Evening Concerts to Begin This Morning at 10 O'Clock.

Two-thirds of the house for the 24 concerts which will be given this year by the Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction in Symphony Hall yesterday. These comprise the higher class seats on which the upset price was $18, and included all but the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. As has been the case for the past 20 years, the prices for these seats range considerably lower than those secured for the seats for the rehearsals. Last year there was the startling price of $139 premium bid for two seats on the center aisle. This price, however, was entirely abnormal, as such prices must always be.

Yesterday the highest premium secured was $50 for two center-aisle seats in the middle of the house. The general range of prices was about the same as last year, some parts of the house going a little higher, some parts of the house going a little less. The choicest seats on the middle of the floor brought premiums from $25 to $40, but the general average was nearer the former figure. A great many bargains were secured, some of the seats three-fourths of the way back going for $2 or $3 over the upset price.

There was the usual desire on the part of the public to secure seats on the sides of the balcony. The prices here ranged about the same as in the middle of the floor, although no single premium got as high as $50. The first row of the balcony averaged premiums of $20 to $30, and the third row on the sides a little higher. The center balcony brought about the usual prices.

The final sales of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $10 seats will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. The sale will be over probably about 1 o'clock.

EVENING RECORD

OCTOBER 8 1914

Symphony Novelties in Germany but Muck Thinks He Can Get Them

Dr. Karl Much of the Symphony announced today that in spite of the war he expected he would have some interesting orchestral novelties for the season. This announcement depends on the ability of Dr. Muck to get the music through from Europe, but he feels confident that he can.

The novelties include Five Pieces for Orchestra by the much discussed Schoenberg, some of whose ultra modern music "stunned" Boston last winter.

The youthful Korngold is represented by a Spinfonietta, Vollbach and Ropartz by symphonies, and Stravinsky, by some ballet music. A symphonic poem, "Brand," by Schelderup, is one of the interesting new works, and this Dr. Muck announced without qualification he will have. All the music is now in Germany.

BOSTON JOURNAL
OCTOBER 10.

ANTON WITEK
SYMPHONY SOLOIST

STARS COMING TO SUNDAY CONCERTS

Notable Engagements Made For Matinees at Symphony Hall.

Following the precedent of the last two winters, a series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given during the coming winter at Symphony Hall.

The first concert, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 1, will be given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist. The concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra has become an annual fixture in Boston and always brings out a large audience.

On the following Sunday, Nov. 8, the concert will be given by Mme. Olive Fremstad, late of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Pasquale Amato, he distinguished Italian barytone of hat institution. Mme. Fremstad is devoting herself this year entirely to concert work, while Mr. Amato is having a series of concert appearances before he opening of the Metropolitan season.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 15, will bring joint recital by Miss Julia Culp and Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The annual concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the orchestra will e given Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22. It s too far ahead to give any details egarding the program for this concert.

These Sunday concerts will continue ell into the spring. Among the concerts which have been arranged are ne by John McCormack, another by Harold Bauer, and Miss Maggie Teyte, the annual song recital of Mme. Schumann-Heink, one by Alma Gluck with n assisting artist, and a violin recital y Fritz Kreisler. Paderewski will appear on a Sunday afternoon, also Mme. lisabeth Van Endert, Frieda Hempel, acques Thibaud, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Mme. Marie Matzenauer, the ezzo-soprano, and Carl Flesch, the ungarian violinist, and Elena Gerrdt, while the Handel and Haydn Soety will give its usual concerts.

his list will be added to as time es on. It is hoped that arrangements n be made by which Mme. Sembrich, ho is coming to America for a visit, ay give one recital in Symphony Hall.

IRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

he thirty-fourth season of the Bos- n Symphony Orchestra will open with ncerts next Friday afternoon and Sat- day evening. The sale of seats, which s been in progress during the past ek, is considered satisfactory in view prevailing conditions. The orchestra complete with the possible exception one double-bass player, Mr. Agnesy, o has not arrived yet. The new mem- s of the orchestra are here and the earsals begin Monday morning.

r. Muck, following the precedent es- lished by him in past years, has not far afield for his first program. symphony will be Beethoven's oica." The other numbers will be ms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," one of Richard Strauss' poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's ryanthe" overture.

ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 10

FINAL AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

The auction sale of Symphony tickets was brought to an end yesterday about half-past one, when the $10 seats were sold.

These included the last rows on the floor and in the first balcony, and the whole of the second balcony.

Prices ranged from a premium of $15 for the more desirable seats in the second balcony, down to $3 and $4 for the less desirable seats under the balconies.

There are on hand at Symphony Hall a number of tickets both for the Friday rehearsals and the Saturday concerts, which were not taken. These are now on sale at the prices at wihch they were bid in.

Symphony Hall Concerts.

Following the precedent of the last two winters, a series of Sunday afternoon concerts will be given during the coming winter at Symphony Hall.

The first concert, Nov. 1, will be given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist.

On Nov. 8, the concert will be given by Mme. Olive Fremstad and Pasquale Amato.

Nov. 15 will bring a joint recital by Miss Julia Culp and Mme. Olga Samaroff.

First Symphony Programme.

The 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Friday afternoon with the first public rehearsal. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica." The other numbers will be Brahms' "Variations" on a Theme" by Haydn, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

The annual concert for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the orchestra will be given Nov. 22.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
OCTOBER 9,

First Symphony Program

At Symphony hall this morning the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were offered at auction to a good-sized assemblage of bidders. The demands for the tickets were said to be about as strong as usual, though premiums were perhaps a little lower.

All arrangements are now complete foı the opening of the season. On Monday morning the players of the orchestra will assemble to begin rehearsals of the first program, which, as formerly, will include Beethoven's third or "Eroica" symphony. The other numbers to be presented at the first pair of concerts, which come Oct. 16 and 17, are: Variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss, and overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 9,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's First Programme—Mr. Ganz's Novel Pieces—"Il Trovatore" Lustily Sung—New Work for the People's Choral Union—Mating Mozart and Franck—Items and Opinions

HERE is the programme for the first pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. As Dr. Muck did two years ago, he will begin the season with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and for the first time since his return he will conduct in Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," that he led with masterful musical continuity, rhetorical force and delineative illusion at a concert for the Pension Fund last autumn. The list is:

Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn ("Choral St. Antoni")	Brahms
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss
Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"	Weber

As Mr. Ganz's habit is, novel pieces—this time by the interesting Korngold, the imaginative Blanchet and the pianist himself—stand on the programme of his recital in Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon. It goes:

Chaconne	Bach-Busoni
Sonata in D major	Haydn
Sonata in B minor	Chopin
In the Garden of the old Serail—Serenade in G flat	Blanchet
Etude-Caprice—The Pensive Spinner	Ganz
Elves' Dance	Korngold
Mignon's Song—Rakoczy March	Liszt

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 8,

HIGH SYMPHONY PREMIUM $50

Auction Sale of Saturday Night Concert Seats Tame as Compared to Last Year

A premium of $50 was the highest received this forenoon at the auction sale of the $18 seats at the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. This is in startling contrast to the bid of $139 a year ago, when three seats in row P went at that premium. Sittings in the same row today ranged from $8 for end places at the right to $42 for four, two each on opposite sides of the central aisle.

Bidding for the front rows began as low as $3.50 and the increases were by fifty cents. The highest price received for the first few rows was $22 and $21.50, with scarcely any bids between these and the next ones of $13.50, $11 and $10. It was in row H that the $50 premium was obtained for a single seat at the left of the centre aisle. Neighboring seats sold for $30, while a bid of $3 secured a pair in the same row. In row I $38 was bid for a pair of seats; the highest price received in J was $22, in K $21, in L $22, in M $27.50 and in N $30, which was paid on two occasions. In O the highest figures were $38.50 for four seats and $33.50 for one. In Q the figures ranged between $8 and $22, while slightly higher prices were obtained in R, where $25 and $24..50 were paid for single seats. From these prices there was a gradual recession during the remainder of the morning.

Tomorrow the $10 seats for Saturday nights will be auctioned.

During the sale today Dr. Muck, the conductor, looked into the hall, and friends who spied him gave him a cordial welcome. Another of the band who received an equally cordial greeting was Alvin Schroeder, the 'cellist.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
OCTOBER 8, 1914

MUSIC NOTES

Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was at Symphony hall this morning arranging for his first rehearsal. Dr. Muck arrived in Boston Wednesday evening with Mrs. Muck and players in the orchestra who came from Europe to New York on the Ryndam.

Works new to the repertory of the orchestra which Dr. Muck said today he would put on the programs of the concerts this season are the following: Schoenberg, "Five Pieces for Orchestra"; Stravinsky, ballet music; Korngold, sinfonietta; Bollbach, symphony; Ropartz, symphony, and Schelderup, symphonic poem, "Brand." The time when certain of the scores and instrumental parts of these pieces reaches the Symphony librarian from the publishers is said to be uncertain. They will be produced one after another as they become available.

The sale of seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra opened this morning with brisk bidding. The $18 seats are auctioned today and the $10 seats tomorrow.

It was said that the premium bids figured out comparatively stronger than at the sale of public rehearsal tickets early in the week, although the rehearsal sale is always larger in totals as well as in special bids. Among the high offers today for floor seats near the middle and at the front of the house were the center aisle locations in row H, which brought $40 premium.

BOSTON GLOBE
OCTOBER 9, 1914.

SYMPHONY NOVELTIES

New Pieces by Schoenberg, "Musical Anarchist."

Ballet Music by the Young Russian, Stravinsky, Included.

Dr Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, remarked when he was seen in the library of Symphony Hall yesterday that it was a question of how many new works he could perform this season. There are plenty of works to be played, he said, but it remains to be seen whether the music, which he ordered in Germany last Summer, will be delivered. He announces, however, tentatively, a short list of very interesting novelties.

The first on the list is Five Pieces for Orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg. Schoenberg, the most talked about man in music today, is called the "anarchist of modern music." An early quartet of his was played here by the Flonzaley Quartet last Winter. These five pieces that Dr Muck announces are infinitely "more advanced" that the quartet and have stirred some audiences almost to riot.

Another, whose name will be seen on the program in Boston for the first time, is the Russian Stravinsky. He will be represented by some of the music he has written for the Russian Ballet. Eric Korngold, another name new to Boston Symphony programs, is the marvelous youth of Vienna still in his teens. An overture of his was played here last Winter by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Guy Ropartz, one of the younger school of French composers, has had music played here but during the Winter Dr Muck will play his Fourth Symphony. Another new work will be a symphony by Vollbach, who was one of the older and less known German composers.

Finally Dr Muck proposes to play the symphonic poem "Brand," by the Scandinavian composer, Schelderup. Schelderup has already been represented in Symphony programs with some small pieces, but this is the first work of large dimensions that will have been played here. The work is based on Ibsen's play of the same name.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE.

Final Sale of Seats for Saturday Evening Concerts to Begin This Morning at 10 O'Clock.

Two-thirds of the house for the 24 concerts which will be given this year by the Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction in Symphony Hall yesterday. These comprise the higher class seats on which the upset price was $18, and included all but the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. As has been the case for the past 20 years, the prices for these seats range considerably lower than those secured for the seats for the rehearsals. Last year there was the startling price of $139 premium bid for two seats on the center aisle. This price, however, was entirely abnormal, as such prices must always be.

Yesterday the highest premium secured was $50 for two center-aisle seats in the middle of the house. The general range of prices was about the same as last year, some parts of the house going a little higher, some parts of the house going a little less. The choicest seats on the middle of the floor brought premiums from $25 to $40, but the general average was nearer the former figure. A great many bargains were secured, some of the seats three-fourths of the way back going for $2 or $3 over the upset price.

There was the usual desire on the part of the public to secure seats on the sides of the balcony. The prices here ranged about the same as in the middle of the floor, although no single premium got as high as $50. The first row of the balcony averaged premiums of $20 to $30, and the third row on the sides a little higher. The center balcony brought about the usual prices.

The final sales of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $10 seats will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. The sale will be over probably about 1 o'clock.

EVENING RECORD
OCTOBER 8 1914

Symphony Novelties in Germany but Muck Thinks He Can Get Them

Dr. Karl Much of the Symphony announced today that in spite of the war he expected he would have some interesting orchestral novelties for the season. This announcement depends on the ability of Dr. Muck to get the music through from Europe, but he feels confident that he can.

The novelties include Five Pieces for Orchestra by the much discussed Schoenberg, some of whose ultra modern music "stunned" Boston last winter.

The youthful Korngold is represented by a Spinfonietta, Vollbach and Ropartz by symphonies, and Stravinsky, by some ballet music. A symphonic poem, "Brand," by Schelderup, is one of the interesting new works, and this Dr. Muck announced without qualification he will have. All the music is now in Germany.

[15]

JOURNAL

OCTOBER 9.

$50 PREMIUM FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Is Highest at Auction Sale for Saturday Night Concerts.

Two-thirds of the house for the twenty-four Saturday night concerts which will be given this year by the Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction yesterday. The highest premium secured was $50 for two center aisle seats in the middle of the house. The general range of prices was about the same as last year. The choicest seats on the middle of the floor brought premiums of from $25 to $40, but the general average was nearer the former figure. A great many bargains were secured, some of the seats three-fourths of the way back going for $2 or $3 over the upset price.

The final sales of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $10 seats will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

Dr. Muck has announced a short list of very interesting novelties. The first is "Five Pieces for the Orchestra," by Arnold Schoenberg, the "Anarchist of modern music." Another whose name will be seen on the program in Boston for the first time is the Russian composer, Stravinsky, who will be represented by some of the music he has written for the Russian ballet. Eric Korngold is another name new on Boston Symphony programs. Korngold is the marvelous youth of Vienna who, still in his teens, is writing remarkable music. Guy Ropartz, one of the younger school of French composers, will be repsented by his Fourth Symphony. Another new work will be a symphony by Vollbach, one of the older and less known German composers.

Finally, Dr. Muck proposes to play the symphonic poem, "Brand," by the Scandinavian composer, Schelderup. The work is based on Ibsen's play of the same name.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 9

SYMPHONY TICKETS BRING $50 PREMIUM

Average Prices Obtained at Auction Sale for 24 Concerts to Be Given This Year.

Two-thirds of the house for the 24 concerts which will be given this year by the Symphony Orchestra, were sold at auction in Symphony Hall yesterday.

These comprise the higher class seats on which the upset price was $18, and included all but the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

As has been the case for the past 20 years, the prices for these seats range considerably lower than those secured for the seats for the rehearsals. Last year there was the startling price of $139 premium bid for two seats on the centre aisle. This price, however, was entirely abnormal, as such prices must always be.

Yesterday the highest premium secured was $50 for two centre aisle seats in the middle of the house. The general range of prices was about the same as last year, some parts of the house going a little higher, some parts of the house going a little less.

The choicest seats on middle of the floor brought premiums from $25 to $40 but the general average was nearer the former figure. A great many bargains were obtained, some of the seats three-fourths of the way back going for two or three dollars over the upset price.

There was the usual desire on the part of the public to secure seats on the sides of the balcony. The prices here ranged about the same as in the middle of the floor, although no single premium got as high as $50. The first row of the balcony averaged premiums of $20 to $30, and the third row on the sides a little higher. The centre balcony brought about the usual prices.

The final sales of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $10 seats will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony and the entire second balcony. The sale will be over probably about 1 o'clock.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 9. 1914

$50 PREMIUM PAID FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Yesterday's Maximum Below That of 1913—Average About Same.

The maximum premium paid for seats at yesterday's sale of $18 seats for the 24 Symphony Hall concerts that comprise the program for this season was $50, which was offered for each of two chairs in the centre of the floor on the aisle. This figure was far below last year's record-breaking price of $129.

Two thirds of the seats in the hall were auctioned off yesterday, at prices that averaged about the same as a year ago, and that, as usual, fell considerably

The aisle seats in the balcony, and those in the front row, were in great demand, and brought almost as much as those in the middle part of the floor. The first row in the balcony averaged, in premiums, from $20 to $30, and those behind about the usual price.

The final sale of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning, when all but the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the balcony, and the entire second balcony will be disposed of.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 9,

PRICES STRONG AT SYMPHONY

Auction of $18 Seats Shows Good Premiums

The $18 seats for the 24 concerts which will be given this year by the Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction in Symphony Hall yesterday. The highest premium secured was $50 for two centre aisle seats in the middle of the house. The general range of prices was about the same as last year, some parts of the house going a little higher, some parts a little less.

The prices in the balcony ranged about the same as in the middle of the floor. The first row there averaged premiums of $20 to $30 and the third row on the sides a little higher. The centre balcony brought about the usual prices.

The final sales of seats for the concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $10 seats will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony and the entire second balcony. The sale will be over probably about 1 o'clock.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 8

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RETURNS TO BOSTON

DR. AND MRS. MUCK LAND IN NEW YORK FROM RYNDAM

Orchestra Leader Was in Bayreuth When Germany Ordered the Mobilization of Army in August.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Muck, reached Boston on the Knickerbocker Limited last evening from New York, where he had landed in the morning.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Rotterdam in the str. Ryndam Sunday, Sept. 27. With him on the ship were several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Mr. Sand, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, and Messrs. Sauvlet and Otto Roth of the first violins.

Dr. Muck came directly from Berlin, where he had spent the greater part of the time since he left Bayreuth in the middle of August. Shortly before sailing he went to his summer home in Doblebad, in Southern Austria.

Was in Bayreuth.

When Germany ordered the mobilization of its army, Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck was conducting the second performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. Up to the very beginning of the performance there was much doubt whether it could be given, but finally word came that none of the members of the orchestra need leave Bayreuth before the end of the performance. A good part of the orchestra was in the army within 24 hours.

Dr. Muck expressed himself as being unwilling to discuss the war now raging in Europe. An intense patriot and an absolute believer in his country, he naturally feels very deeply on the subject. He is bitterly disappointed that he is unable to serve Germany in some capacity.

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the Orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty and were able to return to their work here in Boston.

There were, however, several musicians whom he had engaged to fill vacancies in the orchestra who have been unable to come because of having been called to the army. These include, Dr. Muck said, a very remarkable trumpet player and an equally wonderful trombone player, as well as some violinists.

However, those places have been filled satisfactorily and there will be no lessening of the artistic value of the orchestra.

As no less than 14 different races are represented in the membership of the orchestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feelings aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this. The men for the most part have been in the orchestra a long time and they are personal friends and it is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

Dr. Muck is not yet quite ready to make definite announcements regarding his plans and the programmes. This will follow within a day or so.

Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring in a week or so. In the meantime they are stopping at the Copley-

Both Very Tired.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck were thoroughly tired out when they arrived in town last evening. The trip from Rotterdam was anything but restful. The ship was crowded to its utmost capacity, so that there were three sittings for every meal.

They did not, however, have the excitement of being held up by an English or French war ship in the Channel. The Ryndam had a wig-wagging conversation with an English ship the first day out from Rotterdam, but that was the only thing of the kind that happened.

On the same ship with them was Alfred Hertz, the German conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 7,

DR KARL MUCK BACK FROM BERLIN

Alleged Atrocities by German Troops Denied.

Baroness Elsie von Blomberg of Boston Returns on Same Steamer.

NEW YORK, Oct 7—Dr Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Mrs Muck and four members of the orchastra, arrived today on the Ryndham of the Holland-American Line from Rotterdam, after having been detained for a month in Berlin where h was compelled to perform clerical work in the War Office.

Vigorous denial was made by Dr Muck of the atrocities reported to have been committed by German troops. He asserted that the Belgians allowed the reports to be circulated with the view of diverting the sympathy of Americans and largely to cover up their own barbaric cruelty to wounded German soldiers.

"I know it to be a fact that evidence is no won hand in the German office to substantiate the acts of cruelty in the part of Belgum and I personally saw three wounded German officers," said Dr Muck," whose eyes were gorged out by Belgians while they lay helpless on the battlefields. These officers are now in Berlin and their sworn statements, together with the living evidence of their condition, will be forthcoming when the hostilities end.

"Soldiers have returned to Germany with their hands cut off, others with their ears missing an dstill others bearing marks of cruelty which only the savages of Darkest Africa, it wouldseem to an enlightened mind, would be heartless enough to commit—andthese were not received in battle, but at the hands of Belgians, while they were helpless to defend themselves, because of injuries received during operations recognized in modern and humane warfare."

Dr Muck was also accompanied by Otto Roth, Albert Sand, Hubert Schwedler Sauvelt and Henrik Van Veen, whose arrival in Boston will make the personnel of the Symphony Orchestra complete.

A number of compositions were brought back by Dr Muck which he believes will attract much attention in this country, among them being those of Volbach, Storavinsky, Ropartz, Schoenberg and Reger. They are new to this country, but have been heard in Europe.

Another passenger on the Ryndam was Baroness Elsie Von Blomberg of 116 Charles st, Boston. Her brother, Baron Von Blomberg, is a surgeon in the Imperial German Medical Corps, and is now at the front with the troops operating in France. The Baroness left at once for Boston, where she expects to remain until the hend of the war.

(New York Herald Service.)

BOSTON JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 8,

DR. MUCK HERE FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Conductor Is Accompanied From Germany by New Players.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Muck, reached Boston on the Knickerbocker Limited last evening from New York, where he landed in the morning. Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Rotterdam on the steamer Ryndham Sunday, Sept. 27. With them on the ship were several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Mr. Sand, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, and Messrs. Sauvlet and Otto Roth of the first violins.

When Germany ordered the mobilization of its army, Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck was conducting the second performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. Up to the very beginning of the performance there was much doubt whether it could be given, but finally word came that none of the members of the orchestra need leave Bayreuth before the end of the performance. A large part of the orchestra was in the army within twenty-four hours.

Dr. Muck was unwilling to discuss the war. He is bitterly disappointed that he is unable to serve Germany in some capacity.

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty and were able to return to their work here in Boston. As no less than fourteen different [illegible] are repre-chestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feelings aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this. The men for the most part have been in the orchestra a long time and are personal friends. It is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

Dr. Muck is not yet quite ready to make definite announcements regarding his plans and the programs. Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring. It will probably be a week or so before they get in. In the meantime they are at the Copley-Plaza.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck were thoroughly tired out when they arrived in town last evening. The trip from Rotterdam was anything but restful. On the same ship with them was Alfred Hertz, the German conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

OCTOBER 12,

URGES SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO BE STRICTLY NEUTRAL

Henry L. Higginson Talks to Men at Season's First Rehearsal.

The first rehearsal of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall this morning. The entire orchestra was present. After the orchestra had been assembled on the stage, Mr. Higginson spoke to them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, owing to so many of them belonging to the different countries that are at war, and urging them to ignore all things which might lead to friction in the ranks. He said in part:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

Under Difficult Circumstances.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I were equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Must Avoid Friction.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

At the end of his remarks he was warmly applauded by the musicians.

POST, THURSDAY,

OCTOB 1914

DR. MUCK OF SYMPHONY IN BOSTON

Conductor Denies Stories of Atrocities by Germans

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Muck, reached Boston on the Knickerbocker limited last evening from New York, where he had landed in the morning. Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Rotterdam in the steamer Ryndam on Sunday, Sept. 27.

With him on the ship were several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Albert Sand, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, and Messrs. Sauvlet and Otto Roth of the first violins.

BAYREUTH MEN IN ARMY

Dr. Muck came directly from Berlin, where he had spent the greater part of the time since he left Bayreuth, in the middle of August. Shortly before sailing he went to his summer home in Doblebad, in southern Austria. When Germany ordered the mobilization of its army, Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck was conducting the second performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth.

Up to the very beginning of the performance there was much doubt whether it could be given, but finally word came that none of the members of the orchestra need leave Bayreuth before the end of the performance. A good part of the orchestra was in the army within 24 hours.

Denies Atrocities by Germans

Vigorous denial was made by Dr. Muck of the atrocities reported to have been committed by German troops. He asserted that the Belgians allowed the reports to be circulated with the view of diverting the sympathy of Americans and largely to cover up their own barbaric cruelty to wounded German soldiers.

"I know it to be a fact that evidence is now on hand in the German office to substantiate the acts of cruelty on the part of Belgium, and I personally saw three wounded German officers," said Dr. Muck, "whose eyes were gouged out by Belgians while they lay helpless on the battlefields. These officers are now in Berlin and their sworn statements, together with the living evidence of their condition, will be forthcoming when the hostilities end.

"Soldiers have returned to Germany with their hands cut off, others with their ears missing and still others bearing marks of cruelty, which only the savages of Darkest Africa, it would seem to an enlightened mind, would be heartless enough to commit—and these were not received in battle, but at the hands of Belgians, while they were helpless to defend themselves, because of injuries received during operations recognized in modern and humane warfare."

Vacancies All Filled

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty, and were able to return to their work here in Boston. There were, however, several musicians whom he had engaged to fill vacancies in the orchestra who have been unable to come because of having been called to the army. "These include," Dr. Muck said, "a very remarkable trumpet player and an equally wonderful trombone player, as well as some violinists. However, these places have been filled satisfactorily, and there will be no lessening of the artistic value of the orchestra." As no less than 14 different races are represented in the membership of the orchestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feelings aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this.

The men, for the most part, have been in the orchestra a long time, and they are personal friends, and it is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

At the Copley-Plaza

Dr. Muck is not yet quite ready to make definite announcements regarding his plans and the programmes. This will follow within a day or so. Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring. It will probably be a week or so before they get in. In the meantime they are stopping at the Copley-Plaza.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck were thoroughly tired out when they arrived in town last evening. The trip from Rotterdam was anything but restful. The ship was crowded to its utmost capacity so that there were three sittings for each meal. They did not, however, [illegible] the excitement of being held [illegible] in the channel. The Ryndam [illegible] wig-wagging conversation with [illegible] lish ship the first day out from Rotterdam, but that was the only thing of the kind that happened. On the same ship with them was Alfred Hertz, the German conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Brings Back Novelties

A number of compositions were brought back by Dr. Muck which he believes will attract much attention in this country, among them being those of Volbach, Stravinsky, Ropartz, Schoenberg and Reger. They are new to this country, but have been heard in Europe.

Another passenger on the Ryndam was Baroness Elsie Von Blomberg of 116 Charles street. Her brother, Baron Von Bloomberg, is a surgeon in the Imperial German Medical Corps, and is now at the front with the troops operating in France. The baroness expects to remain in Boston until the end of the war.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

Since the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers there hasn't been just such a crowd of Indians, on the beach, or American natives, at least, as were waiting at the dock for to-day's latest European arrival. Due in New York by the liner Ryndam, on which he had somehow contrived to elude the vigilance of hostile navies sweeping his compatriots from the sea, the Kaiser's own conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was returning on his annual leave of absence from Berlin for another winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A rumor came across that he might "have something to say." Now, according to all critics, that is precisely what present day musicians have not. Only war makes this an exceptional year. Dr. Muck, moreover, is an ardent patriot, and he was reported to be "red hot."

With the secret zeal and silent unanimity of a holy cause, the management of the Boston Orchestra set out to prevent any pro-German utterances. Charles A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and W. E. Walter, the entire managerial staff, boarded successive sections of the Merchants' Limited for New York.

Once they had him safe ashore, it was darkly but significantly hinted 'twould be three to one that there'd be no "interview" for publication.

They didn't propose to have Muck raked over the coals for an indiscretion in print. There remained but one possible complication. Dr. Muck in his letters had expressed a wish. He proposed giving his first Boston concert for the benefit of the German Red Cross. Major Higginson, the orchestra's generous founder, it was understood, might agree to that, provided—and there's the rub—that his German conductor would also consent to lead another similar benefit for England, Belgium and France.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 3 - 1914

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is reported the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the end of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4

News and Notes

With the arrival of Doctor Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already thoroughly assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription, which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the end of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left. The seats which have not already been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe piano rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 4 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to reach America this week and the work of the orchestra begins next week. It is announced the orchestra will carry out its complete schedule of the season except the preliminary western trip, which it was to have taken in the first fortnight of October. Owing to the congestion of European travel, it was impossible for all the members of the orchestra who were abroad to get back in time for this, but with Dr. Muck's arrival the orchestra will be complete and the personnel intact.

The five concerts here this year will be given Monday afternoons, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

SEATS AT $108 PREMIUM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Record Is Broken in Auction for Orchestra Rehearsals.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—All records were broken to-day when seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals sold for $108 premium at the annual auction of the $18 seats. The bidder selected three in the N row at that price, made his deposit at the desk and refused to give his name. The next highest bid was $72.

The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation, for two or three rows. There was no spirited bidding until the seventh or eighth rows were reached, and though the premiums began to improve they were lower, row by row, than the prices of last year.

Charles Ellis, manager of the orchestra, went to New York to meet Carl Muck, conductor, who is expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam. Others expected on the same boat are Miss Irene Seyden, violinist, and Otto Roth, many years one of the first violinists of the Symphony Orchestra.

From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date OCT 2 1914

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe the middle of next week it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The Baltimore season is already of assured success.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 -

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Karl Muck from Europe this week it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years. The seats which have not been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe piano rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

* * *

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 5 1914

MUSICAL OVERTURES TO A BUSY SEASON

Boston Symphony to Begin Season on Date Originally Planned.

PROGRAMMES ARE ANNOUNCED

For Young People's Concerts—Fremstad to Aid Adelphi Endowment Fund.

The musical public of Brooklyn is to be congratulated in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beginning its regular season on the date originally planned, and with its personnel practically intact. The five concerts which the orchestra gives in Brooklyn each year have become, in a sense, the center about which revolves the musical life of Brooklyn. The only difficulty now is that the Academy of Music cannot hold all those who wish to attend the concerts.

The late Professor Hooper tried to induce the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a second series of concerts in Brooklyn, each season, and, while the management was more than willing to undertake such a series, unfortunately it was unable to comply with the urgent request. The subscription for the coming season is like that of a year ago—everything sold.

Dr. Muck is due to arrive in New York from Europe this week, and with his arrival the ranks of the orchestra will be complete. The first rehearsal has been called for Monday, October 12, and the season of the orchestra is to begin in Boston on October 16

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sale of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final, definite announcement regarding his plans. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already thoroughly assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the send of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left. The seats which have not already been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe Piano Rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 4 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIVE CONCERTS

Personnel of the Famous Orchestra Intact—Dr. Muck to Lead Here.

The prospects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington have never been brighter than they are this year. The five concerts this famous institution gives in the city has long since become not only an artistic but a social necessity of a Washington season. At Boston Symphony concerts one [illegible] "every one who is any one" in Washington's social, political, and artistic life.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is reaching America this week and the work of the orchestra begins next week. It will carry out its complete schedule of the season excepting the preliminary Western trip which was to have taken in the first fortnight of October. Owing to the congestion of European travel, it was impossible for all the members of the orchestra who were abroad to get back in time for this, but with Dr. Muck

POST, THURSDAY,

OCTOB 1914

DR. MUCK OF SYMPHONY IN BOSTON

Conductor Denies Stories of Atrocities by Germans

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Muck, reached Boston on the Knickerbocker limited last evening from New York, where he had landed in the morning. Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Rotterdam in the steamer Ryndam on Sunday, Sept. 27.

With him on the ship were several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Albert Sand, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, and Messrs. Sauvlet and Otto Roth of the first violins.

BAYREUTH MEN IN ARMY

Dr. Muck came directly from Berlin, where he had spent the greater part of the time since he left Bayreuth, in the middle of August. Shortly before sailing he went to his summer home in Doblebad, in southern Austria. When Germany ordered the mobilization of its army, Saturday, Aug. 1, Dr. Muck was conducting the second performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth.

Up to the very beginning of the performance there was much doubt whether it could be given, but finally word came that none of the members of the orchestra need leave Bayreuth before the end of the performance. A good part of the orchestra was in the army within 24 hours.

Denies Atrocities by Germans

Vigorous denial was made by Dr. Muck of the atrocities reported to have been committed by German troops. He asserted that the Belgians allowed the reports to be circulated with the view of diverting the sympathy of Americans and largely to cover up their own barbaric cruelty to wounded German soldiers.

"I know it to be a fact that evidence is now on hand in the German office to substantiate the acts of cruelty on the part of Belgium, and I personally saw three wounded German officers," said Dr. Muck, "whose eyes were gouged out by Belgians while they lay helpless on the battlefields. These officers are now in Berlin and their sworn statements, together with the living evidence of their condition, will be forthcoming when the hostilities end.

"Soldiers have returned to Germany with their hands cut off, others with their ears missing and still others bearing marks of cruelty, which only the savages of Darkest Africa, it would seem to an enlightened mind, would be heartless enough to commit—and these were not received in battle, but at the hands of Belgians, while they were helpless to defend themselves, because of injuries received during operations recognized in modern and humane warfare."

Vacancies All Filled

It was through Dr. Muck's efforts that nearly all of the younger Germans in the orchestra who were in Germany last summer were released from their military duty, and were able to return to their work here in Boston. There were, however, several musicians whom he had engaged to fill vacancies in the orchestra who have been unable to come because of having been called to the army. "These include," Dr. Muck said, "a very remarkable trumpet player and an equally wonderful trombone player, as well as some violinists. However, these places have been filled satisfactorily, and there will be no lessening of the artistic value of the orchestra." As no less than 14 different races are represented in the membership of the orchestra, the question has arisen whether the natural feelings aroused by the war might not cause some trouble, but Dr. Muck has no fear of this. The men, for the most part, have been in the orchestra a long time, and they are personal friends, and it is already understood that the war will not be discussed among them.

At the Copley-Plaza

Dr. Muck is not yet quite ready to make definite announcements regarding his plans and the programmes. This will follow within a day or so. Mrs. Muck is looking forward with keen expectations of pleasure to settling in the house in the Fenway which they bought last spring. It will probably be a week or so before they get in. In the meantime they are stopping at the Copley-Plaza.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck were thoroughly tired out when they arrived in town last evening. The trip from Rotterdam was anything but restful. The ship was crowded to its utmost capacity so that there were three sittings for every meal. They did not, however, have the excitement of being held [illegible] an English or French warship in the channel. The Ryndam [illegible] a wig-wagging conversation with an English ship the first day out from Rotterdam, but that was the only thing of the kind that happened. On the same ship with them was Alfred Hertz, the German conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Brings Back Novelties

A number of compositions were brought back by Dr. Muck which he believes will attract much attention in this country, among them being those of Volbach, Stravinsky, Ropartz, Schoenberg and Reger. They are new to this country, but have been heard in Europe.

Another passenger on the Ryndam was Baroness Elsie Von Blomberg of 116 Charles street. Her brother, Baron Von Bloomberg, is a surgeon in the Imperial German Medical Corps, and is now at the front with the troops operating in France. The baroness expects to remain in Boston until the end of the war.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York

Date

Since the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers there hasn't been just such a crowd of Indians, on the beach, or American natives, at least, as were waiting at the dock for to-day's latest European arrival. Due in New York by the liner Ryndam, on which he had somehow contrived to elude the vigilance of hostile navies sweeping his compatriots from the sea, the Kaiser's own conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was returning on his annual leave of absence from Berlin for another winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A rumor came across that he might "have something to say." Now, according to all critics, that is precisely what present day musicians have not. Only war makes this an exceptional year. Dr. Muck, moreover, is an ardent patriot, and he was reported to be "red hot."

With the secret zeal and silent unanimity of a holy cause, the management of the Boston Orchestra set out to prevent any pro-German utterances. Charles A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and W. E. Walter, the entire managerial staff, boarded successive sections of the Merchants' Limited for New York.

Once they had him safe ashore, it was darkly but significantly hinted 'twould be three to one that there'd be no "interview" for publication.

They didn't propose to have Muck raked over the coals for an indiscretion in print. There remained but one possible complication. Dr. Muck in his letters had expressed a wish. He proposed giving his first Boston concert for the benefit of the German Red Cross. Major Higginson, the orchestra's generous founder, it was understood, might agree to that, provided—and there's the rub—that his German conductor would also consent to lead another similar benefit for England, Belgium and France.

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 3 - 1914

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is reported the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the end of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT

News and Notes

With the arrival of Doctor Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already thoroughly assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription, which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the end of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left. The seats which have not already been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe piano rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

From EVENING STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 4 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to reach America this week and the work of the orchestra begins next week. It is announced the orchestra will carry out its complete schedule of the season except the preliminary western trip, which it was to have taken in the first fortnight of October. Owing to the congestion of European travel, it was impossible for all the members of the orchestra who were abroad to get back in time for this, but with Dr. Muck's arrival the orchestra will be complete and the personnel intact.

The five concerts here this year will be given Monday afternoons, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From PRESS

Address: New York City

Date

SEATS AT $108 PREMIUM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Record Is Broken in Auction for Orchestra Rehearsals.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—All records were broken to-day when seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals sold for $108 premium at the annual auction of the $18 seats. The bidder selected three in the N row at that price, made his deposit at the desk and refused to give his name. The next highest bid was $72.

The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation, for two or three rows. There was no spirited bidding until the seventh or eighth rows were reached, and though the premiums began to improve they were lower, row by row, than the prices of last year.

Charles Ellis, manager of the orchestra, went to New York to meet Carl Muck, conductor, who is expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam. Others expected on the same boat are Miss Irene Selden, violinist, and Otto Roth, many years one of the first violinists of th Symphony Orchestra.

From NEWS

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Date OCT

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe the middle of next week it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The Baltimore season is already of assured success.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 4 -

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Karl Muck from Europe this week it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years. The seats which have not been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe piano rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

* * *

From aily Eagle, Brooklyn, N.

Address

Date OCT 5 1914

MUSICAL OVERTURES TO A BUSY SEASON

Boston Symphony to Begin Season on Date Originally Planned.

PROGRAMMES ARE ANNOUNCED

For Young People's Concerts—Fremstad to Aid Adelphi Endowment Fund.

The musical public of Brooklyn is to be congratulated in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beginning its regular season on the date originally planned, and with its personnel practically intact. The five concerts which the orchestra gives in Brooklyn each year have become, in a sense, the center about which revolves the musical life of Brooklyn. The only difficulty now is that the Academy of Music cannot hold all those who wish to attend the concerts.

The late Professor Hooper tried to induce the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a second series of concerts in Brooklyn, each season, and, while the management was more than willing to undertake such a series, unfortunately it was unable to comply with the urgent request. The subscription for the coming season is like that of a year ago—everything sold.

Dr. Muck is due to arrive in New York from Europe this week, and with his arrival the ranks of the orchestra will be complete. The first rehearsal has been called for Monday, October 12, and the season of the orchestra is to begin in Boston on October 1

UIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 4 - 19

Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sale of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final, definite announcement regarding his plans. The success of the five concerts the orchestra will give in Philadelphia is already thoroughly assured. They will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

The preliminary subscription which, of course, includes the renewals of subscribers of a year ago, is the largest the orchestra has had in many years, and at the send of the season's sale the prospects are that there will be very few seats left. The seats which have not already been subscribed will go on sale for the season at Miss Harris' ticket office in the Heppe Piano Rooms, Monday morning, October 12.

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 4 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIVE CONCERTS

Personnel of the Famous Orchestra Intact—Dr. Muck to Lead Here.

The prospects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington have never been brighter than they are this year. The five concerts this famous institution gives in the city have long since become not only an artistic but a social necessity of a Washington season. At the Boston Symphony concerts one "every one who is any one" in Washington's social, political, and arti life.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the chestra, is reaching America this we and the work of the orchestra beg next week. It will carry out its com plete schedule of the season exceptin the preliminary Western trip, which was to have taken in the first fortnig of October. Owing to the congesti of European travel, it was impos for all the members of the orche who were abroad to get back in ti for this, but with Dr. Muck's arr the orchestra will be complete and personnel intact.

The five concerts this year wi given as usual on Monday aftern the dates being November 3, Dec 1, January 5, February 16, and Ma

RECORD, MONDAY, OCTOBER 12

Higginson Urges Neutrality And Harmony in Little Talk With Symphony Men

Maj. Henry L. Higginson gave the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little neutrality talk when they assembled for their first rehearsal this morning.

Owing to the fact that the members belong to many countries it was thought wise to have a little heart-to-heart talk with the men and to ask them to do or say nothing that would put the orchestra, the pride and joy of musical Boston, in a false light.

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra," said Maj. Higginson.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art, and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it, and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

The Little Musical Joke.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I were equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

Need for the Concerts.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

At the end of his remarks he was warmly applauded by the musicians.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 12,

In a little speech to the members of the Symphony Orchestra, which reassembled this morning for the season, Mr. Higginson not only suited his counsels to the times, but addressed them also, as it seemed, to a larger audience that includes the public as well as the players of Symphony Hall. To the players, who are of fourteen nationalities, he gave homely counsels of forbearance and self-restraint in their intercourse one with another, whatever stress of feeling might prompt them to harsh words. There is no reason to doubt that the advice will be heeded. Temperament or no temperament, musicians who must work together seven months prefer a quiet life, and, again, like the rest of us, they have their livings to make at a time when opportunities in their profession are few. Mr. Higginson spoke to the men also of the long and great achievement and prestige of the orchestra, of the loyalties that it has kindled and maintained, and of the difficulties overcome that it might continue its work this year under conditions that are not likely to beset it again. Consciously or unconsciously in these sayings, he was speaking also to the public of the Symphony Concerts. Like the players, and for similar reasons and in similar ways, it also has its obligations to fulfil toward them.

BOSTON AMERICAN

OCTOBER 13, 1914.

ASK SYMPHONY MUSICIANS TO AVOID WAR TALK

Major Henry L. Higginson addressing the members of the Symphony Orchestra assembling for their first rehearsal of the season, made a striking plea for harmony among the musicians who are of many nationalities. He said he expected harmony in their relations with one another, and asked them not to say or do anything regarding the war which would result in friction. He said:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greetings and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra. Nearly sixty years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For thirty-four years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestha has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence, I care very much for the orchestra.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

---

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again; for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I were equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts. The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best, and under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction.

"You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live. You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 13, 1914.

It was an excellent presentation of the duties of neutrality which Mr. Henry Lee Higginson made in his address to the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday. He showed that the difficulties which surround that important musical undertaking this year will be greatly lessened if the public, or at least that part of it which is interested in the orchestra and has friends in it, will refrain from the sort of comment on the war which threatens to arouse the hostilities of the musicians.

BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 13,

URGES HARMONY ON SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Higginson Talks Neutrality at First Orchestra Rehearsal.

The first rehearsal of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The entire orchestra was present. After the orchestra had been assembled on the stage Mr. Higginson made a few remarks to them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, owing to so many of them belonging to the different countries that are at war, and urging them to ignore all things which might lead to friction in the ranks. He spoke as follows:

"Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"Gentlemen—It is pleasant to see you all and I offer you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly sixty years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art, and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For thirty-four years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

Expects Only Harmony

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony, above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I were equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

Wants Concerts to Go On

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them, and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name, and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

At the end of his remarks he was warmly applauded by the musicians.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 14, 1914

WISE ADVICE

The advice given in a heart-to-heart talk to the Symphony players by Major Higginson the other day as to the vital necessity of keeping racial controversies out of their work was characteristically shrewd, wise and kindly. If the men follow it, they will find that in the long run the benefits of a continuing orchestra will far overweigh the fleeting joys of heated war argument.

Major Higginson's nuggets of common-sense could be noted with advan-men here in this neutral country wherever are gathered those of differing national antecedents.

---

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 13 1914

HIGGINSON MAKES NEUTRALITY PLEA

SYMPHONY MUSICIANS IN FIRST REHEARSAL

Members From Many Different Countries Urged to Harmony in War Talk.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson gave the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little neutrality talk when they assembled for their first rehearsal yesterday.

Owing to the fact that the members belong to many countries it was thought wise to have a little heart-to-heart talk with the men and to ask them to do or say nothing that would put the orchestra, the pride and joy of musical Boston, in a false light.

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra," said Maj. Higginson.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art, and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it, and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

The Little Musical Joke.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I were equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

Need for the Concerts.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

At the end of his remarks he was warmly applauded by the musicians.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 11 1914

* * *

Only two members of last year's personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be absent this year because of the war when Dr. Carl Muck calls his forces together for their first rehearsal. The German conductor arrived from Europe last Wednesday, accompanied by several belated members of the orchestra, and he reported that the only artists of the ensemble who are detained abroad for military service are Mr. Grisez, first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, third oboe player, both now serving in the French army. Dr. Muck has filled their places, engaging a Russian clarinetist named A. Sand, and an oboe player, H. H. Stanislaus, the latter from the London Queen's Hall Orchestra.

Some other changes in the make up of the orchestra include the engagement of a new 'cellist, Josef Malkin, who will take the place of Mr. Urack, the latter artist having decided not to return to this country. A new assistant conductor has been engaged, Ernst Schmidt, and a second harpist, V. Klicka, will also join the Symphony forces.

rk, 1884

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 11, 1914

st Symphony This Week

er Notes of Interest—The Conducting of Donizetti—Modern Music and the Younger Generation—Concerts to Come

Muck has brought with him from six important novelties. The of Stravinsky and Schonenberg luded in the list, which, in full, llows: Five pieces for orchestra, Schonenberg; ballet music, Igor sky; Sinfonietta, Erich Korn- symphony, Fritz Goldbach; Symphony, Guy Ropartz; sym- poem, "Brand," after Ibsen, Ar- heldrup. The two latter works the library of the Boston Sym- Orchestra. The other works or- from Germany last spring, and t whereabouts have yet to be as- ned.

th season of the Boston Sym- chestra will open next Friday with the first public rehearsal ing at 2:30, which will be fol- by the first concert on next day evening, Oct. 17, at 8 o'clock. ale of seats, which has been in ss at Symphony Hall during the week, must be considered satisfac- in view of prevailing conditions. rchestra is complete with the pos- exception of one double bass Mr. Agnesy, who has not yet, but it is hoped that he will this week. The new mem- f the orchestra are here and the rsals begin tomorrow (Monday) ng.

Muck, following the precedent ished by him in past years, has one far afield for his first pro- me. The Symphony will be oven's "Eroica." The other num- will be Brahms' "Variations of a s" by Josef Haydn, Richard s's Tone Poem "Don Juan," and 's Overture, "Euryantha."

---

misconducting of Mr. Castillo "Lucia di Lammermoor" was an otherwise creditable perform- at the Boston Theatre last week hes a text for a word about the er in which Donizetti may be ated by those who are either in- le to the beauties of his style or pose to ignore such matters, perhaps, that the "thinness" onventionality of the scoring do stify the attention of a modern ctor. There is even a saying that era by Donizetti should be able without a conductor. It might, certain Italian orchestras. Under ry circumstances, however, the ctor can make just as much ence in the impression of a work onizetti by his treatment of the as he can in an opera by Puccini unod—another sufferer from com- ncy and routine.

s now the fashion to talk glibly the latter Verdi, the "realist" of Italian opera, the orchestra- f Strauss, the "curve" of Puc- melody and Puccini's extraordin- chnique of the theatre, etc. Un- ately, in these days of dilettant- necessary justness of perspec- as temporarily disappeared. You t, with artistic honor and in jus- o his cause, neglect Donizetti's any more than you can Puccini's. melody of Donizetti has also its e" and its individual characteris- In his day orchestration was far from the art that it is now. But when it was composed neither the music nor the orchestration of "Lucia" was conventional, and when an opera holds the stage for a century it is very certain that underneath idioms which are of a bygone day there is a spirit that can appeal to many successive generations. There are passages in "Lucia di Lammermoor" that must have set Donizetti as far apart from his contemporaries as Puccini is from Leoncavallo, or farther. The melodic curve of the earlier composer is always refined. There is an aristocratic grace in his melody and his manner. He could not write in an awkward or brutal vein. Similarly with his orchestra. The orchestration of Rossini was frequently more modern, and also, and very frequently, more coarse and noisy. In "Lucia di Lammermoor" there are charming bits of instrumental coloring, which have, at the least, an old-fashioned charm that captivates the ear. And always there is style. For these reasons, few things are more disturbing that to hear Donizetti maltreated by conductors who neither understand him nor, apparently, think it worth their while to make any effort to do so.

Mr. Max Zach, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, is in town about his old haunts, and his experiences as a conductor in the middle West and also in the South, which he has toured, are more than ordinarily illuminative of the attitude of the public toward new music and its adequate performance.

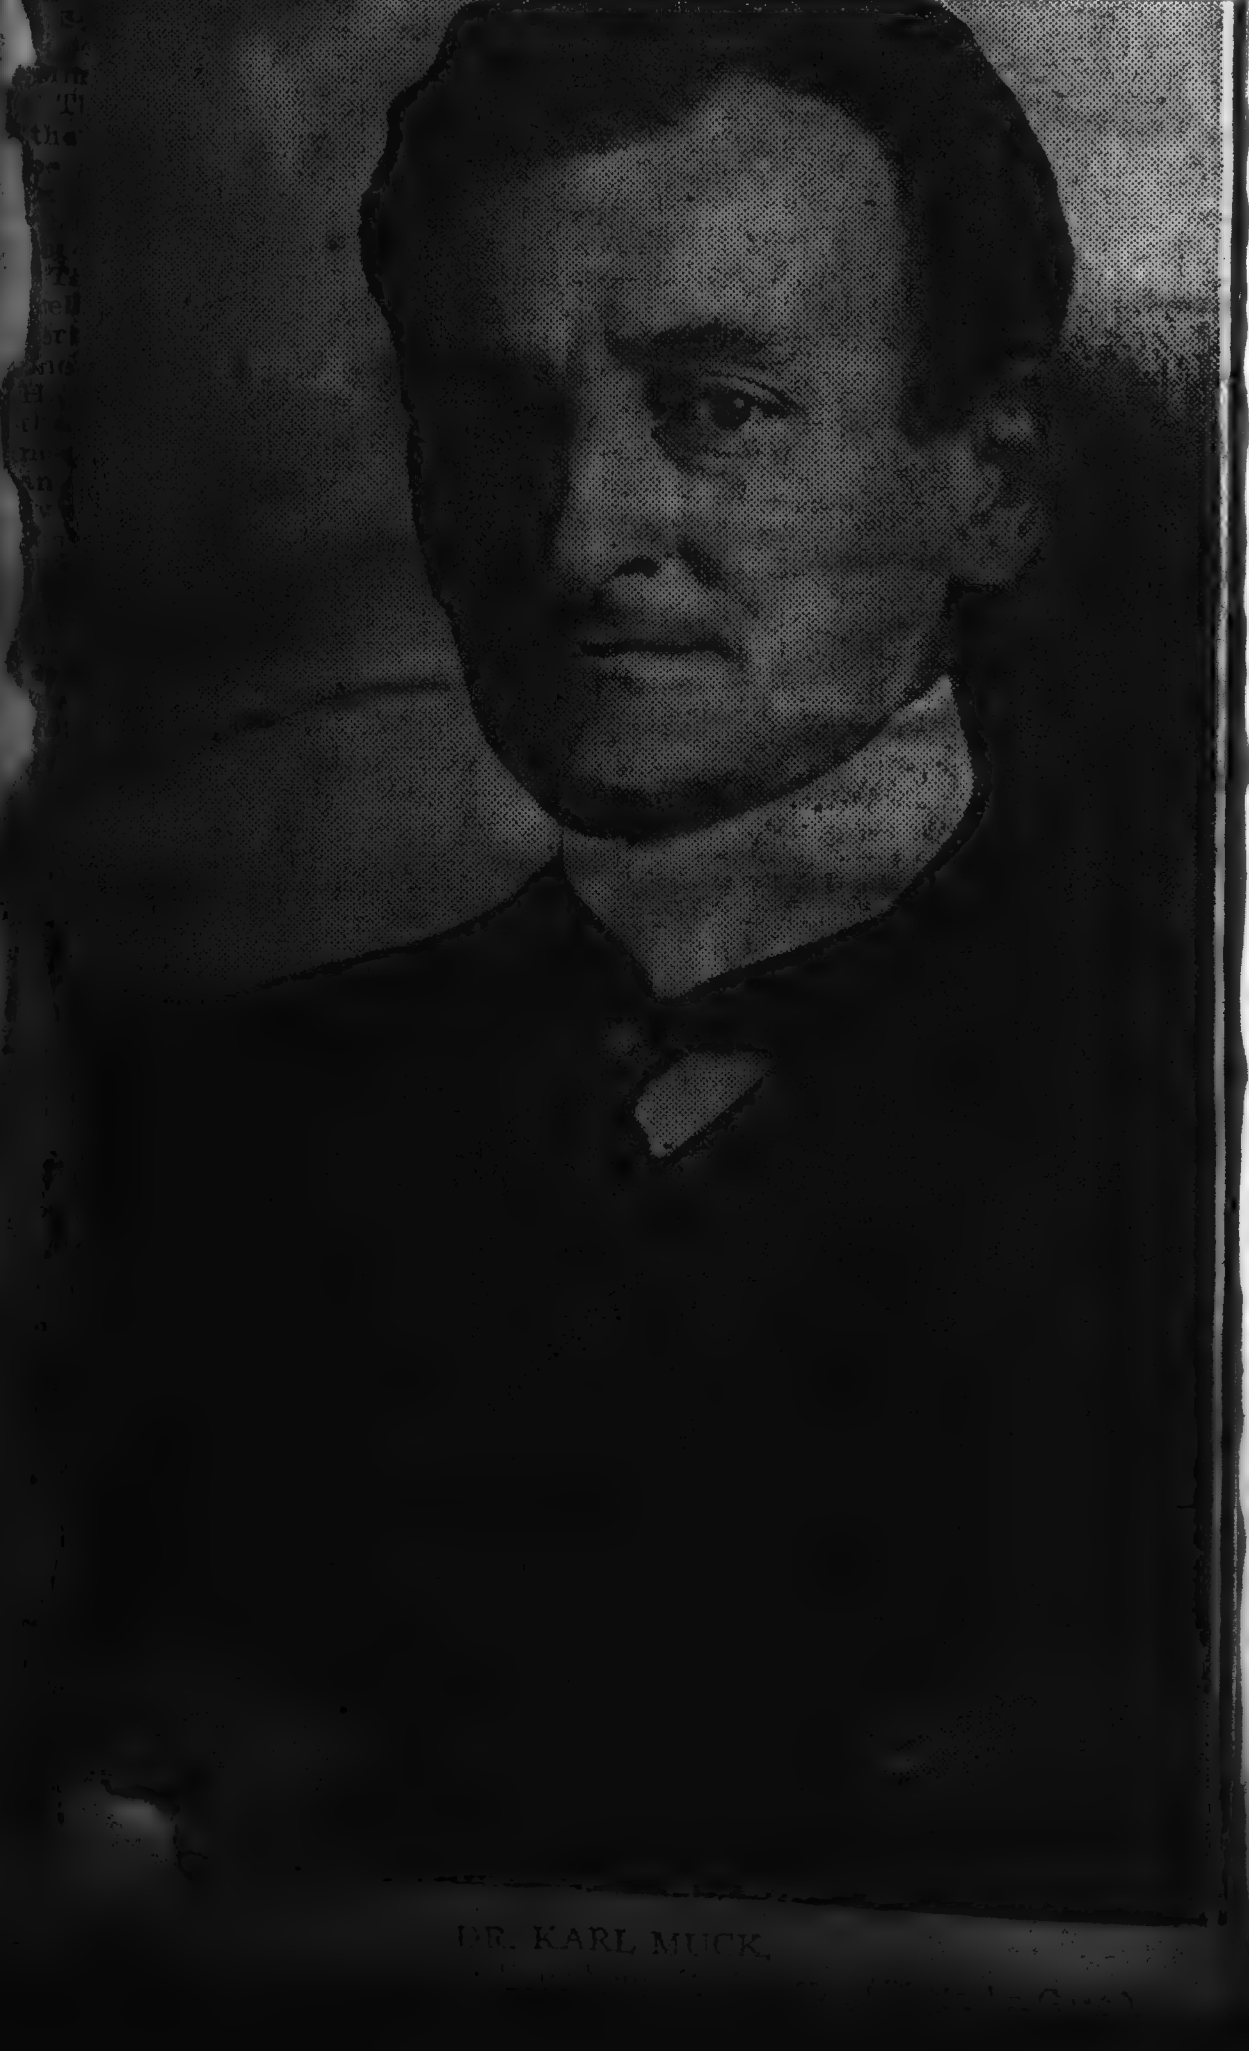
Mr. Zach finds that music of the later 19th century, long supposed to abstruse, discordant, taxing to the average intelligence, is as a matter of fact far more readily appreciated by the American public of today than music of the classic period. The later music is readily accepted by the public without lectures, without programme notes, without anything but an inherent musical sense and a sympathy with the spirit of the times. In Carthage, Missouri, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, Mr. played the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, which was received with enthusiasm by an audience the majority of which, in all probability, had not heard the name of Cesar Franck before that time. In New Orleans a performance of Sibelius' "En Saga" was received in a similar spirit. Critics disagreed, but the prize critic spoke in this wise, "You may not like it, but it is remarkable music all the same." And Mr. Zach related a remark of one of the leading musicians and composers of this city, who observed that Wagner had made it possible for him to understand Beethoven. We venture to add that three-quarters of the young musicians of today can vouch for a similar experience.

And this launched Mr. Zach on another matter—the attitude of critics toward the later manifestations: "There has been spread by some who worship nothing but the music which they can find explained in Grove's the fallacy that as the music of classic masters is polyphonic, symphonic, what you will, a solid musical judgment is necessary for its appreciation, while later music, being all emotion, color, etc., can readily be imposed on the dilettante who is unable to shake the wheat from the chaff. Therefore these gentlemen, ignoring what they cannot afford to ignore, take not the slightest pains to examine the modern music and discover its spirit and its constructive principles. I can tell you of an individual who speaks of having examined the piano music of Debussy and who has heartily rejected all that he examined. No doubt he has placed some of the pieces of Debussy on his piano rack and 'read them through' and placed them on one side. That is not the way to discover Debussy any more than, a generation ago, it was the way to discover Schumann. But my friend would not have come any nearer Schumann than he has to Debussy, if Schumann were living today. He, too, required study and sympathy before he was comprehended. Why rebel against what is accomplished? What is Debussy's position today. He is widely acknowledged as a master of unique individuality. His harmonic idioms, practically new with him, are no longer confined to his own scores. Inevitably, of course, there has sprung up in France a host of imitators, a school founded upon his principles, but look elsewhere.

"Have you read Reger's 'Romantic Suite'? There he has freely employed Debussyian harmonies. Consider the later operas of Puccini. Examine the majority of scores of the last 10 years and then say to me that Debussy is a passing fad.

"Take a composer of a very different type. There are still individuals who make it their business to deny Brahms the rank of a great creator. But the music of Brahms is played today more than it has ever been played before. In symphonic and recital programmes his name is one of the most frequently met with. His C minor symphony is one of the war-horses of modern conductors. Leave all else aside, what is the use of a critic or a concert goer prostesting that there is nothing in all this music. He only makes it apparent that there is nothing in it for him."

Mr. Zach has also an important list of novelties to be produced this season in St. Louis, including one or two orchestral works by Americans.



DR. KARL MUCK.

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 13.

ADDRESS TO SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Maj Higginson Asks for Strict Neutrality.

European War Must Not Cause Lack of Harmony in Orchestra.

The first rehearsal of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The entire orchestra was present. After the orchestra had been assembled on the stage, Mr Higginson made a few remarks to them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, owing to so many of them belonging to the different countries that are at war and urging them to ignore all things which might lead to friction in the ranks. He spoke as follows:

"Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Gentlemen—It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year, because the presence of Dr Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together here and assumed that it was a sure hit until Connie Mack's star squatted in front of it. How he got there is still a mystery to about 40,000 persons.

---

Another thing that mystified many was Hildebrand's final ruling on Maranville's hit to right in the same inning. Big Schmidt got one through safe about three feet to left of where Whitted's hit had been spoiled by Collins, and went to second on an out.

"The Rabbit" sliced one out toward Hildebrand, who was standing on the chalk line. Murphy came over, running his legs off to make a catch on the fly; Collins and McInnis were also trying to get next to the ball, but it struck the ground about 10 feet in front of the umpire, who by his action ruled that it was a fair hit.

He hopped around like a football player dodging through an open field in order to keep out of the way of Murphy, Collins and McInnis, one after the other, to [illegible] a chance to field the ball it the ball eluded them and all stopped. "The Rabbit" was allowed to make the cuit of the bases, and after he had ssed the rubber behind Schmidt, Umpire Klem began to make inquiries of Hildebrand as to what his ruling had been. Hildebrand then motioned that the ball was foul.

---

If that was his judgment at first, the question arises as to why he was bob

---

BOSTON POST

OCTOBER 13,

APPEAL TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Exhorts Players to Drop War Talk

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were exhorted yesterday by Henry L. Higginson, its founder and sustainer of its success, to forbear in expressing opinions on the European war and to maintain an absolutely neutral ground in keeping with the national disposition of the American people.

During the rehearsal of the opening concerts of the programme under Dr. Karl Muck, Major Higginson addressed the members of the orchestra on the stage yesterday morning at 10 o'clock on the difficult position they hold because many of them come from countries engaged in the European conflict.

APPLAUDED BY PLAYERS

The admonition of Major Higginson that each of the players withhold himself from commenting on the war was applauded by all the members of the orchestra at the conclusion of his brief address.

Major Higginson said that he had feared that it might be impossible this year to give the concerts because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many of the members of the orchestra seemed unlikely. He said that but few of the members had failed to appear and that their positions had been filled.

Demanded by Public

"The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts," Major Higginson said, "and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in the case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had.

"It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal.

Hard to Rebuild

"It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you as needing the work. I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them, and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Mutual Forbearance

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction.

"You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each o is absolutely indispensable. Wit it the orchestra cannot live.

Keep Orchestra's Name Brigh

"You all have at heart the rep tion of our orchestra, which achieved a fine name and whic known in Europe as well as here. rests with you to keep that n bright, and to give to our public concerts as we have had before."

Major Higginson said that for ne 60 years he had dreamed of orchestra for the sake of art especially for the happiness and fare of "our people." For 34 y he had worked over it, he declared, by the aid of many able and tinguished artists, the orchestra had been formed and has reached the present point of excellence.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 13.

NEUTRALITY URGED UPON SYMPHONY MEN

Maj. Higginson Talks to Players at Close of First Rehearsal of the Season.

An urgent appeal to the members of the Symphony Orchestra, composed of men of all European nationalities, to avoid all friction and discord because of war conditions abroad and to maintain the same neutrality toward each other that the United States is maintaining toward the fighting nations was made yesterday to the famous musical organization by Henry L. Higginson at the close of the first rehearsal of the season.

Maj. Higginson asked the men to keep the name of the orchestra as bright as it has been in times past, dwelt upon the difficulty with which it was formed and the impossibility of rebuilding it if the men should create discord, and urged mutual forbearance at all times, whether in the tuning room, the railroad train or the hotel. He was greeted with loud applause by the musicians. Maj. Higginson said:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

Under Difficult Circumstances.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Must Avoid Friction.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 10 1914

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck last week, who brought with him several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete for the season. Five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings, on November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The soloists are Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone; Harold Bauer, the distinguished violinist, and Fritz Kreisler, who is reported to be lame, but who has given assurances that his hands and arms are unhurt.

ork, 1884

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 11, 1914

...rst Symphony This Week

...er Notes of Interest—The Conducting of Donizetti—Modern Music and the Younger Generation—Concerts to Come

...Muck has brought with him from ...e six important novelties. The ...s of Stravinsky and Schonenberg ...cluded in the list, which, in full, ...follows: Five pieces for orchestra, ...Schonenberg; ballet music, Igor ...nsky; Sinfonietta, Erich Korn... symphony, Fritz Goldbach; ...Symphony, Guy Roparts; sym... poem, "Brand," after Ibsen, Ar...heldrup. The two latter works ...the library of the Boston Sym... Orchestra. The other works or... from Germany last spring, and ...t whereabouts have yet to be as...ned.

...th season of the Boston Sym...chestra will open next Friday ...with the first public rehearsal ...ing at 2:30, which will be fol... by the first concert on next ...day evening, Oct. 17, at 8 o'clock. ...ale of seats, which has been in ...ess at Symphony Hall during the ...week, must be considered satisfac... in view of prevailing conditions. ...rchestra is complete with the pos... exception of one double bass ... Mr. Agnesy, who has not ...d yet, but it is hoped that he will ... this week. The new mem... of the orchestra are here and the ...rsals begin tomorrow (Monday) ...ng.

...Muck, following the precedent ...ished by him in past years, has ...one far afield for his first pro...me. The Symphony will be ...oven's "Eroica." The other num... will be Brahms' "Variations of a ...s" by Josef Haydn, Richard ...ss's Tone Poem "Don Juan," and ...r's Overture, "Euryanthe."

...misconducting of Mr. Castillo ..."Lucia di Lammermoor" was ...an otherwise creditable perform... at the Boston Theatre last week ...hes a text for a word about the ...er in which Donizetti may be ...eated by those who are either in...le to the beauties of his style or ...ose to ignore such matters, ..., perhaps, that the "thinness" ...onventionality of the scoring do ...stify the attention of a modern ...ctor. There is even a saying that ...era by Donizetti should be able ... without a conductor. It might, ...ertain Italian orchestras. Under ...ry circumstances, however, the ...ctor can make just as much ...ence in the impression of a work ...onizetti by his treatment of the ...as he can in an opera by Puccini ...unod—another sufferer from com...cy and routine.

...s now the fashion to talk glibly ...the latter Verdi, the "realist" ...of Italian opera, the orchestra... of Strauss, the "curve" of Puc... melody and Puccini's extraordin...chnique of the theatre, etc. Un...ately, in these days of dilettant... necessary justness of perspec...as temporarily disappeared. You ...t, with artistic honor and in jus...o his cause, neglect Donizetti's ...any more than you can Puccini's. ... melody of Donizetti has also its ...e" and its individual characteris-

In his day orchestration was far polyphonic, symphonic, what you will, from the art that it is now. But when it was composed neither the music nor the orchestration of "Lucia" was conventional, and when an opera holds the stage for a century it is very certain that underneath idioms which are of a bygone day there is a spirit that can appeal to many successive generations. There are passages in "Lucia di Lammermoor" that must have set Donizetti as far apart from his contemporaries as Puccini is from Leoncavallo, or farther. The melodic curve of the earlier composer is always refined. There is an aristocratic grace in his melody and his manner. He could not write in an awkward or brutal vein. Similarly with his orchestra. The orchestration of Rossini was frequently more modern, and also, and very frequently, more coarse and noisy. In "Lucia di Lammermoor" there are charming bits of instrumental coloring, which have, at the least, an old-fashioned charm that captivates the ear. And always there is style. For these reasons, few things are more disturbing that to hear Donizetti maltreated by conductors who neither understand him nor, apparently, think it worth their while to make any effort to do so.

Mr. Max Zach, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, is in town about his old haunts, and his experiences as a conductor in the middle West and also in the South, which he has toured, are more than ordinarily illuminative of the attitude of the public toward new music and its adequate performance.

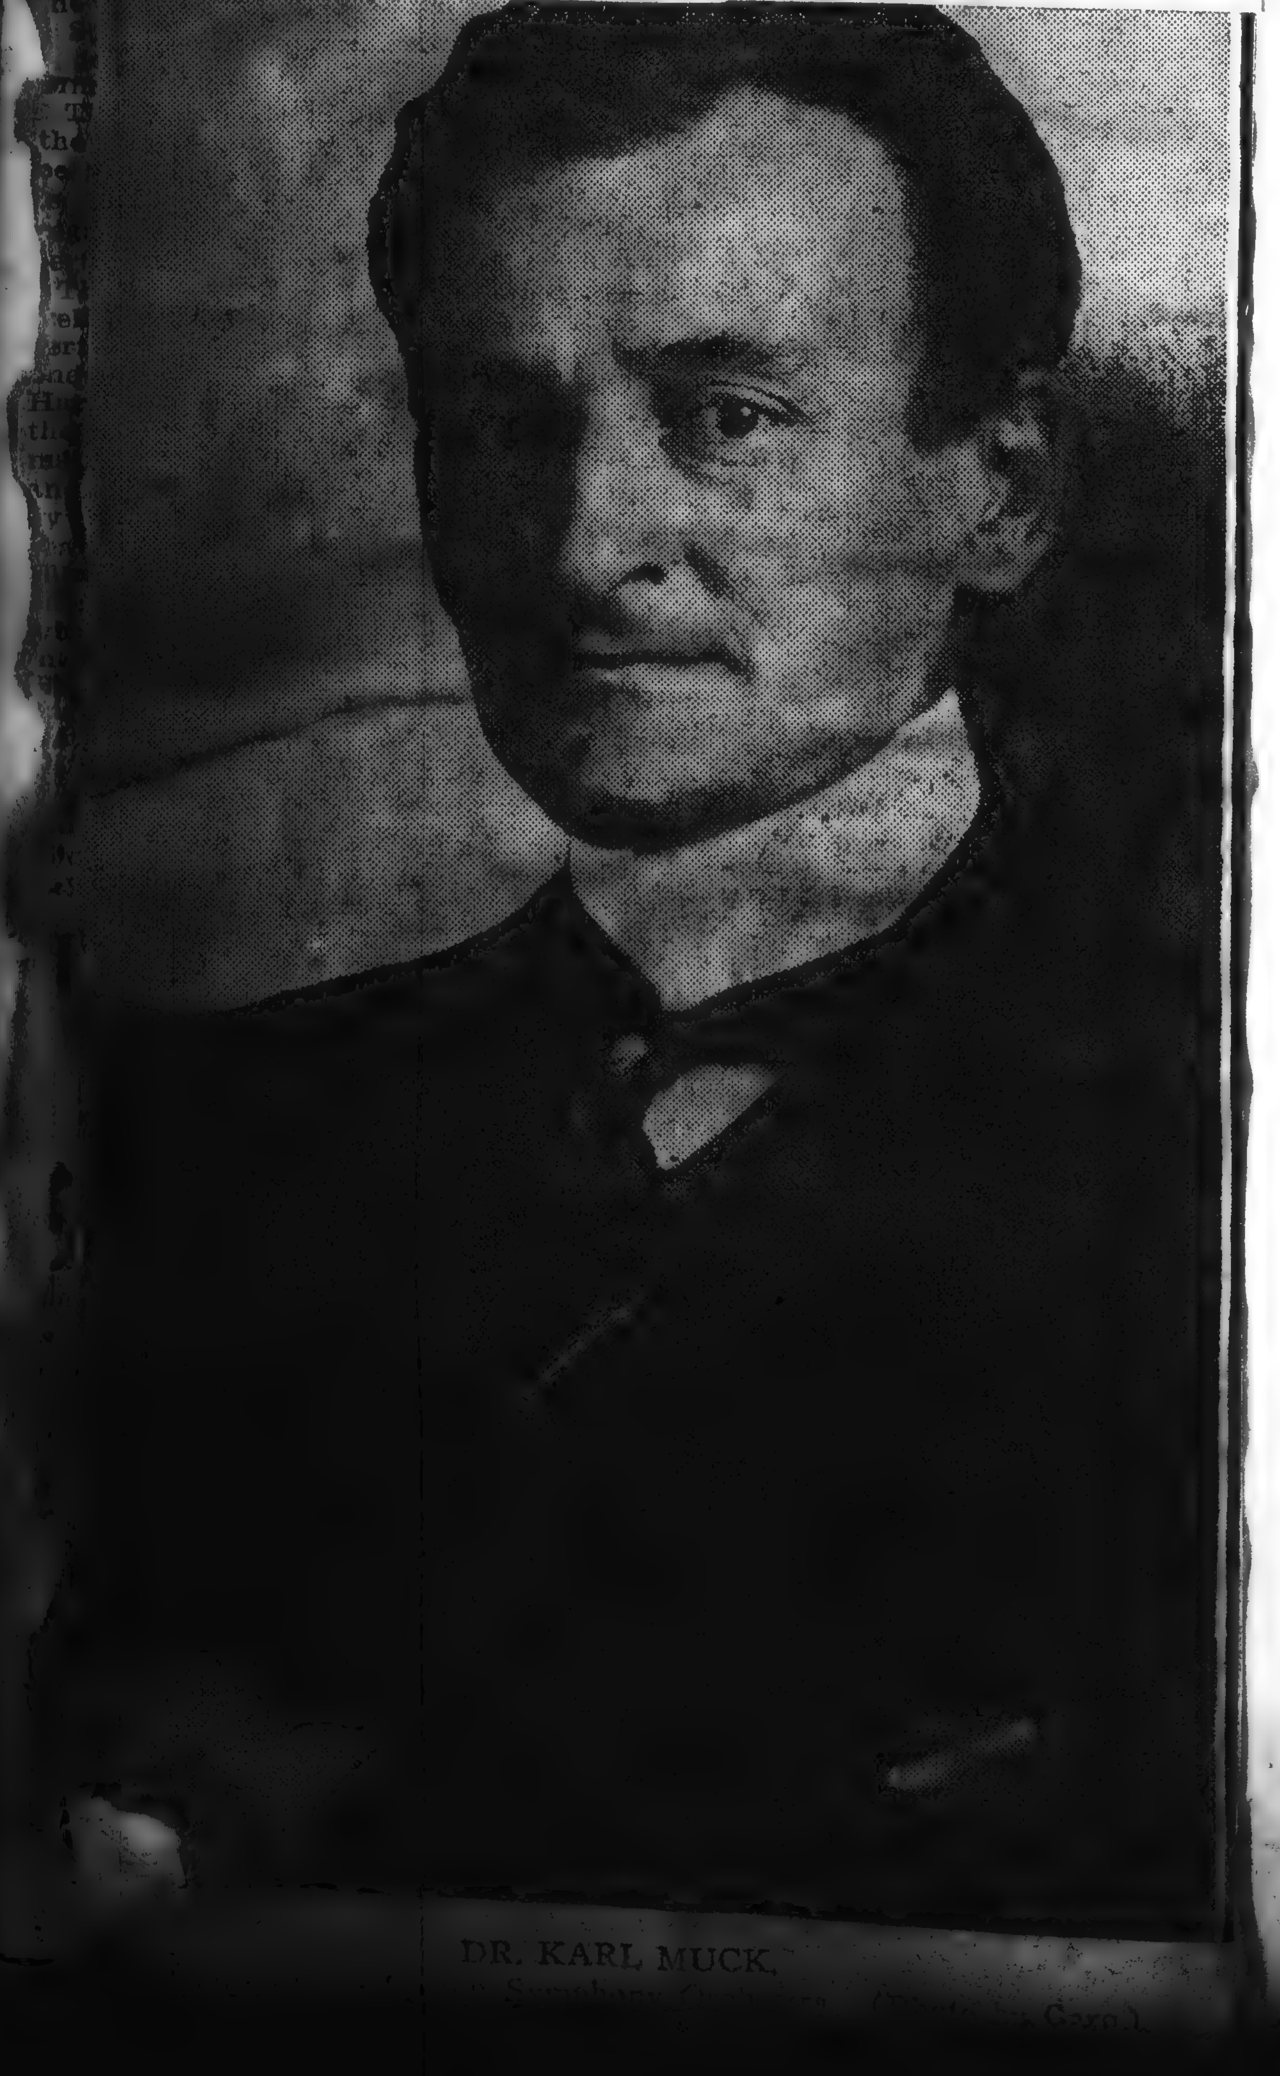
Mr. Zach finds that music of the later 19th century, long supposed to abstruse, discordant, taxing to the average intelligence, is as a matter of fact far more readily appreciated by the American public of today than music of the classic period. The later music is readily accepted by the public without lectures, without programme notes, without anything but an inherent musical sense and a sympathy with the spirit of the times. In Carthage, Missouri, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, Mr. played the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, which was received with enthusiasm by an audience the majority of which, in all probability, had not heard the name of Cesar Franck before that time. In New Orleans a performance of Sibelius' "En Saga" was received in a similar spirit. Critics disagreed, but the prize critic spoke in this wise, "You may not like it, but it is remarkable music all the same." And Mr. Zach related a remark of one of the leading musicians and composers of this city, who observed that Wagner had made it possible for him to understand Beethoven. We venture to add that three-quarters of the young musicians of today can vouch for a similar experience.

And this launched Mr. Zach on another matter—the attitude of critics toward the later manifestations: "There has been spread by some who worship nothing but the music which they can find explained in Grove's the fallacy that as the music of classic masters is a solid musical judgment is necessary for its appreciation, while later music, being all emotion, color, etc., can readily be imposed on the dilettante who is unable to shake the wheat from the chaff. Therefore these gentlemen, ignoring what they cannot afford to ignore, take not the slightest pains to examine the modern music and discover its spirit and its constructive principles. I can tell you of an individual who speaks of having examined the piano music of Debussy and who has heartily rejected all that he examined. No doubt he has placed some of the pieces of Debussy on his piano rack and 'read them through' and placed them on one side. That is not the way to discover Debussy any more than, a generation ago, it was the way to discover Schumann. But my friend would not have come any nearer Schumann than he has to Debussy, if Schumann were living today. He, too, required study and sympathy before he was comprehended. Why rebel against what is accomplished? What is Debussy's position today. He is widely acknowledged as a master of unique individuality. His harmonic idioms, practically new with him, are no longer confined to his own scores. Inevitably, of course, there has sprung up in France a host of imitators, a school founded upon his principles, but look elsewhere.

"Have you read Reger's 'Romantic Suite'? There he has freely employed Debussyian harmonies. Consider the later operas of Puccini. Examine the majority of scores of the last 10 years and then say to me that Debussy is a passing fad.

"Take a composer of a very different type. There are still individuals who make it their business to deny Brahms the rank of a great creator. But the music of Brahms is played today more than it has ever been played before. In symphonic and recital programmes his name is one of the most frequently met with. His C minor symphony is one of the war-horses of modern conductors. Leave all else aside, what is the use of a critic or a concert goer prostesting that there is nothing in all this music. He only makes it apparent that there is nothing in it for him."

Mr. Zach has also an important list of novelties to be produced this season in St. Louis, including one or two orchestral works by Americans.



DR. KARL MUCK.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 13.

ADDRESS TO SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Maj Higginson Asks for Strict Neutrality.

European War Must Not Cause Lack of Harmony in Orchestra.

The first rehearsal of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The entire orchestra was present. After the orchestra had been assembled on the stage, Mr Higginsen made a few remarks to them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, owing to so many of them belonging to the different countries that are at war and urging them to ignore all things which might lead to friction in the ranks. He spoke as follows:

"Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Gentlemen—It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year, because the presence of Dr Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together

---

...there and assumed that it was a safe hit until Connie Mack's star squatted in front of it. How he got there is still a mystery to about 40,000 persons.

Another thing that mystified many was Hildebrand's final ruling on Maranville's hit to right in the same inning. Big Schmidt got one through safe about three feet to left of where Whitted's ...it had been spoiled by Collins, and went to second on an out.

"The Rabbit" sliced one out toward Hildebrand, who was standing on the chalk line. Murphy came over, running his legs off to make a catch on the fly; Collins and McInnis were also trying to get next to the ball, but it struck the ground about 10 feet in front of the umpire, who by his action ruled that it was a fair hit.

He hopped around like a football player dodging through an open field in order to keep out of the way of Murphy, Collins and McInnis, one after the other, to ... a chance to field the ball

---

...tried to do for a second or two ...t the ball eluded them and all stopped. "The Rabbit" was allowed to make the ...cuit of the bases, and after he had ...ssed the rubber behind Schmidt, Um...re Klem began to make inquiries of ...ildebrand as to what his ruling had ...een. Hildebrand then motioned that ...e ball was foul.

If that was his judgment at first, the ...estion arises as to why he was bob-...

BOSTON POST

OCTOBER 13,

APPEAL TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Exhorts Players to Drop War Talk

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were exhorted yesterday by Henry L. Higginson, its founder and sustainer of its success, to forbear in expressing opinions on the European war and to maintain an absolutely neutral ground in keeping with the national disposition of the American people.

During the rehearsal of the opening concerts of the programme under Dr. Karl Muck, Major Higginson addressed the members of the orchestra on the stage yesterday morning at 10 o'clock on the difficult position they hold because many of them come from countries engaged in the European conflict.

APPLAUDED BY PLAYERS

The admonition of Major Higginson that each of the players withhold himself from commenting on the war was applauded by all the members of the orchestra at the conclusion of his brief address.

Major Higginson said that he had feared that it might be impossible this year to give the concerts because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many of the members of the orchestra seemed unlikely. He said that but few of the members had failed to appear and that their positions had been filled.

Demanded by Public

"The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, "Major Higginson said, "and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in the case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had.

"It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal.

Hard to Rebuild

"It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you as needing the work. I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them, and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Mutual Forbearance

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction.

"You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each o... is absolutely indispensable. Wit... it the orchestra cannot live.

Keep Orchestra's Name Brigh...

"You all have at heart the rep... tion of our orchestra, which ... achieved a fine name and whic... known in Europe as well as here. ... rests with you to keep that n... bright, and to give to our public s... concerts as we have had before."

Major Higginson said that for ne... 60 years he had dreamed of ... orchestra for the sake of art ... especially for the happiness and ... fare of "our people." For 34 y... he had worked over it, he declared, ... by the aid of many able and ...tinguished artists, the orchestra had been formed and has reached the present point of excellence.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 13.

NEUTRALITY URGED UPON SYMPHONY MEN

Maj. Higginson Talks to Players at Close of First Rehearsal of the Season.

An urgent appeal to the members of the Symphony Orchestra, composed of men of all European nationalities, to avoid all friction and discord because of war conditions abroad and to maintain the same neutrality toward each other that the United States is maintaining toward the fighting nations was made yesterday to the famous musical organization by Henry L. Higginson at the close of the first rehearsal of the season.

Maj. Higginson asked the men to keep the name of the orchestra as bright as it has been in times past, dwelt upon the difficulty with which it was formed and the impossibility of rebuilding it if the men should create discord, and urged mutual forbearance at all times, whether in the tuning room, the railroad train or the hotel. He was greeted with loud applause by the musicians. Maj. Higginson said:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

Under Difficult Circumstances.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Must Avoid Friction.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 1... 1914

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck last week, who brought with him several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete for the season. Five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings, on November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The soloists are Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone; Harold Bauer, the distinguished violinist, and Fritz Kreisler, who is reported to be lame, but who has given assurances that his hands and arms are unhurt.

...ork, 1884

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 11, 1914

rst Symphony This Week

er Notes of Interest—The Conducting of Donizetti—Modern Music and the Younger Generation—Concerts to Come

Muck has brought with him from e six important novelties. The of Stravinsky and Schonenberg cluded in the list, which, in full, ollows: Five pieces for orchestra, Schonenberg; ballet music, Igor nsky; Sinfonietta, Erich Korn- symphony, Fritz Goldbach; Symphony, Guy Ropartz; sym- poem, "Brand," after Ibsen, Ar-cheldrup. The two latter works the library of the Boston Sym- Orchestra. The other works or- from Germany last spring, and t whereabouts have yet to be as-ned.

th season of the Boston Sym-chestra will open next Friday with the first public rehearsal ing at 2:30, which will be fol- by the first concert on next day evening, Oct. 17, at 8 o'clock. ale of seats, which has been in ss at Symphony Hall during the week, must be considered satisfac- in view of prevailing conditions. rchestra is complete with the pos- exception of one double bass , Mr. Agnesy, who has not d yet, but it is hoped that he will this week. The new mem- f the orchestra are here and the rsals begin tomorrow (Monday) ng.

Muck, following the precedent ished by him in past years, has one far afield for his first pro-me. The Symphony will be oven's "Eroica." The other num- will be Brahms' "Variations of a e" by Josef Haydn, Richard s's Tone Poem "Don Juan," and r's Overture, "Euryanthe."

misconducting of Mr. Castillo "Lucia di Lammermoor" was an otherwise creditable perform- at the Boston Theatre last week hes a text for a word about the er in which Donizetti may be eated by those who are either in-le to the beauties of his style or hose to ignore such matters, g, perhaps, that the "thinness" conventionality of the scoring do atify the attention of a modern ctor. There is even a saying that era by Donizetti should be able without a conductor. It might, certain Italian orchestras. Under ry circumstances, however, the ctor can make just as much ence in the impression of a work nizetti by his treatment of the as he can in an opera by Puccini unod—another sufferer from com-cy and routine.

s now the fashion to talk glibly the latter Verdi, the "realist" of Italian opera, the orchestra- f Strauss, the "curve" of Puc- melody and Puccini's extraordin-chnique of the theatre, etc. Un-ately, in these days of dilettant- necessary justness of perspec-as temporarily disappeared. You t, with artistic honor and in jus-o his cause, neglect Donizetti's any more than you can Puccini's. melody of Donizetti has also its e" and its individual characteris- In his day orchestration was far from the art that it is now. But when it was composed neither the music nor the orchestration of "Lucia" was conventional, and when an opera holds the stage for a century it is very certain that underneath idioms which are of a bygone day there is a spirit that can appeal to many successive generations. There are passages in "Lucia di Lammermoor" that must have set Donizetti as far apart from his contemporaries as Puccini is from Leoncavallo, or farther. The melodic curve of the earlier composer is always refined. There is an aristocratic grace in his melody and his manner. He could not write in an awkward or brutal vein. Similarly with his orchestra. The orchestration of Rossini was frequently more modern, and also, and very frequently, more coarse and noisy. In "Lucia di Lammermoor" there are charming bits of instrumental coloring, which have, at the least, an old-fashioned charm that captivates the ear. And always there is style. For these reasons, few things are more disturbing that to hear Donizetti maltreated by conductors who neither understand him nor, apparently, think it worth their while to make any effort to do so.

Mr. Max Zach, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, is in town about his old haunts, and his experiences as a conductor in the middle West and also in the South, which he has toured, are more than ordinarily illuminative of the attitude of the public toward new music and its adequate performance.

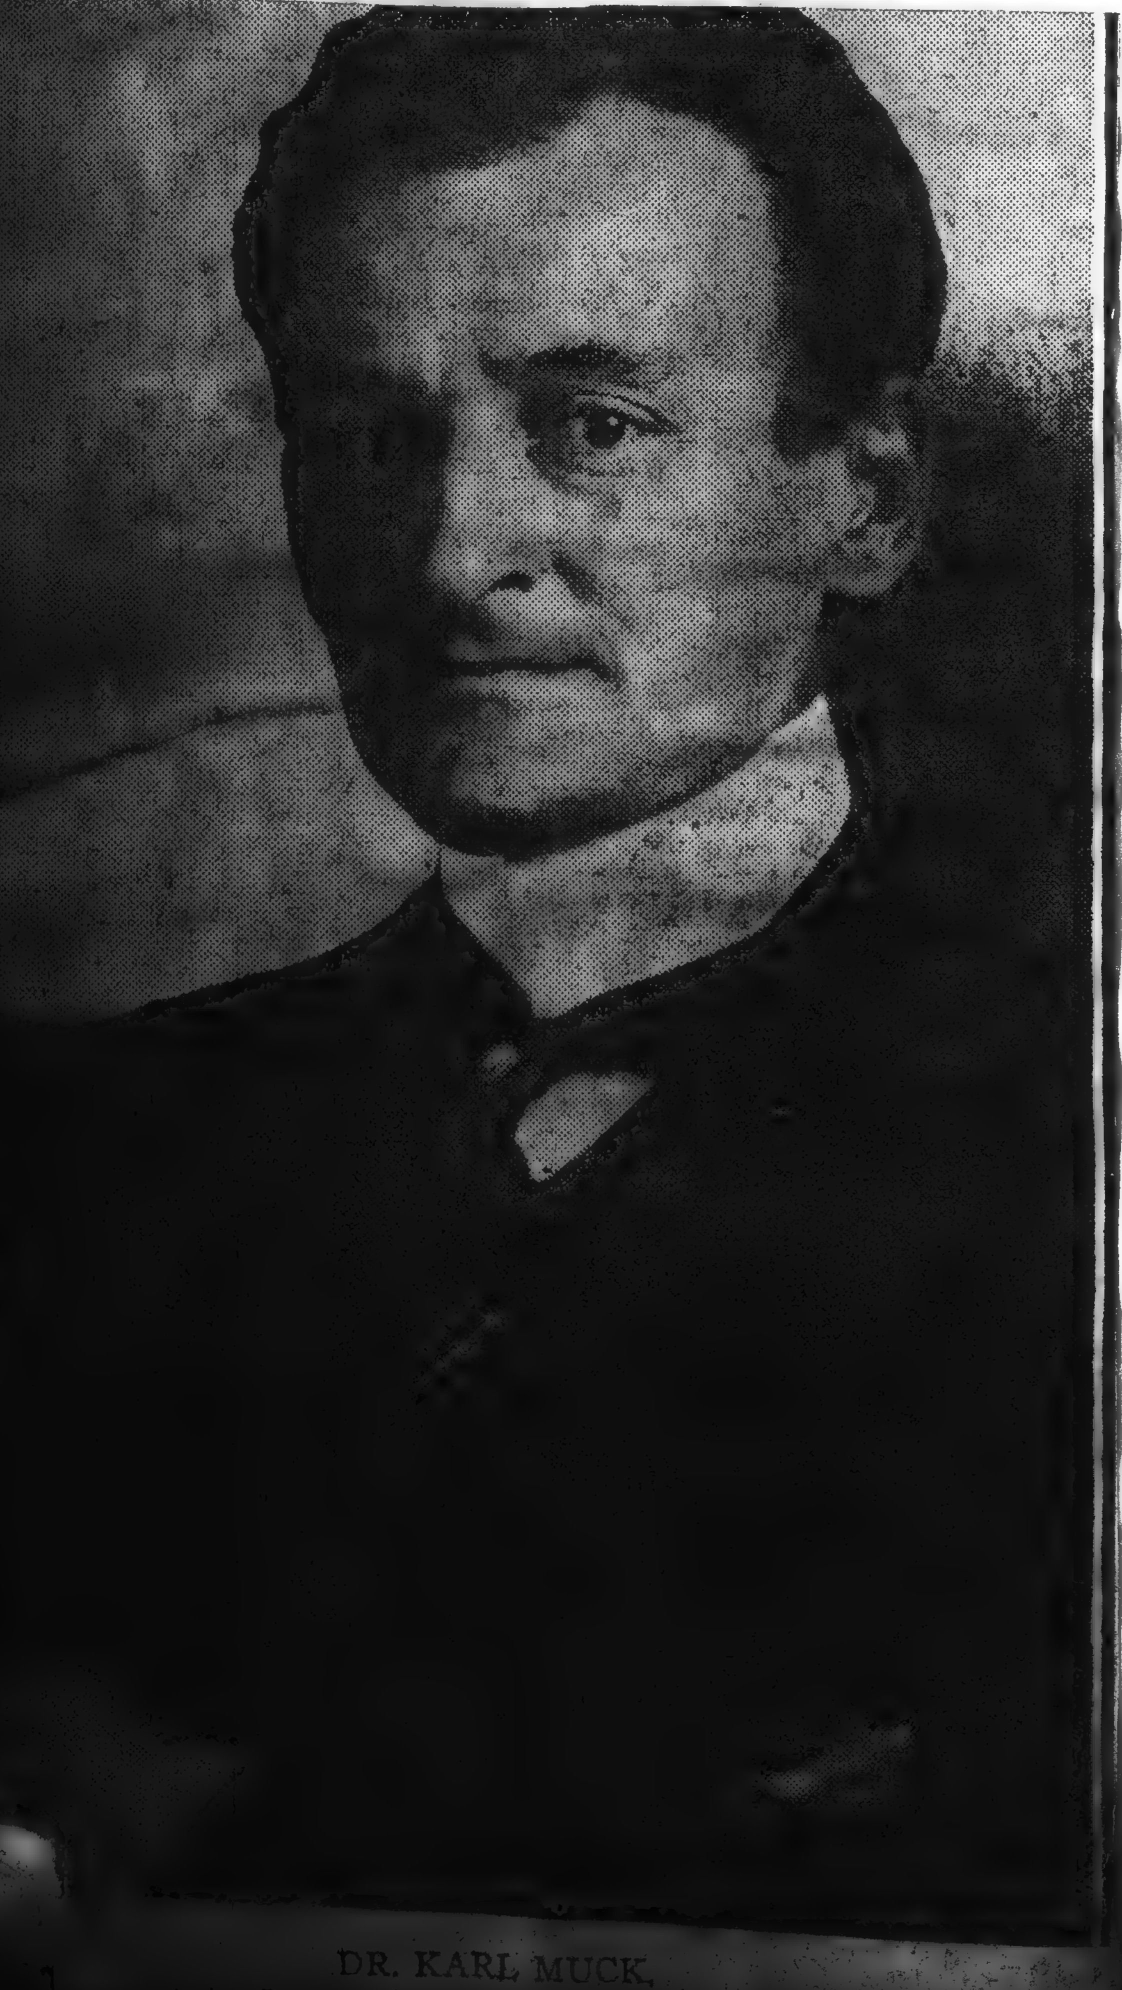
Mr. Zach finds that music of the later 19th century, long supposed to abstruse, discordant, taxing to the average intelligence, is as a matter of fact far more readily appreciated by the American public of today than music of the classic period. The later music is readily accepted by the public without lectures, without programme notes, without anything but an inherent musical sense and a sympathy with the spirit of the times. In Carthage, Missouri, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, Mr. played the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, which was received with enthusiasm by an audience the majority of which, in all probability, had not heard the name of Cesar Franck before that time. In New Orleans a performance of Sibelius' "En Saga" was received in a similar spirit. Critics disagreed, but the prize critic spoke in this wise, "You may not like it, but it is remarkable music all the same." And Mr. Zach related a remark of one of the leading musicians and composers of this city, who observed that Wagner had made it possible for him to understand Beethoven. We venture to add that three-quarters of the young musicians of today can vouch for a similar experience.

And this launched Mr. Zach on another matter—the attitude of critics toward the later manifestations: "There has been spread by some who worship nothing but the music which they can find explained in Grove's the fallacy that as the music of classic masters is polyphonic, symphonic, what you will, a solid musical judgment is necessary for its appreciation, while later music, being all emotion, color, etc., can readily be imposed on the dilettante who is unable to shake the wheat from the chaff. Therefore these gentlemen, ignoring what they cannot afford to ignore, take not the slightest pains to examine the modern music and discover its spirit and its constructive principles. I can tell you of an individual who speaks of having examined the piano music of Debussy and who has heartily rejected all that he examined. No doubt he has placed some of the pieces of Debussy on his piano rack and 'read them through' and placed them on one side. That is not the way to discover Debussy any more than, a generation ago, it was the way to discover Schumann. But my friend would not have come any nearer Schumann than he has to Debussy, if Schumann were living today. He, too, required study and sympathy before he was comprehended. Why rebel against what is accomplished? What is Debussy's position today. He is widely acknowledged as a master of unique individuality. His harmonic idioms, practically new with him, are no longer confined to his own scores. Inevitably, of course, there has sprung up in France a host of imitators, a school founded upon his principles, but look elsewhere.

"Have you read Reger's 'Romantic Suite'? There he has freely employed Debussyian harmonies. Consider the later operas of Puccini. Examine the majority of scores of the last 10 years and then say to me that Debussy is a passing fad.

"Take a composer of a very different type. There are still individuals who make it their business to deny Brahms the rank of a great creator. But the music of Brahms is played today more than it has ever been played before. In symphonic and recital programmes his name is one of the most frequently met with. His C minor symphony is one of the war-horses of modern conductors. Leave all else aside, what is the use of a critic or a concert goer prostesting that there is nothing in all this music. He only makes it apparent that there is nothing in it for him."

Mr. Zach has also an important list of novelties to be produced this season in St. Louis, including one or two orchestral works by Americans.



DR. KARL MUCK,
Symphony Orchestra. (Photo by Garo.)

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 13.

ADDRESS TO SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Maj Higginson Asks for Strict Neutrality.

European War Must Not Cause Lack of Harmony in Orchestra.

The first rehearsal of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The entire orchestra was present. After the orchestra had been assembled on the stage, Mr Higginson made a few remarks to them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, owing to so many of them belonging to the different countries that are at war and urging them to ignore all things which might lead to friction in the ranks. He spoke as follows:

"Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Gentlemen—It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year, because the presence of Dr Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together em tried to do for a second or two it the ball eluded them and all stopped. "The Rabbit" was allowed to make the cuit of the bases, and after he had passed the rubber behind Schmidt, Um-re Klem began to make inquiries of ildebrand as to what his ruling had een. Hildebrand then motioned that e ball was foul.

---

If that was his judgment at first, the estion arises as to why he was bob-there and assumed that it was a safe hit until Connie Mack's star squatted in front of it. How he got there is still a mystery to about 40,000 persons.

---

Another thing that mystified many was Hildebrand's final ruling on Maranville's hit to right in the same inning. Big Schmidt got one through safe about three feet to left of where Whitted's it had been spoiled by Collins, and went to second on an out.

"The Rabbit" sliced one out toward Hildebrand, who was standing on the chalk line. Murphy came over, running his legs off to make a catch on the fly; Collins and McInnis were also trying get next to the ball, but it struck he ground about 10 feet in front of the umpire, who by his action ruled that it as a fair hit.

He hopped around like a football play- dodging through an open field in order keep out of the way of Murphy, Col-ins and McInnis, one after the other, to m a chance to field the ball

---

BOSTON POST

OCTOBER 13,

APPEAL TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Exhorts Players to Drop War Talk

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were exhorted yesterday by Henry L. Higginson, its founder and sustainer of its success, to forbear in expressing opinions on the European war and to maintain an absolutely neutral ground in keeping with the national disposition of the American people.

During the rehearsal of the opening concerts of the programme under Dr. Karl Muck, Major Higginson addressed the members of the orchestra on the stage yesterday morning at 10 o'clock on the difficult position they hold because many of them come from countries engaged in the European conflict.

APPLAUDED BY PLAYERS

The admonition of Major Higginson that each of the players withhold himself from commenting on the war was applauded by all the members of the orchestra at the conclusion of his brief address.

Major Higginson said that he had feared that it might be impossible this year to give the concerts because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many of the members of the orchestra seemed unlikely. He said that but few of the members had failed to appear and that their positions had been filled.

Demanded by Public

"The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts," Major Higginson said, "and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in the case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had.

"It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal.

Hard to Rebuild

"It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you as needing the work. I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them, and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Mutual Forbearance

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction.

"You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

Keep Orchestra's Name Bright

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

Major Higginson said that for nearly 60 years he had dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of "our people." For 34 years he had worked over it, he declared, and by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra had been formed and has reached the present point of excellence.

[19]

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 13.

NEUTRALITY URGED UPON SYMPHONY MEN

Maj. Higginson Talks to Players at Close of First Rehearsal of the Season.

An urgent appeal to the members of the Symphony Orchestra, composed of men of all European nationalities, to avoid all friction and discord because of war conditions abroad and to maintain the same neutrality toward each other that the United States is maintaining toward the fighting nations was made yesterday to the famous musical organization by Henry L. Higginson at the close of the first rehearsal of the season.

Maj. Higginson asked the men to keep the name of the orchestra as bright as it has been in times past, dwelt upon the difficulty with which it was formed and the impossibility of rebuilding it if the men should create discord, and urged mutual forbearance at all times, whether in the tuning room, the railroad train or the hotel. He was greeted with loud applause by the musicians. Maj. Higginson said:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the newcomers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

Under Difficult Circumstances.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them; and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

Must Avoid Friction.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances, however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

MES

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 1

r. Karl Muck last week, several new members of nel of the Boston Sym- ete for the season. Five the Academy of Music November 6, December 19 and March 19. The nato, the great Italian the distinguished violin- who is reported to be ven assurances that his hurt.

ork, 1884

BOSTON POST

OCTOBER 15,

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON

First Rehearsal to Be Held Tomorrow Afternoon

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season of 1914, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, will take place. The concert will be given with only three members of the orchestra missing. Two of these are new members—Mr. Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack at the first 'cello desk, and Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and both are expected in Boston in time for next week's concerts.

Nothing has as yet been heard from Mr. Agnesy, one of the double-basses, who was in Austria last summer, but it is hoped that he will arrive within ten days. The programme of the public rehearsal Friday afternoon and the concert Saturday night is as follows: "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven; "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Euryanthe" overture, Weber.

Single tickets may be obtained at the box office for both afternoon and evening concerts.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 12,

Dr. Muck as Prophet

Even a man of Dr. Muck's sanity and sense of realities has not been able to escape the fatal temptation to prephesy as to the course of music on the Continent in the years after the war. He told a reporter the other day:

"In the art of both France and Germany decadent tendencies have increased particularly in the last ten years. These things, the morbidness of the deeper characters, the flippancy and affectation of self-styled esthetes, and a note of feminism in cultivated communities, which should have known better, will be wiped out. Such things are accomplished by war as they cannot be accomplished by any other agency. Undoubtedly the art of Europe during the next century will be far saner, broader, deeper than it has been of late. Art can no longer be stimulated by commercialism, to its own destruction, as has so frequently been the case. For many, many years building will be far more important than the composing of symphonies, and the result will be not disastrous, but of much benefit to musical composition.

"Sensationalism, money-making, appear today to be controlling factors in all fields of European art. A Reinhardt makes his Petruchio enter in 'The Taming of the Shrew' turning 'cartwheels' over the floor. This is taken to mean that Petruchio is an exceedingly debonair and, on occasion, forceful husband and a sated Berlin public attends to see just once what it looks like. A Strauss, in search of a new sensation or a new theme to stir his tired creative powers, selects subjects which hint always at the bizarre, extravagant, or even pornographic. There has been for the big artists almost too much comfort and prosperity. Living music is produced because of unshakable sincerity and because of a crying need."

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 12.

FORBEARANCE ASKED IN RANKS OF ORCHESTRA

H. L. Higginson Addresses Boston Symphony Men on Necessity of Their Observing Neutral Attitude on European War

Urging forbearance the coming year on the issues of the European conflict, Henry L. Higginson, sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra, addressed the members of the organization this morning when they came together for the first time to rehearse the program of the opening concerts under the conductorship of Karl Muck. The rehearsal was called at 10 o'clock and all the players were present. When they were assembled on the stage Mr. Higginson addressed them regarding the difficult conditions under which they must work this year, because so many of them belong to the different countries that are in conflict. He urged them to ignore everything which might lead to friction in the ranks.

At the end of his talk Mr. Higginson was applauded by the musicians. He spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen:

"It is pleasant to see you all, and I offer to you my kind greeting and best wishes, and I welcome the new comers to our orchestra.

"Nearly 60 years ago I dreamed of this orchestra for the sake of art and especially for the happiness and welfare of our people. For 34 years I have worked over it and, by the aid of many able and distinguished artists, the orchestra has been formed, and has reached its present point of excellence. I care very much for the orchestra.

"We meet again under difficult circumstances; we are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we all are on American soil, which is neutral. Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words or looks, for our task is to make harmony above all things—harmony even in the most modern music. I expect only harmony in your relations to one another.

"I had feared that we might not be able to give the concerts this year because the presence of Dr. Muck and of many members seemed unlikely. We have lost only a few men, and have filled their places well. The public has urgently asked me again and again for the concerts, and my only reply has been that it depended upon circumstances, and that, in case of a general war, the contracts allowed me to give up the concerts if I were not satisfied with the members to be had. It seemed clear that if one year passed without the concerts, we should hardly ever have the orchestra again, for to bring together the old men, who might have sought positions elsewhere, and to get the new men needed would be a great task, to which neither Dr. Muck nor I was equal. It has taken many years to make the orchestra, and you can understand how many years it would take to rebuild it.

"I have thought of you all as needing the work; I have thought of the beautiful concerts already given, and have thought of the people who wanted them, and, considering all these points, I wish to go on with the concerts.

"The conditions of this year were against us, and it was our part as men to overcome these conditions if we could. Dr. Muck has done his best. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan have done their best, and I ask your agreement to do your best and, under no circumstances however trying, to do or say anything which may cause friction. You have to sit together for rehearsals, for concerts, in the tuning room, in the railroad trains, in the hotels while on journeys. Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live.

"You all have at heart the reputation of our orchestra, which has achieved a fine name and which is known in Europe as well as here. It rests with you to keep that name bright, and to give to our public such concerts as we have had before."

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 10 1914

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck, who brought several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete. The changes caused by the war in Europe were much less than expected. Only two members of last year's orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Grisez, first clarinet, and Fosse, third oboe, both serving in the French army. Grisez's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation. Fosse's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall orchestra of London.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 7 - 1914

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS SEVERAL NEW MEMBERS

Dr. Carl Muck Director, Returns To-day from Germany.

Boston and Providence music lovers are pleased by the announcement that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York to-day from Europe and is bringing with him several new players, who will be heard in America this season for the first time.

Dr. Muck has spent the summer in Europe and a greater part of this time has been spent in Berlin, where he has been making arrangements to have several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra released from German military duty. Among the new artists who accompany Dr. Muck are M. Sand, a Russian clarinetist; Josef Malkin, 'cello virtuoso; M. Klicka, harp virtuoso; M. Stanislaus, oboe player, and two violinists.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date OCT 11 1914

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Some Important Engagements Made by Dr. Muck.

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck last week, who brought with him several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete for the season. The changes caused by the war in Europe were much less than the management dared to hope for a month ago. As it now turns out, only two members of the last year's orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fossé, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French army reserve. Luckily, Dr. Muck has been able to fill their places to his satisfaction. Mr. Grisez's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. Mr. Fossé's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, of London, where he held the post of first oboe.

Several other very important engagements have been made by Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, who shared the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke and was assistant conductor of the orchestra, has decided not to return to America, and his place in the 'cello section will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian 'cellist virtuoso of high reputation. Mr. Malkin was for a number of years the solo 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, and also was 'cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. A few years ago he did some concert work in this country. The assistant conductor of the orchestra will be Ernst Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt will occupy a desk in the first violins. He comes from Darmstadt, where he was concert master of the Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society. A second harpist has been engaged. Like Mr. Holy, the first harpist, the new member is a Bohemian. He is V. Klicka, and is famous throughout Europe. The Boston Orchestra was able to secure his services because he could not give a series of concerts he had planned in Europe this season on account of the war.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 11 1914

DR. KARL MUCK HOME AGAIN.

Two Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra Still in Europe.

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck, who brought with him several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete for the season. The changes caused by the war in Europe were much less than the management dared to hope for a month ago. As it now turns out, only two members of last year's orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Mr. Grizes, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French Army Reserve. Luckily Dr. Muck has been able to fill their places to his satisfaction. Mr. Grizes's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. Mr. Fosse's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus,, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra of London, where he held the post of first oboe.

Several other very important enagagements have been made by Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, who shared the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke and was assistant-conductor of the orchestra, has decided not to return to America and his place in the 'cello section will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian 'cellist virtuoso of high reputation. Mr. Malkin was for a number of years the solo 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin and also was 'cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. A few years ago he did some concert work in this country.

The assistant conductor of the orchestra will be Ernest Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt will occupy a desk in the first violins. He comes from Darmstadt where he was concert-master of the Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society.

A second harpist has been engaged. Like Mr. Holy, the first harpist, the new member is a Bohemian. He is Mr. V. Klicka and is famous throrghout Europe. The Boston Orchestra was able to secure his services because he could not give a series of concerts he had planned in Europe this winter, on account of the war.

The prospectus for Brooklyn calls for the usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 10. The soloists are Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone, Harold Bauer, the distinguished violinist, and Frits Kriesler. Mr. Kreisler is expected to arrive in America not later than the middle of December. A letter just received from him by Mr. Ellis, his manager, says that he is still lame but his arms and hands

---

From POST
Address: New York City
Date OCT 10 1914

As it now turns out, only two members of last year's Boston Symphony Orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fossé, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French Army Reserve. Luckily, Dr. Muck has been able to fill their places to his satisfaction. Mr. Grisez's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. Mr. Fossé's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, of London, where he held the post of first oboe. Several other very important engagements have been made by Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, who shared the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke and was assistant conductor of the orchestra, has decided not to return to America, and his place in the 'cello section will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian 'cellist virtuoso of high reputation. Mr. Malkin was for a number of years the solo 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, and also was 'cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. A few years ago he did some concert work in this country. The assistant conductor of the orchestra will be Ernst Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt will occupy a desk in the first violins. He comes from Darmstadt, where he was concert-master of the Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society.

From ...ile,
Address N. Y.
Date OCT 11 1914

Only two members have been unable to return to the Boston Symphony; they are, Mr. Grisez, first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, third oboe, both now in the French army reserve. Mr. Grisez's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a famed Russian clarinettist, who has been first clarinet in the Charlottenburg Opera. Mr. Fosse's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen Hall orchestra, London, where he was first oboe. The place of Mr. Urack, who formerly shared the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke and was assistant conductor, and who has decided not to return, will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian 'cellist virtuoso, who was solo 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Berlin, and also 'cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. He has played in concert here. The assistant conductor will be Ernst Schmidt, who will play with the first violinss. He comes from Darmstadt, where he was concert master of the Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society. V. Klicka, a famous harpist, will join Mr. Holy, the first harpist; both are Bohemians.

The prospectus for Brooklyn calls for the usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are: November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The soloists are Pasquale Amato, baritone; Harold Bauer, pianist, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who is expected to arrive in America not later than the middle of December. A letter recently received from him by Mr. Ellis, his manager, says that he is lame, but his arms and hands were not hurt.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 11 1914

New Artists for Boston.

The tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony will be mailed to subscribers within a few days. Failure to take up tickets immediately will result in the allotment of them to those on the waiting list. The season will begin in Boston Oct. 16.

Dr. Karl Muck, who returned from abroad last week, brought with him several new players for the Boston Symphony. Only two members of the organization have been unable to return because of military service. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinetist, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, are both serving in the French reserve. In their respective places A. Sand and H. H. Stanislaus have been placed. Mr. Urack, who shared the first 'cello desk with Mr. Warnke and was assistant conductor of the orchestra, has decided not to return to America, and his place has been taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian artist. Mr. Schmidt will occupy a desk in the first violins and act as assistant conductor. V. Klicka has been engaged as second harpist.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 11 1914
Date

Est 1884

With the return of Dr. Karl Muck last week, who brought with him several new members of the orchestra, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is complete for the season. The changes caused by the war in Europe were much less than the management dared to hope for a month ago. As it now turns out, only two members of last year's orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French army reserve. Luckily Dr. Muck has been able to fill their places to his satisfaction. Mr. Grisez's chair will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera. Mr. Fosse's place will be filled by H. H. Stanislaus, who comes from Sir Henry Wood's Queen Hall Orchestra of London, where he held the post of first oboe. Several other very important engagements have been made by Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, who shared the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke, and was assistant conductor of the orchestra, has decided not to return to America, and his place in the 'cello section will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian 'cellist virtuoso of high reputation. The assistant conductor of the orchestra will be Ernst Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt will occupy a desk in the first violins. He comes from Darmstadt, where he was concertmaster of the Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society. A second harpist has been engaged. Like Mr. Holy, the first harpist, the new member is a Bohemian. He is V. Klicka, and is famous throughout Europe. The prospectus for Brooklyn calls for the usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. The soloists are Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone; Harold Bauer, the distinguished violinist, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler is expected to arrive in America not later than the middle of December. A letter just received from him by Mr. Ellis, his manager, says that he is still lame, but his arms and hands were quite unhurt.

From BULLE
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 7 - 191

rk, 1884

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS SEVERAL NEW MEMBERS

Dr. Carl Muck Director, Returns To-day from Germany.

Boston and Providence music lovers are pleased by the announcement that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York to-day from Europe and is bringing with him several new players, who will be heard in America this season for the first time.

Dr. Muck has spent the summer in Europe and a greater part of this time has been spent in Berlin, where he has been making arrangements to have several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra released from German military duty. Among the new artists who accompany Dr. Muck are M. Sand, a Russian clarinetist; Josef Malkin, 'cello virtuoso; M. Klicka, harp virtuoso; M. Stanislaus, oboe player, and two violinists.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in EVUE,
From
Address: New York City
Date [illegible] 1914

rk, 1884

Perſönliches und Sonſtiges.

Dr. Carl Muck, der bekannte Dirigent des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, iſt mit ſeiner Gattin wieder hier eingetroffen.

Für die neue Saiſon bringt Herr Muck verſchiedene neue Compoſitionen von Schönberg, Reger, Vollbach, Strawinsky und Roparz mit. Mit ihm kommen 4 Mitglieder des Orcheſters, und zwar der Concertmeiſter Otto Roth mit Familie, Albert Sand, Hubert W. Sauvlet und nrick van Veen.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 11 1914

k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making this year its twenty-ninth consecutive announcement of concerts in Baltimore. The Orchestra was only five years old when it first began to come to this city, and since the very beginning, in the spring of 1886, it has been a most important factor in Baltimore musical life. In the coming season it will give its usual series of five Wednesday evening concerts in the Lyric Theater, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

All reports and rumors to the contrary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beginning its season in Boston next week with practically its entire personnel intact.

Dr. Muck, who returned from Europe this week, is beginning his fifth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the third year of his present engagement. Under his skilful leadership the Orchestra has made vast strides forward. It has never played so brilliantly as under Dr. Muck and its patronage has never been so great. In both respects it is safe to promise that 1914-15 will be a repetition of 1913-14.

The management of the Orchestra announces at this time three soloists for the Baltimore series. These will be Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian barytone; Harold Bauer, the pianist, and Fritz Kreisler. Practically all of Mr. Amato's time before the opening of the season of opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, is to be given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he is to be soloist at several concerts, and in other concerts under the management of C. A. Ellis. Mr. Amato is singing with the Orchestra this year for the first time. He needs no introduction to the Baltimore public, which justly admires his fine art.

No more introduction to Baltimore needs Harold Bauer. Mr. Bauer's progress in the esteem of the musical public of the country at large has grown enormously in the last few years. He is one of the truly great pianists of our time.

As for Fritz Kreisler, despite the many rumors as to misfortunes which have attended his military service in Austria, there is practically no doubt that he will be in America to fulfill the engagements of his tour, which begins the first of January. He saw active service in Austria on the Galician frontier and, from most trustworthy accounts, was slightly hurt in a melee with Cossack cavalry. He is now in Vienna and will reach this country the end of December.

RECORD, SATURDAY.
OCTOBER 24 1914

NEW SYMPHONY WELL RECEIVED

Ropartz Composition Makes a Favorable Impression on First Hearing.

The feature of yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the playing for the first time in this city of the Ropartz Symphony No. 4. While one hearing rarely affords the listener an adequate opportunity of properly estimating such a work, there was no question yesterday afternoon of the favorable impression made.

It is evidently the work of a master who has something definite to say, his own way of saying it and that way a most interesting one. Here is no searching for what one is tempted to call freak lines. Ropartz is not always at his best in giving expression to his thoughts, but without question he knows his orchestra. Particularly charming were the strings and the bits of solo work scattered throughout the piece. Another hearing would evidently be well worth while, as well as more of the same composer's writings.

One could but wish the composer could have had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Muck's fine reading of the number as did George Chadwick yesterday, when his "Symphonic Sketches" aroused such enthusiasm that he was obliged to rise in his place in the audience and acknowledge the applause. They are gems, with the "Noel" the bright particular star.

Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," the first number on the program, was played in memory of Gardiner M. Lane, the Boston banker and philanthropist.

Sibelius numbers, three in all, "Karelia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" fittingly closed one of the most enjoyable of concerts.

Next week brings the first soloist of the season, Pasquale Amato. The

---

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17 1914

First Symphony Ushers In Season's Concerts

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme.
Strauss—"Don Juan." Tone poem.
Weber—"Euryanthe" overture.

This programme might be labelled "Made in Germany," and it was purely orchestral, a matter which we always approve of. Dr. Muck was welcomed with even more than the usual cordiality when he took the stand, for there was some doubt about our getting him out of the European cauldron, and when we found not only our German conductor, but some excellent Austrian, French and Belgian players saved to us (MM. Holy, Longy and Lenom, for example) we were glad to see that the war had not destroyed our symphonic art. Many of the audience rose as the conductor entered to do him honor, says Louis C. Elson in his review of the Symphony's opening in the Advertiser.

There was not quite the ensemble in the opening Symphony that we shall get by mid-season, but there was such an excellent reading of the work, and so much of hearty enthusiasm, that the old work was as virile and powerful as ever. It was born of war. Every great war leaves music in its wake, and a century ago Europe was in almost as universal throes as at present.

It remains to be seen whether Richard Strauss will give us an orchestral setting of the present turmoil which shall stand beside the "Heroic" symphony.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Who was given a most enthusiastic reception.

"Don Juan" is not Strauss' greatest work, but it is exciting nevertheless, and even if one is not entirely in sympathy with the hero's scientific investigations of the female sex, and his rather exacting search after an ideal, the orchestration is sparkling and difficult, and the jugglery of figures attractive. It is not quite as definite programme-music, not quite as clear a set of pictures, as the baby and the Strauss family, in the "Sinfonia Domestica," and not at all on the level of "Zarathustra," not to speak of "Death and Transfiguration." But it was a great revelation to hear such a difficult score in the very first concert of the season. It had excellent ensemble and thrilling power. The violins did wonderfully well, and it was not the right kind of weather for a "biting" string tone. In spite of this and of the sultry atmosphere of the hall the violin tones were anything but "dead."

The technique displayed proved at once that all of our old favorites have returned, only we miss the excellent Urack, and especially our fine clarinettist, M. Grisez. We seem to have bad luck with clarinettists, for the best one we ever heard is at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, and now another one is swallowed up by the war.

Weber's theatrical music formed a showy end to the concert. The contrasts here were very sharply drawn, but Weber stands these abrupt transitions very well. There is the glare of the footlights in all his overtures, and they are easily comprehended by the average auditor. "Euryanthe" made a showy end to a fine and sensibly varied programme. The 34th season of the Symphony Orchestra will be as great as its 33 predecessors.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
, OCTOBER 24,

EXCELLENT START FOR SYMPHONY

The 34th Season Inaugurated in a Most Impressive Manner.

The 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in a most successful manner. A strikingly cordial reception was accorded Dr. Muck as he took his place at the conductor's stand. Many in the audience, that practically filled the hall, stood up as Dr. Muck entered.

The "Eroica" symphony, with which the concert opened, could well have caused reflections on the present European struggle and speculation as to whether there is a musician today who can echo the Beethoven work with Europe in 1914 as the theme.

Brahms's "Variations" is more of an example of what a composer can do than a composition for the average musical audience.

The Strauss tone poem was noticeably well given, while the "Euryanthe" overture provided a welcome close. The concert was a bit long and many left the hall after the Brahms selection.

Dr. Muck Welcomed Again

Warmly as the audience at the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening received Dr. Muck and numerous and eager as it was, it could not equal the applause which the company of Friday lavished on the returned conductor and which set a new precedent in such things at Symphony Hall. None the less, the plaudits were long and hearty when Dr. Muck came to his place and twice he had to turn to his audience in acknowledgment when he had already opened his score and lifted his stick. Again the company rose in his honor, but Mr. Higginson, for some reason, did not renew his usual greeting to the conductor. Long and loud, also, was the applause for both orchestra and leader at the end of the "Eroica" symphony and of Strauss's "Don Juan." To the listener at both concerts Dr. Muck and the men seemed on Saturday evening to carry yet higher or deeper, as the music asked, the bright or the darksome incandescence of Beethoven's melodies and to intensify the mournful clangors and the tossing rhythms of the Funeral March. It became music for heroes. They seemed, likewise, to excel themselves in the tonal vividness, the energy of imagination and projection, the nervous force and the creative energy that make theme and progression, delineation and development in "Don Juan" an irresistible intoxication. Yet the applause was less than on the day before—one more proof, perhaps, of the gradual shifting of the centre of gravity, so to say, at the Symphony Concerts from that of Saturday evening to that of Friday afternoon. The change has been discernible for three years past and now it is the audience of the so-called and absurdly named "rehearsals" that is more eager, intent, responsive and stimulating.

Trans, Oct 19

[21]

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ROPARTZ'S MUSIC DISAPPOINTS ANTICIPATIONS

A Carved and Lifeless Symphony That Echoed Franck from Its Emptiness—The Puissant and Diverse Sibelius of Three Tone-Poems—Mr. Chadwick in His Best, Truest and Most American Vein

IF Ropartz's new symphony proved less interesting and individual than there was reason to expect at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, the other pieces on the programme made amends and more, while throughout conductor and orchestra played them with the sense and the revelation of the particular voice and style of each that have become two of their finest distinctions. For the first time at the Symphony Concerts three of Sibelius's tone-poems were assembled in a single group: "Karelia," which in strict form is an overture; "The Swan of Tuonela" and the more familiar, "Finlandia." Each in its kind, all three were stirring to ear and feeling and all three were characteristic of the composer before he acquired his newest idiom and manner which, three weeks hence, Dr. Muck is to exemplify once more in a repetition of the puzzling and reprobated fourth symphony, heard for the first time last autumn. Whatever Sibelius writes, his music is usually stimulating to hear by its contrasts in matter and manner with much other music of our time; for, if ever a composer went his own way—perhaps under the isolation of his solitary country house and his secluded life in Finland—it is Sibelius.

Contemporary composers tend to be diffuse and vague. Sibelius, in contrast, is terse and pregnant and three of his tone-poems fill no more than half an hour. Often his fellows court the long thematic thought that they can break into fragments and use seriatim as it were. Sibelius's musical ideas, on the other hand, are short-favored, as the old New England word might put it, sharp of outline and concentrated of substance and feeling. He addresses his audience directly and in the three tone-poems of yesterday with a relative simplicity and frankness of progression and modulation, of harmonic and instrumental color. Not a few of his brethren lead their hearers through long and intricate periods that better prove their ingenuity than their vividness of expression. The usual modern orchestra suffices for Sibelius; to others he leaves the assembling of strange or multiplied instruments. Yet how completely his music expresses itself and infuses into the hearer the emotional impulses, the visions and the memories that have prompted it! As economically and as fully as it is written, it accomplishes its expressive ends.

In the three pieces of yesterday these ends were diverse indeed. "The Swan of Tuonela" is tone-painting and nothing else that, with a hint from title and programme, shall transmit to the hearer the aspect and the atmosphere of a visualized scene—the dark, fringed and still river of the Finnish Hades and upon the black and rippleless waters, a white and singing swan swimming its circles. And now and then leafage and waters shall shiver as though the breath of everlasting mysteries had ruffled them; and once the song of the swan shall seem to flood the stillness; and as it dies away, the listening spirits of the dead shall sigh with its last breathings. How vividly the music achieves the picture, not merely in the poignant and mysterious melody of the swan, in its echoes out of the shadows, in its long rise and fall, and in its final flutterings, but also in its insistent suggestion of the stillness and the remoteness of the scene, of the surrounding blackness and the white and floating pinions, of the tremulous and ghostly listeners. Here is sound that summons stillness and colorful music that yet paints in black and white.

Of another sort is "Karelia," overture or tone-poem that would catch into tones the moods that one of the softer Finnish landscapes and one of the livelier Finnish folk evoked in Sibelius—sturdy music, colored through and through with the white sunshine and the recurring shadows of the north, moving to heady rhythms that Dr. Muck's instinct for the beat of music made headier still; now swinging forward as in stout peasant dance, now expanding and flooding through the orchestra in a climax of sympathetic emotion; music that sounds as though it were written in a heat and under irresistible impulse. Akin yet diverse is the ampler and sterner "Finlandia." The music begins in sombre imagery; it rises into sombre splendor as though Sibelius were stirred by some veiled and grim image of his country. Emotion swells in him; the music sweeps forward in long progressions or the stark phrases fall like blows. They begin to move restlessly; the music rustles with the stirring of all the Finns; the host springs forward; its visions lead it; there is climax of fulfilment. "Finlandia" is national music, but national music written with high imagination and enkindled power; a national hymn, if the listener likes so to respond to it, but a national hymn made symphonic.

For interlude, as it seemed, between Ropartz's symphony and these pieces of Sibelius and in singular contrast to the memorial music for the late Mr. Lane that prefaced the concert—Mozart's "Masonic Mourning"—stood Mr. Chadwick's robustly gay or gently sentimental "Symphonic Sketches," first and happily discovered for the Symphony Concerts by Dr. Muck and rewarded, as usual, with rounds of applause that finally brought the composer to his feet in his modest place in the audience. Mr. Chadwick is, indeed, fain to write impassioned tone-poems in modern idiom about the loves of Antony and Cleopatra or the [illegible] of Aphrodite. He used to labor upon grave symphonies in the manner of Brahms. His ambition and in some respects his accomplishment, have praised him, but he seems most his natural, his spontaneous, his finely achieving self in these simpler and lighter pieces like the "Symphonic Sketches" of yesterday, the little symphony that Dr. Muck revived last winter and the amiable quartet that "The Kneisels" reproduced a year ago. Who from "Aphrodite" and "Antony and Cleopatra" would suspect Mr. Chadwick as a humorist in music? Yet he is clearly such in the first and the fourth of the sketches and an American humorist to boot, since his humor is of the tonally unexpected. The tone-poems labor for passion along their course; try as he may Mr. Chadwick cannot write erotic music; but how exuberantly the "Jubilee" of the first sketch and "The Vagrom Ballad" of the fourth flow along.

If ever there was American music, also these two pieces are such. In us all, unless we have been warped and withered out of all sentient being, is the desire "to go on the loose," and what is "Jubilee" but symphonic music gone on a spree, but stopping occasionally to poetize along the way, and so to climb the heights of symphony concerts? And poets, as we all know, have their sprees, like the rest of us—sometimes a little oftener—and ply their imagination in the course of them. And who but an American would write a symphonic ditty of tramps, call it a "Vagrom Ballad," not quite dare to rhyme "rum" with "bum," but boldly quote Bach on the xylophone, and then pause for musing, as though the sentimentalist that is in Mr. Chadwick—and most of us Americans—had come along, too? Moreover, when he is frankly sentimental, as in the little adagio of the mother and her baby on a Christmas Eve, he is homely, tender, wholesome, in our average American way, and he finds twenty times more expressive tones for it than he did for Egyptian lusts or Cyprian glamours. The tonal whimsies of the scherzo of Puck are American, too. No heavy-footed British hob-goblin is this sprite, but a nervous American urchin. When Mr. Chadwick chooses to write in his most spontaneous and distinctive vein there is no American composer so thoroughly and naturally American. And his light vein is his best. Once upon a time a shrewd manager said that he might have given American operetta a place in the world had he chosen to write it.

As for the new symphony, it is one thing for César Franck to write according to the Franckian formulas and in the Franckian idiom and another thing for Guy Ropartz, forty odd years afterward, to be as faithful to both. With the master's teachings, Franck's pupils absorbed a fidelity to them that plays through the music that each and every one subsequently wrote—d'Indy's and Chausson's, Duparc's and Bréville's. Yet when they and all the rest followed the Franckian procedures and spoke with the Franckian intonations they also individualized them and made them in more or less degree their own characteristic method and utterance. Duparc added subtlety to them; Bréville glamors them rosily; d'Indy has amplified, intensified and exalted them till, as some say, he excels his master.

In Ropartz's symphony, however, so far as one hearing disclosed its matter and manner, there is no such individualizing of the Franckian heritage. He is unmistakably master of it. No symphony could more closely follow the "cyclic" formula from the generative measures whence the musical thoughts spring, through their ascents and descents, their contrasts and interplay until they finally vaporize into the air. The melodies are delicately incisive, especially when Ropartz confides them to the penetrating and plaintive voices of the wood choir with light tinklings of the harps to point them. They broaden in grave and suave expansions against a background of vaporous harmonies, they rise and break in soft clangors; they flow in melting and sometimes lovely phrases, or they wander about—a little aimlessly—in the higher registers of the strings.

Now all this is Franckian, even if it is touched here and there with the acid harmonies, the acrid modulations or the sharp-edged climaxes of the other and greater disciple, d'Indy. These, however, seemed willed passages: Ropartz's natural voice runs in subdued Franckian tones out of which nearly all vitality and individuality have oozed away. Instead of the deep intensity of Franck's passionate moods of sublimated aspiration, Ropartz can attain no more than a dreamy longing. For Franck's ecstatic visions in tones he substitutes a beatific grace. In lieu of Franck's noble exaltation, Ropartz meditates piously. The homely gaiety of Franck—the joy of a simple spirit in simple things—becomes in Ropartz no more than amiable tonal pleasantry. A unique personality speaks out of Franck's music and speaking animates it; Ropartz's symphony leaves no impression of a clear individuality first permeating it and then exhaling from it.

From beginning to end, except in happy strokes of detail, it is imitative work and Ropartz in the fiftieth year of his age should have left such doing three decades behind. On the surface are the Franckian contours, skilfully modelled and the Franckian colors laid on with an adroit hand; superficially, the carver of the music has caught the Franckian feeling, yet within the symphony is empty of all the vitalizing emotions and the kindling personality that make Franck's music what it is. And in technical perfections, flawless jointure, the laying of paragraph and paragraph and almost phrase and phrase impeccably side by side, Ropartz's symphony is a carven music. Try as they might Dr. Muck and his men could not animate its delicate incisiveness, its meandering suavities, its gravely gentle clangors, its momentary explosions. There are moods in hearers that invite such music; there are quite as many in perverse human nature that almost resent it. H. T. P.

BOSTON GLOBE
OCTOBER 24,

ROPARTZ' SYMPHONY.

Modern French Work of Good Musicianship.

Pieces by Mr Chadwick and Three by Sibelius Played.

The second Symphony rehearsal was held yesterday afternoon. Dr Muck conducted.

Mozart—Masonic Funeral Music.
(In Memoriam: Gardiner Martin Lane.)
Ropartz—Fourth symphony, C major.
First time in Boston.
Chadwick—Symphonic Sketches.
Sibelius—"Karelia," "The Swan of Tuonela," "Finlandia."

It was to be expected that Ropartz, a true and recognized pupil of Cesar Franck, should have reflected something of the thought and style of the master. Vincent d'Indy's tribute to his colleague's appreciation of their teacher is a beautiful and generous one. It is at once clear that the influence of Franck has molded the writer of this symphony. It mirrors at times that reflective cast of mind in which he mused upon spiritual rather than temporal things. It has something of the serenity. It radiates something of the heavenly light. It is not obvious music, and will not arouse the general public to demonstrations, but it reveals individuality, a clear musical sense and attains beauty if not always inspiration.

In absorbing his teacher's manner, Ropartz has not been merely a copyist. There are traces here of other controling minds. "Tristan and Isolda" must have been well known to him, and he has observed, if not too seriously emulated, the pursuits of the modern French school. There is something of the whole tone harmonic basis, but it is not as though the writer had laboriously taught himself to compose in this rather than in the diatonic scale. There is a directness, a sincerity, for the greater part a spontaneity of expression, yet it is music that does not reveal too eagerly its secrets, as though the author, fearful lest jaded or indiscriminate ears should not at once harken, had made doubly sure of his part.

The symphony as a whole—the four movements or sections are played without pause—is not of equal interest. The scherzo is less fertile in ideas. There is a broad and songful treatment of the theme, but this section is less well sustained, less direct and convincing than the two which precede. While not the mystic nor the man of exalted thought that was Cesar Franck, Ropartz reflects in the first half of his symphony an introspective vision, the power to contemplate and commune, which has always marked the creative minds to whose call beauty has answered most generously.

The contrasting section of the first movement, "Jubilee," of Mr Chadwick's suite and the second or slow movement, "Noel," are wholly pleasing for their melodic vein, a type of melody suggesting often the songs of the Southern negro, for their harmonization, rich, yet not marring their quaint flavor, and for their orchestral color. Mr Chadwick was applauded heartily as he rose twice from his place on the floor.

Sibelius' three pieces are of epic character. In matters little whether he puts a song of bodeful sinister melancholy into the mouth of the swan of the black, broad river of Finnish mythology or voices the martial cry of courage and purposefulness of his people, there is national rather than personal feeling; the speech of a people rather than an individual.

The grouping of the three numbers was fortunate. In parts of his later symphonies Sibelius has been deep in despair to the extent of monotony. Here he speaks of National sorrow, it is true, but there are pages of noble resignation, of exhortation, of rousing rebellion, of unconquerable pride. These numbers, as the others, were played by Dr Muck and the orchestra with the perception and virtuosity that is synonymous with these concerts. Particularly was the performance of the symphony well considered and well executed.

Mr Amato, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be heard in numbers from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII" and Handel's "Serse" ("Largo") at the next concerts. The orchestral numbers will be Brahms' second symphony, Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" and Enesco's suite for orchestra, op 9.

The Impending New Symphony

Yesterday these columns contained some account of Ropartz as man, composer and writer about music. Here follows today a note about the new symphony, his fourth, that is to make him known virtually for the first time in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. Like the article of yesterday, it is from the hand of Mr. P. G. Clapp.

Ropartz's fourth symphony (Boston, Boston Music Co., 1914) received its first manuscript performance in October, 1911, at a Lamoureux concert under Camille Chevillard; it was then praised by several of the Parisian critics, among them the composer Bruneau. The symphony is played without pause, but divides itself naturally into three divisions, almost into three movements. It is scored for only three more instruments than are found in Beethoven's Leonore overture (No. 3)—bass clarinet, tuba and harp.

Allegro moderato, C major, 4-4. After two measures of the accompaniment figure, the principal theme, consisting of a rising figure of four notes and then figures derived from it, is announced quietly by the first violins in their low register. The theme climbs an octave higher; the instrumentation becomes richer. The violins have a counter theme, and the principal theme is proclaimed broadly by four horns. A new figure in triplets is introduced by the horns; there is a long transition, with a gradual modulation toward E major. The second theme is not announced at once, and when it does come it is purposely not so striking as the principal theme. The development section is long, and not only is the foregoing material all used, but new ideas are allowed continually to grow out of it. The climax of the division is when, after a long and mysterious insistence on a chord of C-sharp minor, the principal theme bursts forth with the full orchestra in C major. The principal theme dominates the recapitulation, the triplet figure of the transition has its say, the second theme is only touched upon. At the close various brass instruments answer each other in a curious descending call which later becomes the first two notes in the theme of the second movement.

If there is more than a little Franck in the principal theme, if there are too many relapses into C major, nevertheless the first movement atones for these slight faults by its richness and warmth, its radiant happiness and beauty. By dint of beautiful melody and harmony, real power in the broader and statelier passages, and masterly instrumentation the first movement makes and should make its mark, with promise of something still better to follow. What happens?

Adagio, E minor, 4-4. The English horn, accompanied softly by strings, intones an obviously manufactured melody of neutral emotional content over a rambling harmonic procedure. Presently a twice repeated sudden and inexplicable dissonance, followed by aimless attempts to modulate, fails adequately to prepare the way for a graceful clarinet melody, allegretto, B major (shifting rhythms), which is pretty and pleasing, but wholly out of keeping with what has gone before. The English horn theme, now in the strings, takes a dance-like form, which, after one more appearance each in turn of the graceful melody, the original adagio theme, the inexplicable dissonance and the aimless attempt at modulation, is put through its paces in a futile and uninteresting fugato. By way of compensation, perhaps, the graceful melody now gains and keeps the upper hand for some time. The climax occurs with the dance-like figure in the trumpets, answered by the horns; then there is a return to the original mood, with some new material. A lame transitional passage leads to:

Allegro molto, C minor, 3-4. This scherzo finale opens with a rude theme for strings derived from a subsidiary motive for trumpet in the first movement, over a running accompaniment derived from the dance-like figure in the second movement. This main theme of the scherzo finale is stated and developed at some length. Reminiscences from the previous movement, but always of subordinate material, are freely employed. There is modulation through various keys. New themes are plentifully derived from old sources, some perhaps from outside the symphony. At the close the rhythm, mood and some of the material of the first movement are reestablished; the quiet close recalls the opening and principal theme of the whole composition, and is quietly impressive—what a pity that its quiet impressiveness could not have been enhanced by a preceding climax instead of an anti-climax! Beautiful, however, the ending is, and it will probably succeed with the unwary in obliterating the impression that the scherzo finale is the weakest part of the work, where it should be the strongest.

Gut of Sibelius

Two other quasi-novelties stand also on Dr. Muck's programme—Sibelius's tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela" and his early overture, "Karelia"—each played here once and almost en passant in Mr. Fiedler's time. Now Tuonela is the Finnish Hades and the spirits of men wending thither must traverse nine seas and one river on which floats and sings:

> . . . the long-necked, graceful swimmer,
> Swimming in the black-death river,
> In the sacred stream and whirlpool.

And Lemmankäinen, the hero of Finnish saga, came upon a time to Tuonela and looked upon the swan and heard its song. The English horn sings it long and sadly in the tone-poem until it floods the music and then dies into the echoing darkness again. "Karelia," celebrating the brightest and the merriest district of Finland, runs in lighter and warmer vein.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 18 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The outlook for the season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington is said to be excellent. The renewal of subscriptions has been very large and comparatively few seats are left for the general sale, which will open at Droop's music store Tuesday morning. The concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

The management announces three soloists, all artists of exceptional distinction. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Pasquale Amato of the Metropolitan Opera Mouse, New York. The others are Harold Bauer, one of the great living pianists, and Fritz Kreisler, who has escaped the perils of the war in Galicia with only a slight hurt. He was in the fighting around Lemberg, and was ridden over by cavalry as he lay in the trenches. The result was what athletes call "a pulled tendon" in his left leg, but neither of his invaluable arms or hands was injured. He is now in Vienna recuperating, and expects to come to this country in December.

Dr. Muck has announced some interesting novelties, and if they prove of high value, some of them will be heard in the Washington concerts.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 11 191

With the return of Dr. Muck from Europe last week more definite announcements than were previously possible in regard to the Boston Symphony season became possible. The war has affected the organization much less than was feared. All the German and Austrian contingents have been able to return, and the only two members that are left in Europe are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, who are serving in the French territorial army.

The five soloists so far engaged for the season here comprise three singers, a violinist and a pianist. The singers are Mme. Schumann-Heink, Miss Florence Hinkle and Pasquale Amato. The pianist is Harold Bauer, and the violinist is Anton Witek. One soloist is to be added to the list.

Of all the artists who appear in Providence from year to year none is more justly popular than the German contralto, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will sing at the opening concert on Oct. 20. Among the contraltos of the world she holds an undisputed foremost place.

Mr. Urack, who served last year as assistant conductor of the orchestra and directed several of the concerts in this city, will not return, as he is remaining in Germany. His place will be taken by Mr. Malkin, a virtuoso of European standing in orchestral and chamber concerts and not so long ago first 'cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin. The new first clarinet is Mr. Sand, a Russian from the Deutsche Opernhaus at Charlottenburg, and the new harpist is a Bohemian, Mr. Klicka, of high reputation in Germany and Austria, whom the war has set free from his engagements at home Dr. Muck has also engaged two new players for the first violins—Mr. Schmidt, late the concertmaster of the orchestra at Darmstadt, upon which the Grand Duke of Hesse and Mr. Weingartner equally lavish their cares; and Mr. Souvlet from The Hague. From The Hague also will come a new viola player, Mr. Van Veen; and Mr. Stanislaus of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London will take Mr. Fosse's place among the oboes while the French virtuoso is in the field.

* * *

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 17 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PRESENT FINE NOVELTIES

Dr. Karl Muck has announced a tentative list of novelties for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which promise much to the lover of new music. These include pieces by Schoenberg, who is called "the musical monarch;" Korngold, the marvelous boy composer of Vienna, and Stravinsky, the ultra-modern Russian composer.

The season of the orchestra opened in Boston this last week and the orchestra was able to present full ranks for its first concert. It contains this year some new members, as had been planned, but only two of last year's force have been compelled to stay in Europe on account of the war. These are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe. Mr. Grisez's place has been filled by Mr. Sand, a Russian, who is one of the most famous clarinet players in Europe, and comes from Charlottenburg Opera House, Berlin. Mr. Fosse's place has been filled by Mr. Stanislaus, who has been first oboe in Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 3 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Since the original announcement made by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regarding the six concerts that the orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter, the name of Pasuale Amato has been added to the list of solo!sits. The list now stands—Amato, Madame Schumann-Heink, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek—as strong and interesting a list as the orchestra has ever presented in this city, and one which comprises three most distinguished singers.

Amato is now on his way to America, having left Italy early in order to fill a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony. He is one of the rare Italian opera singers who has made a success in concert work.

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts, the dates of which are Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 29, Feb. 2, March 2, and April 13, will open at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street, Monday, Oct. 12.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 26 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is every indication that the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence will show an improvement even over last year, when the high-water mark of subscription and single sales was reached. Last year's subscribers have been renewing their subscriptions for the coming season since last spring and very few have given up their seats, while the number of new subscribers will be considerable. The orchestra will give its usual series of six concerts on Tuesday evenings in Infantry hall, the dates being Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 29, Feb. 2, March 2 and April 13, and the general sale of tickets will open at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, Oct. 12.

Despite all reports and rumors to the contrary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season with its personnel intact. Several changes have been made in the membership, and of these two or three were unexpected, owing to as many of the younger members having been called to military service in their several countries. All of their places, however, have been filled satisfactorily by Dr. Muck, who has been in Berlin busily preparing for the season since the middle of August. Dr. Muck is on his way to America and should arrive in Boston Oct. 5. On his arrival it will be possible to make more definite announcements as to his plans for the winter.

The list of soloists for Providence is not yet complete. Up to the present, those engaged are Madame Schumann-Heink, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 18 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Boston this last week and the orchestra was able to present full ranks for its first concert. It contains this year some new members, as had been planned, but only two of last year's force have been compelled to stay in Europe on account of the war. These are Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe. Mr. Grisez's place has been filled by Mr. Sand, a Russian, who is one of the most famous clarinet players in Europe and comes from the Charlottenburg Opera House, Berlin. Mr. Fosse's place has been filled by Mr. Stanislaus, who has been first oboe in Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has announced a tentative list of novelties which promise much to the lover of new music. These include pieces by Schoenberg, who is called "the musical anarch;" Korngold, the marvelous boy composer, of Vienna, and Stravinsky, the ultra-modern Russian composer. The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in Baltimore is now going on at Albaugh's ticket office, and the prospects are for a very successful season here. The first concert will be given Wednesday evening, November 4.

16

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 10 1914

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued the prospectus of the concerts it will give in Baltimore during the coming season. As usual, they will be five in number and given on Wednesday nights, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January [illegible], February 17 and March 17. Three soloists are announced at this time for the Baltimore concerts. They are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler.

It is impossible at this time to give an outline of Dr. Muck's program plans for the season, but he will undoubtedly follow out his usual course of drawing equally from classical and

[23]

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 17 1914

Boston Symphony

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore this winter has been in progress at Albaugh's Ticket Office since last Monday. The results are said to be highly satisfactory.

The season of the Orchestra opened in Boston last week and the Orchestra was able to present full ranks for its first concert. It contains, this year, some new members, as had been planned, but only two of last year's force have been compelled to stay in Europe on account of the war. Dr. Karl Muck has announced a tentative list of novelties which promise much to the lover of new music. These include pieces by Schoenberg, who is called "the musical anarch," Korngold, the marvelous boy composer of Vienna, and Stravinsky, the ultra-modern Russian composer.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding its regular auction sales of season tickets for its home concerts the coming week. All the tickets for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts are sold by auction, and it takes four days to do the work. The indications are that the sale will be one of the largest in the history of the organization.

With the arrival of Dr. Muck from Europe, the middle of the week, it will be possible to make final definite announcement regarding his plans. The Baltimore season is already of assured success. The subscription is larger than ever before. The five concerts on Wednesday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16, will be practically sold out for the season. Such seats as have not been taken by subscription are going on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office Monday morning, October 12.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT [illegible] 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The period for the renewal of subscriptions for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Washington ended yesterday and Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, who represents the orchestra here, reports that results are in every respect up to expectations. Such seats as have not already been taken for the season will be placed on sale at Droop's music store Tuesday, October 20.

The following changes in the orchestra are announced. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, are serving in the French army. Mr. Grisez's place will be taken by Mr. Sand, a Russian clarinetist, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet in the Deutsches Opernhaus of Berlin. Mr. Fosse's place will be taken by H. H. Stanislaus, an Englishman, who up to this year has been the first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, in London.

Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, has not returned. He has decided to stay in Germany. His place at the first desk of the cellos has been taken by Josef Malkin, for a number of years solo 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He was also cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. As assistant conductor Ernst Schmidt of Darmstadt has been engaged. Mr. Schmidt will be one of the first violins. He was former concertmaster of the Darmstadt Orchestra and conductor of the oratorio society of that city.

Another engagement of importance is that of V. Klicka, as a second harp of the orchestra. Mr. Klicka is a renowned harp virtuoso, and the orchestra, it is declared, could not have secured his services had not the war put an end to music on the continent.

Dr. Muck is back in America and the rehearsals of the orchestra start tomorrow. The five Washington concerts will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT

Estab

BRILLIANT OPENI SYMPHONY SEA

Boston Orchestra and Pasq Amato Rendered Programme That Delighted Large and Appreciative Audience.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert the local musical season may be said to be really begun. That commencement was recorded last night when the usual big audience which greets this noted musical organization filled Infantry Hall with appreciative listeners who did not fail to give a warm welcome to Dr. Muck, the capable and popular conductor, and his aggregation of musicians who are held in high esteem in this city. The applause was liberal and there was every manifestation of enjoyment of the programme and appreciation of the fact that Providence is afforded this opportunity to hear the best music by players of the highest reputation and skill.

For this opening concert of the season Dr. Muck selected three great great orchestral classics by great composers, Beethoven, Straus and Weber. This trio offers a variety and excellence of productions that can hardly be surpassed and they were represented by numbers which could not fail to afford pleasure to all lovers of music. The soloist for the initial concert was Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is singing this year for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His offering consisted of two numbers from Saint Saens and Handel. These rounded out the programme and made it one of rare merit.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55............Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo; Allegro Vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale; Allegro molto.
Aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act 1, Scene 4..................Saint-Saens
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20......Richard Strauss
Air, "Ombra mai fu" from the opera, "Serse," Act 1, Scene 1.......Handel
Overture to "Euryanthe".......Weber

The symphony from Beethoven's "Eroica" is regarded as one of the immortal productions of the great composer, and quite in his characteristic vein. Written in honor of Napoleon, it is a notable monument to that soldier and commander. It embodies orchestral music of great diversity, but singular beauty and richness. It held the audience intent last night, and was received at the close of the several parts with enthusiastic applause. There are portions which delight with their delicacy and the others that please by the fullness of tone and the martial spirit that animates them. The rendition was admirable. Dr. Muck had his musicians in full control and his leadership was as skilful and effective as ever.

Of the other orchestral numbers the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Strauss, was a gem, and the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber was as welcome as it always is. The former is passionate and thrilling, throbbing with feeling and expressing it in a manner that grips. The overture is marked by brilliance with passages that are tender and appealing. Both were played with characteristic spirit and fine attention to detail. There is never any uncertainty felt in listening to this orchestra, but always an assurance that the music will be rendered with no lapse of skill and no lack of finish.

Dr. Amator sang twice, and was accorded a warm welcome by those who had heard him before and those who knew him only by reputation. He has a wonderful voice, and may well be regarded as one of the best baritone singers before the public to-day. His voice is rich and full, strong and yet smooth. There is a beauty in the notes and an evidence of musicianly training that makes his singing charming in every detail. He sings easily and naturally with no attempt at display and with perfect good taste.

The numbers were the aria from "Henry VIII.," and a selection from the opera, "Serse," and both were sung with marked feeling and displayed his voice in all its admirable qualities.

It was an auspicious beginning of the series of six concerts which will be given during this 34th season of the orchestra in this city.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 1914

Established:

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROVES ATTRACTIVE

Thirty-fourth Season Opened at Infantry Hall.

AMATO IN PLEASING VOICE

Celebrated Italian Baritone Vigorously Applauded After Each Appearance, and Forced to Respond to Encores.—Dr. Muck Conducts Programme.

A romantic programme was the offering with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 34th season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing its 136th concert, the first of a series of six which will be given here during the season.

A large audience greeted Dr. Muck with moderate applause as he appeared upon the stage, and seemed to find great enjoyment in the programme which was given in the following order:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55,
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funenre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens..................................
..Aria, "Qui donc commande quandil aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act. 1, Scene 4.
Richard Strauss ....
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Handel ....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse," Act. I., Scene 1.
Weber...............Overture to "Euryanthe"

For the soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, the audience manifested unbounded enthusiasm, recalling him several times after each of his numbers.

Mr. Amato, whose first appearance here a few years ago was in concert with Mme. Mero, the pianist, when he made a lasting impression with his dramatic fervor and beautiful voice, has lost nothing of his skill; and his aria "Quidone commande quand il aime," and the air from "Serse" were given with a beauty of tone and perfection of diction that won him immediate applause.

The first of these, less well known of the two, is from Saint-Saens' opera, "Henry VIII.,'" which was produced at the Opera in Paris in 1883, and in England in 1898, but like some other works of the same composer, who was a master of composition, but lacking in artistic decision, was neither sufficiently frivolous nor sincerely convincing to become popular.

CONTAINS BEAUTIFUL AIR.

Handel's opera of "Serse," which was first performed in 1738, was considered a failure, but it contained the beautiful air, "Ombra mai fu," which is popularly known as the "Largo," and which Mr. Amato sang with the dramatic dignity that befitted the melody.

The three orchestral numbers on the programme were not new to the audience, since all of them have been presented here during the past four seasons, but all of them were of interest, and of a romantic quality that made them well adapted to the same programme.

It was a happy thought to put the modern tone-poem of Richard Strauss between the works of the older composers that have held their own on programmes for the past century, and none of them suffered by comparison.

The overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, is still beautiful, and it is a welcome announcement that the opera itself is to be revived in New York in the near future. Like many of Weber's works, it caught the spirit of the times when fairy tales and magic were popular in German literature, and there was more interest in the past than the present. It was played last night with a delicacy and precision that was an effective contrast to the brilliant color of the tone-poem which preceded it.

FINE ORCHESTRA NUMBER.

The principal orchestral number on the programme was, of course, the "Eroica," Beethoven's third symphony, which, in spite of the critics, audiences like to think was inspired by Napoleon before Beethoven had come to the realization that he was "an ordinary man."

Dramatic in its external effects, it is as absolutely convincing as Beethoven meant it to be. Its first theme is impressive and the whole symphony, in contrast to the two preceding, is in perfect sonata form, which although the various themes are brought forward in orderly design, is spontaneous and not forced.

In the beauty of its personal expression of melody and harmony, it makes little difference whether it is dedicated to any special hero or to the memory of a great man, and as it was played last evening, it could not fail to make a deep impression.

The majestic beauty of the Funeral March was sharply contrasted with the delicacy of the Scherzo and all four numbers were played with due attention to their variety and color.

The few changes in the personnel of the orchestra seemed to make less difference in its quality than was at first expected; two new players in the violins, one viola, the first clarinet, the third oboe, a new 'cellist and a new harpist do not, after all, seriously affect for either better or worse so large an organization, and it is with sincere appreciation that the music lovers of the city welcome back the Symphony Orchestra

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 18 1914

The subscription sale for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season has been in progress at Heppe's for the past week, and is most gratifying from every point of view. The orchestra began its season of concerts in Boston this last Friday. But three men were missing, Josef Malkin, who will be at the first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. These gentlemen are on the ocean now, and will be here the middle of the coming week.

The soloist of the first concert that the orchestra will give here Monday evening, November 2, will be Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date ~~OCT 4~~

Est

Preliminary to the 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the opening of the annual auction sales of tickets will begin in Boston to-morrow and, as already announced, the sale of season tickets for the six concerts in this city will be opened on Oct. 12. That is also the date set for the first rehearsal of the orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck is due in New York next Tuesday and Anton Witek, the concert master, is already here, arriving this last week on the Noordam. The entire orchestra is now together except the four or five men who are doing military service. Mr. Grisez, the chief clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, who are in the French army, are in the territorials and are not likely to see actual fighting, being put in garrison duty in central France, but, as already mentioned, it is feared that Messrs. Koessler, Agnesy and Stumpf, who are in the German and Austrian armies, are at the front somewhere.

Dr. Muck has been able to fill all vacancies satisfactorily and by the time of the first Providence concert, Oct. 20, the orchestra should be in its usual state of high discipline. As soloist for this concert the management has engaged Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Amato has a number of engagements with the orchestra during the month of October, these being the first time he has appeared with that organization.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 17 1914

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is assured another most successful season in Providence. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress since last Monday, is already larger than last year. The first concert of the season will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The soloist will be Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 1

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is assured another most successful season in Providence. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress since last Monday is already larger than last year. It shows that the prevailing hard times does not affect this great institution to any appreciable extent. The first concert of the season will be given in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening. The soloist will be Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 25 1914

* * *

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, November 2. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, "Henry VIII," and Handel's "Ombra mai fu," which is none other than the familiar "Largo." The orchestra will be mustered in its full strength of 100 musicians, and the symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica." 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 18 1914

Established: Lon

With the opening concert of the series by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry [illegible], on Tuesday evening, will come the formal opening of the Providence [illegible] season and the outlook for a successful and enjoyable season is [illegible], despite the conditions of business and the depressing influences of the European war.

It its first concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will present one of the strongest of its soloists, the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. With the opening of the Boston Symphony season, the musical year in Providence will begin and the six concerts given by this wonderful institution make the most important part of the season. The orchestra returns to Providence with its personnel practically unchanged, for, as a matter of fact, the war has brought no more changes in the orchestra than are usually made at the beginning of a season. To say the least, it plays this year with all its old-time brilliancy.

In offering Amato as soloist, the orchestra brings to Providence the leading Italian baritone of our time. What Caruso is to tenors, Amato is to baritones, for his is a voice of extraordinary beauty and his skill as a singer and his general musicianship are even greater than Caruso's.

Mr. Amato will sing twice. The first number will be an unfamiliar French aria, the principal baritone aria from Saint Saens's opera, "Henry VIII." His second number will be an air by Handel, "Ombra mai fu," from a long-forgotten opera called "Xerxes." The tune, however, is none other than the much beloved and familiar "Largo," which everybody knows.

Dr. Muck has placed on the programme three of the greatest orchestral classics. The Symphony will be the immortal "Eroica" of Beethoven, what many regard as the most characteristic work that his genius gave to the world. The other numbers will be the Tone Poem, "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, which in many respects shows the highest point of creative genius displayed by Strauss, and the final number will be the ever-welcome and brilliant "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The programme is as follows: Beethoven, symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica;" Saint Saens, Aria "Qui donc command quand il aime," from "Henry VIII;" Richard Strauss, Tone poem, "Don Juan;" Handel, air, "Ombra mai fu," from "Xerxes;" Weber, overture, "Euryanthe."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 20

Es 1884

Special East Side Car.

For the accommodation of East Side patrons of the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Rhode Island Company has arranged for a special car to leave the terminus of the Elmgrove avenue line, ahead of the regular car at 7:45 on the evenings of the concerts. The car will come through the new tunnel, take the loop in the rear of the Post Office building and pass down South Main street to Infantry Hall, where it will lay off until the close of the concert, when a return trip will be made.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 20

blis

Symphony Concert To-night.

The celebrated Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, in different solo numbers, is the chief attraction for the first Providence concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at Infantry Hall this evening. Signor Amato will sing, among other numbers, the aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII." and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will render a programme of classical compositions.

[24]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

BRILLIANT OPENING OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Boston Orchestra and Pasquale Amato Rendered Programme That Delighted Large and Appreciative Audience.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert the local musical season may be said to be really begun. That commencement was recorded last night when the usual big audience which greets this noted musical organization filled Infantry Hall with appreciative listeners who did not fail to give a warm welcome to Dr. Muck, the capable and popular conductor, and his aggregation of musicians who are held in high esteem in this city. The applause was liberal and there was every manifestation of enjoyment of the programme and appreciation of the fact that Providence is afforded this opportunity to hear the best music by players of the highest reputation and skill.

For this opening concert of the season Dr. Muck selected three great great orchestral classics by great composers, Beethoven, Straus and Weber. This trio offers a variety and excellence of productions that can hardly be surpassed and they were represented by numbers which could not fail to afford pleasure to all lovers of music. The soloist for the initial concert was Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is singing this year for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His offering consisted of two numbers from Saint Saens and Handel. These rounded out the programme and made it one of rare merit.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55..........Beethoven
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo; Allegro Vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act 1, Scene 4..................Saint-Saens
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20......Richard Strauss
Air, "Ombra mai fu" from the opera, "Serse," Act 1, Scene 1.......Handel
Overture to "Euryanthe".......Weber

The symphony from Beethoven's "Eroica" is regarded as one of the immortal productions of the great composer, and quite in his characteristic vein. Written in honor of Napoleon, it is a notable monument to that soldier and commander. It embodies orchestral music of great diversity, but singular beauty and richness. It held the audience intent last night, and was received at the close of the several parts with enthusiastic applause. There are portions which delight with their delicacy and the others that please by the fullness of tone and the martial spirit that animates them. The rendition was admirable. Dr. Muck had his musicians in full control and his leadership was as skilful and effective as ever.

Of the other orchestral numbers the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Strauss, was a gem, and the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber was as welcome as it always is. The former is passionate and thrilling, throbbing with feeling and expressing it in a manner that grips. The overture is marked by brilliance with passages that are tender and appealing. Both were played with characteristic spirit and fine attention to detail. There is never any uncertainty felt in listening to this orchestra, but always an assurance that the music will be rendered with no lapse of skill and no lack of finish.

Dr. Amator sang twice, and was accorded a warm welcome by those who had heard him before and those who knew him only by reputation. He has a wonderful voice, and may well be regarded as one of the best baritone singers before the public to-day. His voice is rich and full, strong and yet smooth. There is a beauty in the notes and an evidence of musicianly training that makes his singing charming in every detail. He sings easily and naturally with no attempt at display and with perfect good taste.

The numbers were the aria from "Henry VIII.," and a selection from the opera, "Serse," and both were sung with marked feeling and displayed his voice in all its admirable qualities.

It was an auspicious beginning of the series of six concerts which will be given during this 34th season of the orchestra in this city.

RNAL
rovidence, R. I.
1914

MPHONY CONCERT OVES ATTRACTIVE

Thirty-fourth Season Opened at Infantry Hall.

AMATO IN PLEASING VOICE

Celebrated Italian Baritone Vigorously Applauded After Each Appearance, and Forced to Respond to Encores.—Dr. Muck Conducts Programme.

A romantic programme was the offering with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 34th season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing its 136th concert, the first of a series of six which will be given here during the season.

A large audience greeted Dr. Muck with moderate applause as he appeared upon the stage, and seemed to find great enjoyment in the programme which was given in the following order:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55,
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funemre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Saint-Saens..........................
..Aria, "Qui donc commande quandil aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act. 1, Scene 4.
Richard Strauss ....
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Handel ....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse," Act. I., Scene 1.
Weber...............Overture to "Euryanthe"

For the soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, the audience manifested unbounded enthusiasm, recalling him several times after each of his numbers.

Mr. Amato, whose first appearance here a few years ago was in concert with Mme. Mero, the pianist, when he made a lasting impression with his dramatic fervor and beautiful voice, has lost nothing of his skill; and his aria "Quidone commande quand il aime," and the air from "Serse" were given with a beauty of tone and perfection of diction that won him immediate applause.

The first of these, less well known of the two, is from Saint-Saens' opera, "Henry VIII.,'" which was produced at the Opera in Paris in 1883, and in England in 1898, but like some other works of the same composer, who was a master of composition, but lacking in artistic decision, was neither sufficiently frivolous nor sincerely convincing to become popular.

CONTAINS BEAUTIFUL AIR.

Handel's opera of "Serse," which was first performed in 1738, was considered a failure, but it contained the beautiful air, "Ombra mai fu," which is popularly known as the "Largo," and which Mr. Amato sang with the dramatic dignity that befitted the melody.

The three orchestral numbers on the programme were not new to the audience, since all of them have been presented here during the past four seasons, but all of them were of interest, and of a romantic quality that made them well adapted to the same programme.

It was a happy thought to put the modern tone-poem of Richard Strauss between the works of the older composers that have held their own on programmes for the past century, and none of them suffered by comparison.

The overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, is still beautiful, and it is a welcome announcement that the opera itself is to be revived in New York in the near future. Like many of Weber's works, it caught the spirit of the times when fairy tales and magic were popular in German literature, and there was more interest in the past than the present. It was played last night with a delicacy and precision that was an effective contrast to the brilliant color of the tone-poem which preceded it.

FINE ORCHESTRA NUMBER.

The principal orchestral number on the programme was, of course, the "Eroica," Beethoven's third symphony, which, in spite of the critics, audiences like to think was inspired by Napoleon before Beethoven had come to the realization that he was "an ordinary man."

Dramatic in its external effects, it is as absolutely convincing as Beethoven meant it to be. Its first theme is impressive and the whole symphony, in contrast to the two preceding, is in perfect sonata form, which although the various themes are brought forward in orderly design, is spontaneous and not forced.

In the beauty of its personal expression of melody and harmony, it makes little difference whether it is dedicated to any special hero or to the memory of a great man, and as it was played last evening, it could not fail to make a deep impression.

The majestic beauty of the Funeral March was sharply contrasted with the delicacy of the Scherzo and all four numbers were played with due attention to their variety and color.

The few changes in the personnel of the orchestra seemed to make less difference in its quality than was at first expected; two new players in the violins, one viola, the first clarinet, the third oboe, a new 'cellist and a new harpist do not, after all, seriously affect for either better or worse so large an organization, and it is with sincere appreciation that the music lovers of the city welcome back the Symphony Orchestra

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 18 1914

The subscription sale for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season has been in progress at Heppe's for the past week, and is most gratifying from every point of view. The orchestra began its season of concerts in Boston this last Friday. But three men were missing, Josef Malkin, who will be at the first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. These gentlemen are on the ocean now, and will be here the middle of the coming week.

The soloist of the first concert that the orchestra will give here Monday evening, November 2, will be Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 4

Preliminary to the 34th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the opening of the annual auction sales of tickets will begin in Boston to-morrow and, as already announced, the sale of season tickets for the six concerts in this city will be opened on Oct. 12. That is also the date set for the first rehearsal of the orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck is due in New York next Tuesday and Anton Witek, the concert master, is already here, arriving this last week on the Noordam. The entire orchestra is now together except the four or five men who are doing military service. Mr. Grisez, the chief clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, who are in the French army, are in the territorials and are not likely to see actual fighting, being put in garrison duty in central France, but, as already mentioned, it is feared that Messrs. Koessler, Agnesy and Stumpf, who are in the German and Austrian armies, are at the front somewhere.

Dr. Muck has been able to fill all vacancies satisfactorily and by the time of the first Providence concert, Oct. 20, the orchestra should be in its usual state of high discipline. As soloist for this concert the management has engaged Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Amato has a number of engagements with the orchestra during the month of October, these being the first time he has appeared with that organization.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 17 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is assured another most successful season in Providence. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress since last Monday, is already larger than last year. The first concert of the season will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The soloist will be Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 1 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is assured another most successful season in Providence. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress since last Monday is already larger than last year. It shows that the prevailing hard times does not affect this great institution to any appreciable extent. The first concert of the season will be given in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening. The soloist will be Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 25 1914

* * *

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, November 2. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, "Henry VIII," and Handel's "Ombra mai fu," which is none other than the familiar "Largo." The orchestra will be mustered in its full strength of 100 musicians, and the symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 18 1914
Established: Lon

With opening concert of the series by the Infantry on Symphony Orchestra, will come all, on Tuesday evening, dence formal opening of the Provi- for a sical season and the outlook successful and enjoyable season is ng, despite the conditions of business and the depressing influences of the European war.

It its first concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will present one of the strongest of its soloists, the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. With the opening of the Boston Symphony season, the musical year in Providence will begin and the six concerts given by this wonderful institution make the most important part of the season. The orchestra returns to Providence with its personnel practically unchanged, for, as a matter of fact, the war has brought no more changes in the orchestra than are usually made at the beginning of a season. To say the least, it plays this year with all its old-time brilliancy.

In offering Amato as soloist, the orchestra brings to Providence the leading Italian baritone of our time. What Caruso is to tenors, Amato is to baritones, for his is a voice of extraordinary beauty and his skill as a singer and his general musicianship are even greater than Caruso's.

Mr. Amato will sing twice. The first number will be an unfamiliar French aria, the principal baritone aria from Saint Saens's opera, "Henry VIII." His second number will be an air by Handel, "Ombra mai fu," from a long-forgotten opera called "Xerxes." The tune, however, is none other than the much beloved and familiar "Largo," which everybody knows.

Dr. Muck has placed on the programme three of the greatest orchestral classics. The Symphony will be the immortal "Eroica" of Beethoven, what many regard as the most characteristic work that his genius gave to the world. The other numbers will be the Tone Poem, "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, which in many respects shows the highest point of creative genius displayed by Strauss, and the final number will be the ever-welcome and brilliant "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The programme is as follows: Beethoven, symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica;" Saint Saens, Aria "Qui donc command quand il aime," from "Henry VIII;" Richard Strauss, Tone poem, "Don Juan;" Handel, air, "Ombra mai fu," from "Xerxes;" Weber, overture, "Euryanthe."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 20

Special East Side Car.

For the accommodation of East Side patrons of the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Rhode Island Company has arranged for a special car to leave the terminus of the Elmgrove avenue line, ahead of the regular car at 7:45 on the evenings of the concerts. The car will come through the new tunnel, take the loop in the rear of the Post Office building and pass down South Main street to Infantry Hall, where it will lay off until the close of the concert, when a return trip will be made.

---

m BULLE
ss Providence, R. I.
OCT 20

mphony Concert To-night.

he celebrated Italian baritone, Pasle Amato, in different solo numbers, ne chief attraction for the first Proviance concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at Infantry Hall this evening. Signor Amato will sing among other numbers, the aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII" and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will render a programme of classical compositions.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT

Est 84

Success is Promised.

The subscriptions to seats for Providence concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are larger in number this year than they were last year. The first concert of the season will be given next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Pasquale Amato, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 20 1914

Estab 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The regular concert season of 1914-15 will open this evening with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII," and the familiar and well beloved "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the tone poem, "Don Juan," of Richard Strauss, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 1914

Est 188

The first local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening, with Pasquale Amato, the Italian baritone, as the chief attraction. Signor Amato will sing the aria from Saint-Saens's opera "Henry VIII.," and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra is under the direction of Carl Muck.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 1914

E 1884

Symphony Concert To-night.

The celebrated Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, in different solo numbers, is the chief attraction for the first Providence concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at Infantry Hall this evening. Signor Amato will sing, among other numbers, the aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII." and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will render a programme of classical compositions.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
24 1914
Date

Estab

The first pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. There will be no soloist at either concert. Dr. Muck will play the first Boston programme at the Thursday evening concert which comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe." On Saturday afternoon he will play Brahms's Second Symphony, Geo. W. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

k, 1884

With three new members yet on the ocean, the Boston Symphony veterans begin a thirty-fourth season in their home city to-morrow afternoon. The famous orchestra's conductor is very recently from Berlin. Himself a German, Dr. Muck shows a certain condescension toward foreigners in his opening programme, which comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the so-called "Haydn Variations" of Brahms, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 11 1914

Established: Lo

MUSICA

That Providence is to have an interesting musical season is a foregone conclusion, for with the prospect of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and four of the popular Steinert concerts, together with many other concerts varied in scope and in character music lovers may revel in keen anticipation of musical realities and potentialities.

Everything points to a continuation of the prosperity which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed in Providence to such a great extent during the last several years. With the coming of Dr. Muck eight years ago there was at once a decided revival of interest in the concerts of the orchestra here and through his engagement and through Mr. Fiedler's, the number of the regular patrons of the concerts has grown steadily, while the number of concerts has been increased materially. Only three cities in the country have more Boston Symphony concerts than Providence. These are Boston, where 48 are given; New York, where 10 are given, and Cambridge, which has eight.

It is most gratifying to the management to be able to announce that the war has affected the orchestra only in two positions. Two of its French members, Mr. Grisez, the firts clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, are serving their country in the armies of France. Mr. Grisez's place has been taken by Mr. Sand, a famous Russian virtuoso, who comes from Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's place has been taken by H. H. Stanislaus, the finest oboe of England, who, up to this year, has been the first oboe in Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra of London. In other respects, the ranks of the orchestra are unbroken save for such few changes as always occur at the beginning of a new season. A most valuable addition to the orchestra, however, is V. Klicka, who has been engaged as second harpist. Mr. Klicka is a very famous Bohemian and one of the very famous harp virtuosi of Europe.

The management has engaged soloists of very high rank for these Providence concerts. They include three singers, a pianist and a violinist. The singers are Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Pasquale Amato and Florence Hinkle. Harold Bauer is the pianist and Anton Witek the violinist.

Pasquale Amato, who will be the soloist at the first concert, is the greatest Italian baritone of our time and an artist who, since he began to come to America five or six years ago, has obtained a popuarity among men singers second only to that held by the great Caruso. As a matter of fact, what Caruso is to tenors, Amato is to baritones. In one important respect, however, Amato differs from his colleague. He is a concert singer as well as an operatic star and his successes in concert have been quite equal to those he has enjoyed behind the footlights.

Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink is always a thrice welcome visitor wherever she may chose to sing. She is the most popular singer in America to-day and in the course of a season sings to more people than any other.

Florence Hinkle appeared here with the orchestra last season and her success was one of the features of that season. One has only to hear Miss Hinkle sing and to note the success she has had on the concert stage, to realize how unnecessary it is for an American girl of talent to get her training elsewhere than in the United States. Miss Hinkle is American-born, bred and trained and practically her entire career has been in this country.

Harold Bauer, one of the most distinguished pianists of our times, is no stranger to Providence and his delightful art is always welcomed by those who love the best in music. As for Mr. Witek, he will make his first appearance here as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Witek, while content to hold the important position of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is none the less one of the really great violinists of our time. He is a master technician and a master musician, and it is a significant fact that when his appearances are announced with the orchestra in Boston, the audiences fill Symphony Hall to overflowing at both the reheasal and the concert. His performance last year of the Tschaikowsky concerto was one of the sensational events of the season.

Dr. Muck is now in this country and it will shortly be possible to announce his programme of the first concert in Providence.

From
Address BULLETIN Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 21 1914

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON IN INFANTRY HAL

Pasquale Amato, Celebrated Baritone, Vigorously Applauded in Solo Numbers.—Dr. Muck Conducts Attractive Concert Programme.

A romantic programme was the offering with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 34th season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing its 136th concert, the first of a series of six which will be given here during the season.

A large audience greeted Dr. Muck with moderate applause as he appeared upon the stage, and seemed to find great enjoyment in the programme which was given in the following order:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55,
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funenre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens.......................................
..Aria, "Qui donc commande quandil aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act. 1, Scene 4.
Richard Strauss ....
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Handel ....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse," Act. I., Scene 1.
Weber................Overture to "Euryanthe"

For the soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, the audience manifested unbounded enthusiasm, recalling him several times after each of his numbers.

Mr. Amato, whose first appearance here a few years ago was in concert with Mme. Mero, the pianist, when he made a lasting impression with his dramatic fervor and beautiful voice, has lost nothing of his skill; and his aria "Quidone commande quand il aime," and the air from "Serse" were given with a beauty of tone and perfection of diction that won him immediate applause.

The first of these, less well known of the two, is from Saint-Saens' opera, "Henry VIII.,'" which was produced at the Opera in Paris in 1883, and in England in 1898, but like some other works of the same composer, who was a master of composition, but lacking in artistic decision, was neither sufficiently frivolous nor sincerely convincing to become popular.

CONTAINS BEAUTIFUL AIR.

Handel's opera of "Serse," which was first performed in 1738, was considered a failure, but it contained the beautiful air, "Ombra mai fu," which is popularly known as the "Largo," and which Mr. Amato sang with the dramatic dignity that befitted the melody.

The three orchestral numbers on the programme were not new to the audience, since all of them have been presented here during the past four seasons, but all of them were of interest, and of a romantic quality that made them well adapted to the same programme.

It was a happy thought to put the modern tone-poem of Richard Strauss between the works of the older composers that have held their own on programmes for the past century, and none of them suffered by comparison.

The overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, is still beautiful, and it is a welcome announcement that the opera itself is to be revived in New York in the near future. Like many of Weber's works, it caught the spirit of the times when fairy tales and magic were popular in German literature, and there was more interest in the past than the present. It was played last night with a delicacy and precision that was an effective contrast to the brilliant color of the tone-poem which preceded it.

FINE ORCHESTRA NUMBER.

The principal orchestral number on the programme was, of course, the "Eroica," Beethoven's third symphony, which, in spite of the critics, audiences like to think was inspired by Napoleon before Beethoven had come to the realization that he was "an ordinary man."

Dramatic in its external effects, it is as absolutely convincing as Beethoven meant it to be. Its first theme is impressive and the whole symphony, in contrast to the two preceding, is in perfect sonata form, which although the various themes are brought forward in orderly design, is spontaneous and not forced.

In the beauty of its personal expression of melody and harmony, it makes little difference whether it is dedicated to any special hero, or to the memory of a great man, and as it was played last evening, it could not fail to make a deep impression.

The majestic beauty of the Funeral March was sharply contrasted with the delicacy of the Scherzo and all four numbers were played with due attention to their variety and color.

The few changes in the personnel of the orchestra seemed to make less difference in its quality than was at first expected; two new players in the violins, one viola, the first clarinet, the third oboe, a new 'cellist and a new harpist do not, after all, seriously affect for either better or worse so large an organization, and it is with sincere appreciation that the music lovers of the city welcome back the Symphony Orchestra for another season.

At the second concert which will be given on Nov. 17 the soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. A. W. C.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 18 1914

Est

ALTHOUGH the musical season here opened on Wednesday evening with the concert of the Mendelssohn Glee Club of New York, yet as at that time those in the audience were the guests of Brown University, so far as the general public is concerned the season will practically begin on Tuesday evening with the first concert in a series of six, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

Plans for concerts by the Arion Club, the Providence Symphony Orchestra and other local organizations, are rapidly being completed, while the Steinert course of popular concerts will begin next month.

* * *

At its first concert of the season in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for its opening number the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, a significantly appropriate work for these troublous times. It was written when Beethoven was filled with admiration for Napoleon I., and although Beethoven experienced a change of feeling and erased the name of the "little Corporal" from the title-page, it is no less a great monument to that noted warrior.

Two other orchestral numbers will be given: Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Although Strauss has written many works of large dimension since his "Don Juan," which was one of his earliest, it is more than a question whether he has written any better. The most critical admirers of Strauss think that he displayed his greatest creative powers in his "Don Juan," his "Tell Eulenspiegel" and his "Death and Transfiguration," all of which came within a few years of each other in the order named, and belong practically to the same period of his artistic development. In these, and particularly in the "Don Juan," he displays unusual melodic invention and skill in handling the resources of his orchestra.

The soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, filling a series of engagements with it during October and November. Mr. Amato, who is one of the most distinguished Italian baritones now before the public, is one of the few who has been ambitious to broaden the scope of his art, and instead of limiting himself like most Italian singers strictly to opera, he has gone extensively into concert work, in which his success has been quite equal to his success on the operatic stage. Concert-goers who heard him in his concert here with Mme. Yolande Mero a few years ago, will give him a warm welcome.

Mr. Amato is the possessor of a voice of unusual beauty, and his singing is distinguished by its good taste and musicianly training. He will sing two numbers. The first one will be the great baritone solo from Saint Saens's opera, "Henry VIII.," "Qui dono commande quand il aime." His second number will be an old-time aira from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," the words of which begin, "Ombra mai fu," in which the audience will recognize the familiar "Largo" that is one of the best-loved tunes which has come to us from the past.

The programme in its popular order will be as follows: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven; aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime," from "Henry VIII.," Saine Saens; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; air, "Ombra mai fu," from "Xerxes," Handel; overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

* * *

Announcement was made la

Pasquale Amato.

oloist at First Boston Symphony Concert This Week.

[25]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT

Success is Promised.

The subscriptions to seats for the Providence concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are larger in number this year than they were last year. The first concert of the season will be given next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Pasquale Amato, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 20 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The regular concert season of 1914-15 will open this evening with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII," and the familiar and well beloved "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the tone poem, "Don Juan," of Richard Strauss, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 20 1914

The first local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening, with Pasquale Amato, the Italian baritone, as the chief attraction. Signor Amato will sing the aria from Saint-Saens's opera "Henry VIII.," and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra is under the direction of Carl Muck.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 1914

Symphony Concert To-night.

The celebrated Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, in different solo numbers, is the chief attraction for the first Providence concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at Infantry Hall this evening. Signor Amato will sing, among other numbers, the aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII." and the familiar "Largo" of Handel. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will render a programme of classical compositions.

1884

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date 24 1914

The first pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. There will be no soloist at either concert. Dr. Muck will play the first Boston programme at the Thursday evening concert which comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe." On Saturday afternoon he will play Brahms's Second Symphony, Geo. W. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

With three new members yet on the ocean, the Boston Symphony veterans begin a thirty-fourth season in their home city to-morrow afternoon. The famous orchestra's conductor [illegible] very recently from Berlin. Himself a German, Dr. Muck shows a certain condescension toward foreigners in his opening programme, which comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the so-called "Haydn" Variations" of Brahms, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." [illegible] season of 1914-15 will

k, 1884

Providence, R. I.
OCT 11 1914

MUSICA

That Providence is to have an interesting musical season is a foregone conclusion, for with the prospect of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and four of the popular Steinert concerts, together with many other concerts varied in scope and in character music lovers may revel in keen anticipation of musical realities and potentialities.

Everything points to a continuation of the prosperity which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed in Providence to such a great extent during the last several years. With the coming of Dr. Muck eight years ago there was at once a decided revival of interest in the concerts of the orchestra here and through his engagement and through Mr. Fiedler's, the number of the regular patrons of the concerts has grown steadily, while the number of concerts has been increased materially. Only three cities in the country have more Boston Symphony concerts than Providence. These are Boston, where 48 are given; New York, where 10 are given, and Cambridge, which has eight.

It is most gratifying to the management to be able to announce that the war has affected the orchestra only in two positions. Two of its French members, Mr. Grisez, the firts clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, are serving their country in the armies of France. Mr. Grisez's place has been taken by Mr. Sand, a famous Russian virtuoso, who comes from Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's place has been taken by H. H. Stanislaus, the finest oboe of England, who, up to this year, has been the first oboe in Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra of London. In other respects, the ranks of the orchestra are unbroken save for such few changes as always occur at the beginning of a new season. A most valuable addition to the orchestra, however, is V. Klicka, who has been engaged as second harpist. Mr. Klicka is a very famous Bohemian and one of the very famous harp virtuosi of Europe.

The management has engaged soloists of very high rank for these Providence concerts. They include three singers, a pianist and a violinist. The singers are Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Pasquale Amato and Florence Hinkle. Harold Bauer is the pianist and Anton Witek the violinist.

Pasquale Amato, who will be the soloist at the first concert, is the greatest Italian baritone of our time and an artist who, since he began to come to America five or six years ago, has obtained a popuarity among men singers second only to that held by the great Caruso. As a matter of fact, what Caruso is to tenors, Amato is to baritones. in one important respect, however, Amato differs from his colleague. He is a concert singer as well as an operatic star and his successes in concert have been quite equal to those he has enjoyed behind the footlights.

Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink is always a thrice welcome visitor wherever she may chose to sing. She is the most popular singer in America to-day and in the course of a season sings to more people than any other.

Florence Hinkle appeared here with the orchestra last season and her success was one of the features of that season. One has only to hear Miss Hinkle sing and to note the success she has had on the concert stage, to realize how unnecessary it is for an American girl of talent to get her training elsewhere than in the United States. Miss Hinkle is American-born, bred and trained and practically her entire career has been in this country.

Harold Bauer, one of the most distinguished pianists of our times, is no stranger to Providence and his delightful art is always welcomed by those who love the best in music. As for Mr. Witek, he will make his first appearance here as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Witek, while content to hold the important position of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is none the less one of the really great violinists of our time. He is a master technician and a master musician, and it is a significant fact that when his appearances are announced with the orchestra in Boston, the audiences fill Symphony Hall to overflowing at both the reheasal and the concert. His performance last year of the Tschaikowsky concerto was one of the sensational events of the season.

Dr. Muck is now in this country and it will shortly be possible to announce his programme of the first concert in Providence.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
OCT 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON IN INFANTRY HALL

Pasquale Amato, Celebrated Baritone, Vigorously Applauded in Solo Numbers.—Dr. Muck Conducts Attractive Concert Programme.

A romantic programme was the offering with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 34th season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing its 136th concert, the first of a series of six which will be given here during the season.

A large audience greeted Dr. Muck with moderate applause as he appeared upon the stage, and seemed to find great enjoyment in the programme which was given in the following order:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55,
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funenire: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens..............................
..Aria, "Qui donc commande quandil aime?" from "Henry VIII.," Act. 1, Scene 4.
Richard Strauss ....
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Handel ....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse," Act. I., Scene 1.
Weber.................Overture to "Euryanthe"

For the soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, the audience manifested unbounded enthusiasm, recalling him several times after each of his numbers.

Mr. Amato, whose first appearance here a few years ago was in concert with Mme. Mero, the pianist, when he made a lasting impression with his dramatic fervor and beautiful voice, has lost nothing of his skill; and his aria "Quidone commande quand il aime," and the air from "Serse" were given with a beauty of tone and perfection of diction that won him immediate applause.

The first of these, less well known of the two, is from Saint-Saens' opera, "Henry VIII.,'" which was produced at the Opera in Paris in 1883, and in England in 1898, but like some other works of the same composer, who was a master of composition, but lacking in artistic decision, was neither sufficiently frivolous nor sincerely convincing to become popular.

CONTAINS BEAUTIFUL AIR.

Handel's opera of "Serse," which was first performed in 1738, was considered a failure, but it contained the beautiful air, "Ombra mai fu," which is popularly known as the "Largo," and which Mr. Amato sang with the dramatic dignity that befitted the melody.

The three orchestral numbers on the programme were not new to the audience, since all of them have been presented here during the past four seasons, but all of them were of interest, and of a romantic quality that made them well adapted to the same programme.

It was a happy thought to put the modern tone-poem of Richard Strauss between the works of the older composers that have held their own on programmes for the past century, and none of them suffered by comparison.

The overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, is still beautiful, and it is a welcome announcement that the opera itself is to be revived in New York in the near future. Like many of Weber's works, it caught the spirit of the times when fairy tales and magic were popular in German literature, and there was more interest in the past than the present. It was played last night with a delicacy and precision that was an effective contrast to the brilliant color of the tone-poem which preceded it.

FINE ORCHESTRA NUMBER.

The principal orchestral number on the programme was, of course, the "Eroica," Beethoven's third symphony, which, in spite of the critics, audiences like to think was inspired by Napoleon before Beethoven had come to the realization that he was "an ordinary man."

Dramatic in its external effects, it is as absolutely convincing as Beethoven meant it to be. Its first theme is impressive and the whole symphony, in contrast to the two preceding, is in perfect sonata form, which although the various themes are brought forward in orderly design, is spontaneous and not forced.

In the beauty of its personal expression of melody and harmony, it makes little difference whether it is dedicated to any special hero, or to the memory of a great man, and as it was played last evening, it could not fail to make a deep impression.

The majestic beauty of the Funeral March was sharply contrasted with the delicacy of the Scherzo and all four numbers were played with due attention to their variety and color.

The few changes in the personnel of the orchestra seemed to make less difference in its quality than was at first expected; two new players in the violins, one viola, the first clarinet, the third oboe, a new 'cellist and a new harpist do not, after all, seriously affect for either better or worse so large an organization, and it is with sincere appreciation that the music lovers of the city welcome back the Symphony Orchestra for another season.

At the second concert which will be given on Nov. 17 the soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. A. W. C.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
OCT 18 1914

ALTHOUGH the musical season here opened on Wednesday evening with the concert of the Mendelssohn Glee Club of New York, yet as at that time those in the audience were the guests of Brown University, so far as the general public is concerned the season will practically begin on Tuesday evening with the first concert in a series of six, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

Plans for concerts by the Arion Club, the Providence Symphony Orchestra and other local organizations, are rapidly being completed, while the Steinert course of popular concerts will begin next month.

* * *

At its first concert of the season in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for its opening number the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, a significantly appropriate work for these troublous times. It was written when Beethoven was filled with admiration for Napoleon I., and although Beethoven experienced a change of feeling and erased the name of the "little Corporal" from the title-page, it is no less a great monument to that noted warrior.

Two other orchestral numbers will be given: Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Although Strauss has written many works of large dimension since his "Don Juan," which was one of his earliest, it is more than a question whether he has written any better. The most critical admirers of Strauss think that he displayed his greatest creative powers in his "Don Juan," his "Tell Eulenspiegel" and his "Death and Transfiguration," all of which came within a few years of each other in the order named, and belong practically to the same period of his artistic development. In these, and particularly in the "Don Juan," he displays unusual melodic invention and skill in handling the resources of his orchestra.

The soloist, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, filling a series of engagements with it during October and November. Mr. Amato, who is one of the most distinguished Italian baritones now before the public, is one of the few who has been ambitious to broaden the scope of his art, and instead of limiting himself like most Italian singers strictly to opera, he has gone extensively into concert work, in which his success has been quite equal to his success on the operatic stage. Concert-goers who heard him in his concert here with Mme. Yolande Mero a few years ago, will give him a warm welcome.

Mr. Amato is the possessor of a voice of unusual beauty, and his singing is distinguished by its good taste and musicianly training. He will sing two numbers. The first one will be the great baritone solo from Saint Saens's opera, "Henry VIII.," "Qui donc commande quand il aime." His second number will be an old-time aira from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," the words of which begin, "Ombra mai fu," in which the audience will recognize the familiar "Largo" that is one of the best-loved tunes which has come to us from the past.

The programme in its popular order will be as follows: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven; aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime," from "Henry VIII.," Saine Saens; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; air, "Ombra mai fu," from "Xerxes," Handel; overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

* * *

Announcement was made

Pasquale Amato.

oloist at First Boston Symphony Concert This Week.

n EVENING SUN dress: New York
te OCT 9 1914

With four new names in the Boston Symphony personnel this season only two of last year's orchestra have been unable to return on account of military service. They are Grisez, first clarinet, and Fosse, third oboe, both in the French army. Their places will be filled by A. Sand, a Russian clarinet of the Charlottenburg opera, and H. H. Stanislaus, oboe of the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London.

Otto Urack, who was Dr. Muck's assistant, has decided not to return. His place in the 'cellos will be taken by Josef Malkin, a Russian soloist of the Berlin Philharmonic, the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. The assistant conductor will be Ernst Schmidt, first violin of the Darmstadt Grand Ducal Orchestra and conductor of the Darmstadt Oratorio Society.

Among the hundred men a second harpist has been engaged, and, like Mr. Holy, he is a Bohemian. He is V. Klicka, famous abroad. Boston was able to secure his services because he could not give concerts planned in Europe this winter on account of the war.

1884

From NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
Address: New York City
Date OCT 8 1914

All records were broken in Boston when seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals sold for $108 premium at the annual auction of the $18 seats. The bidder selected three in the N row at that price, made his deposit at the desk and refused to give his name. The next highest bid was $72. The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation, for two or three rows.

Est 84

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 2 1914

When Major Higginson, leaving his seat, shook hands with Dr. Karl Muck the other day in sight of the people of Boston the first symphony concert of the year in America went out of its way to establish an entente cordiale which rests just now a perilous footing. Too often to his own embarrassment the Kaiser's man had been hailed as sponsor for the new music of France. When war began he offered to serve his native Germany by enlisting in the army. A Berlin recruiting officer told him, "We should not send a musician to the front. There are plenty who can interpret official despatches and foreign news. But how many can interpret a 'Parsifal'?"

So Muck came back to Boston, and his reception, as reported by Philip Hale, was "extraordinary." As soon as he appeared on the stage many in Symphony Hall arose and remained standing during the minutes of applause. More than once Dr. Muck, ready to begin the Napoleonic "Eroica," was obliged to turn and bow in recognition. "We do not remember," said Mr. Hale, "in the course of twenty-five years a welcome like that to any returning conductor of this orchestra. The tribute was spontaneous and magnificent. It was a tribute to the man."

The greatest art, Boston held in the face of Muck's German programme, is universal and not national. It mattered not that Beethoven's family came from a Belgian village near Louvain; that, born in Germany, he became an Austrian by adoption. It was no matter whether Haydn were a Croatian or Austrian, Dr. Strauss and Weber were Teutons both.

So much for neutrality! What does it matter? Never mind. Boston isn't a city as other places are; it is a state of mind. If Boston's first programme was pan-German, that of the coming week contained works by a Frenchman, an American and a Finn.

k, 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date Oct 18. 1914

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston this last week, having given its first public rehearsal last Friday afternoon and its first concert last evening. Of its personnel of 101 only three were missing, and they are on the ocean. They are Josef Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack, first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. Dr. Muck arranged a conservative programme, which comprised the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. All the tickets for the two series of concerts in New York have been sent to subscribers, and over two hundred applicants for seats weer unable to secure them.

rk, 1884

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 18 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston this last week, having given its first public rehearsal last Friday afternoon and its first concert last evening. Of its personnel of 101 only three were missing and they are on the ocean. They are Josef Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack, first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contrabasses. Dr. Muck arranged a conservative programme, which comprised the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn; Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. All the tickets for the two series of concerts in New York have been sent to subscribers, and over 200 applicants for seats were unable to secure them.

rk, 1884

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date OCT 17 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston yesterday. Of its personnel of 101, only three were missing, and they are on the ocean. They are Josef Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack, first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contrabasses.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its first local concert this season at Aeolian Hall on November 10.

Esta

From Deutsches Journal
Address: New York City
Date OCT 8 - 1914

Dr. Karl Muck als Kartenzeichner.

Leiter der Boſtoner Symphnie mußte im Kriegsminiſterium arbeiten.

Stolz im Bewußtſein, auch ſein Scherflein zum Beſten der deutſchen Sache beigetragen zu haben, kehrte Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, geſtern mit ſeiner Gattin an Bord der „Rhyndam" aus Deutſchland zurück, um ſich wieder in Boſton ans Werk zu machen.

Daß der bekannte Kapellmeiſter tatſächlich alles für Deutſchland getan hat, was er zu tun imſtande war, beweiſt die Tatſache, daß er vier Wochen lang im Kriegsminiſterium in Berlin als Mathematiker und Kartenzeichner tätig geweſen und tüchtig „mit Hand angelegt" hatte.

Der Kapellmeiſter, der Gelegenheit gehabt hatte, viele deutſche Verwundete in den Berliner Hoſpitälern zu ſehen, fand dort auch drei Offiziere, denen von belgiſchen Mädchen die Augen ausgeſtochen worden waren.

E t, 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston this last week, having given its first public rehearsal last Friday afternoon, and its first concert last (Saturday) evening. Of its personnel of 101 only three were missing, and they are on the ocean. They are Mr. Josef Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack, first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp; and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. Dr. Muck arranged a conservative programme, which comprised the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. All the tickets for the two series of concerts in New York have been sent to subscribers, and over two hundred applicants for seats were unable to secure them.

Est 384

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 17 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston yesterday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck congratulted himself that only three of the 101 men in his band were missing, and that they are on the ocean. More than two hundred would-be subscribers to the New York concerts have been unable to get seats.

Establish

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 18 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fourth season in Boston this last week, having given its first public rehearsal Friday afternoon and its first concert last evening. Of its personnel of 101 only three were missing, and these are on the ocean. They are Mr. Josef Malkin, who succeeds Otto Urack, first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. Dr. Muck arranged a conservative programme, which comprised the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn; Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. All the tickets for the two series of concerts in New York have been sent to subscribers and over 200 applicants for seats were unable to secure them.

k, 1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date OCT 2

Die erſten diesjährigen Konzerte der Boſtoner finden am Abend de. 5., reſp. am Nachmittag des 7. November in Carnegie Hall mit folgendem Programme ſtatt: Beethoven's „Eroica", Brahms' „Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Thema", Strauß' „Don Juan"- und Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouverture, daſſelbe Programm, das er für das diesjährige New Yorker Debut ſeines Orcheſters gewählt hatte. Das Samstags Nachmittags-Konzert verſpricht Brahms' Zweite Symphonie, Chadwick's „Symphonic Sketches" und Sibelius „Finlandia".

Anläßlich des erſten Boſtoner Konzerts

Esta 34

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date OCT 25 1914

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it will give during the current season its usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere. The war has made it necessary to postpone for a year the early trip to the West that had been planned, for it was impossible to get all the members of the orchestra back from Europe in time to prepare for these concerts. The orchestra will undertake the season with its personnel practically unchanged.

The first Boston concerts were given as planned last year, on Oct. 16 and 17. The subscription for the two series of concerts which the orchestra is to give in New York in Carnegie Hall is entirely filled. These concerts will be given Nov. 5 and 7, Dec. 3 and 5, Jan. 7 and 9, Feb. 18 and 20, and March 18 and 20.

E k, 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date OCT 25 1914

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. There will be no soloist at either concert. Dr. Muck will play the first Boston programme at the Thursday evening concert, which comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn," Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe." On Saturday afternoon he will play Brahms's Second Symphony, George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Sibelius's "Finlandia." All the members of the orchestra have arrived from abroad, and the personnel now contains its usual quota of 100 musicians.

Est 1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 18 1914

The Boston Symphony began its thirty-fourth season in Boston this last week. Of its personnel of 101 only three were missing and they are on the ocean. Dr. Muck arranged a conservative programme, which comprised the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. All the tickets for the two series of concerts in New York have been sent to subscribers and over 200 applicants for seats were unable to secure them.

rk, 1884

[26]

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date OCT

Boston Symphony Plans.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. There will be no solist at either concert.

The first programme will be a repetition of the one which opened the season in Boston last week. This includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

On Saturday afternoon Brahms's second symphony, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Sibelius's "Finlandia" overture will be heard.

1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 1 6 19

The battle of Symphony Hall began in Boston at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and up to the hour of going to press Generalissimo Karl Muck was still giving his pan-German programme without protest or fatalities. Bunker Hill Monument didn't tumble down and the Pilgrim Fathers didn't turn in their graves. Here in New York, the critics of two leading German papers were heard to say that their distinguished fellow-culturist had made a tactless beginning.

Such laying of emphasis at the season's start upon one side of European culture was a volte face, an evasion of the spirit of a free and neutral people.

Is not President Wilson's famous letter silently observed in the humblest moving picture shows? To invite discussion as between nations in maters of highest art just now is to run perilously close to questions of public policy within the purview of the civil courts, questions that in an excited state of the popular mind might lead to revoking the license of an ordinary theatre?

Though the Athens of America rise superior to such mundane thoughts, Dr. Muck will find a different situation when he comes to New York. In this polyglot community the artistic temper is alive to international turmoil. He would be a brave man indeed who should in effect say to this public, "Friends, Romans and Fellow Culturists, lend me your ears, lest, if you don't, my great and good friend, Col. Bogey the Second, may be obliged to come over and cut them off entirely."

It is for audiences to guard against any propaganda likely to disturb the musical balance of power in America. Have the "baton prima donnas" of Berlin never heard the beautiful legend of that valuable fur-bearing animal, the polecat, which persistently carries its own "atmosphere" with it everywhere?

1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 3 1914

The subscription sale for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season has been in progress at Heppe's for the past week, and is most gratifying from every point of view. The orchestra began its season of concerts in Boston this last Friday. But three men were missing. Josef Malkin, who will be at the first desk of the cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. These gentlemen are on the ocean now and will be here the middle of the coming week.

The soloist of the first concert that the orchestra will give here Monday evening, November 2, will be Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

* * *

1884

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 8

The subscription sale for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season was in progress at Heppe's last week and is said to be large. The orchestra began its season of concerts in Boston last Friday. Only three men were missing: Josef Malkin, who will be at the first desk of the cellos; Mr. Klicka, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. These gentlemen are on the ocean now and will be here the middle of the coming week. The soloist of the concert that the orchestra will give here Monday evening, November 2, will be Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 6 - 1914

$108 PREMIUM PAID FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

All Records Broken at Boston Orchestra's Auction Sale.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—All records were broken today when seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals sold for $108 premium at the annual auction of the $18 seats. The bidder selected three in the N row at that price, made his deposit at the desk and refused to give his name. The next highest bid was $72. The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation, for two or three rows.

Tonight Manager Charles Ellis, of the orchestra, went to New York to meet Conductor Muck, who is expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam. Doctor Muck is accompanied by his wife. Others of the symphony band who are expected on the same boat are Mr. Sant, a new clarinet player, who belongs in Petrograd, but whom Doctor Muck found in Berlin; Mr. Seyden, a contra-bass, who is accompanied by his daughter, Miss Irene Seyden, an accomplished violinist, and Otto Roth, for many years one of the first violins of the Symphony Band. Mr. Roth was marooned in the Tyrol for some time.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Evening

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 2 0

old.

Boston Symphony Season Opening

At the very moment when the Philadelphia Orchestra was bowing to the applause of its enthusiastic audience, the Boston Symphony was receiving a welcome, which, according to the Boston critics, was unrivaled in memory. That the enthusiasm was justified can be seen from the reviews of the Friday afternoon program. H. T. P., in the Transcript, attributes to Doctor Muck powers even more subtle and skill more masterful than he has had heretofore. And the playing of the band in the "Eroica" evokes the same critic's warmest praise. Philadelphians will look eagerly for such a marvel as a greater Boston Symphony must be.

1884

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 7 1914

The subscription sale for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give during the coming season has been in progress for the past week and is reported most gratifying. The Orchestra began its season in Boston this last Friday. But three men are missing—Josef Malkin, who will be at the first desk of the 'cellos; Mr. Klicks, the new second harp, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the contra-basses. These gentlemen are on the ocean now and will be here the middle of the coming week. The soloist of the first concert that the Orchestra will give here November 2 will be Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 1 1914

Three soloists are announced for the Philadelphia concests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler.

The management considers itself quite safe in promising that Fritz Kreisler will be in America at the time set for him, and it is in a position to do so, since Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is likewise Mr. Kreisler's manager. Mr. Kreisler has not been killed, nor has he been mortally wounded. In the very first part of the war in his capacity as a reserve lieutenant in a Dragoon Regiment, he was in Graz. Later he was on the Galician frontier. Evidently, however, the Austrian Government came to the conclusion that Mr. Kreisler was much more valuable as a live violinist than a dead soldier, and it recalled him to Vienna for staff duty. There he is now, but he will be released from this duty in time to fulfill his engagements in this country.

* * *

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR

From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 6 - 1914

RECORD PRICES PAID FOR CONCERT SEATS

$108 Premium Given at Annual Auction for Boston Symphony Rehearsals

RUSSIAN CLARINET PLAYER

Boston, Oct. 6.—All records were broken here when seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals sold for $108 premium at the annual auction of the $18 seats. The bidder selected three in the N row at that price, made his deposit at the desk and refused to give his name.

The next highest bid was $72. The first premium in row A was $10.50, and that continued to be the price, with little fluctuation, for two or three rows.

Manager Charles Ellis, of the orchestra has gone to New York to meet Conductor Muck, who is expected on the Ryndam from Rotterdam. Director Muck is accompanied by his wife.

Others of the symphony band who are expected on the same boat are Mr. Sant, a new clarinet player, who belongs in Petrograd, but whom Doctor Muck found in Berlin; Mr. Seyden, a contra-bass, who is accompanied by his daughter, Miss Irene Seyden, an accomplished violinist, and Otto Roth, for many years one of the first violins of the Symphony band. Mr. Roth was marooned in the Tyrol for some time.

1884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 1 1914

Established

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued the prospectus of its thirtieth season in Philadelphia. It will give, as usual, five concerts on Monday evenings in the Academy of Mu[illegible]. The dates are November 2 and 30, [illegible]uary 4, February 15 and March 15. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow (Monday) morning at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.

There is already a large subscription for the concerts. Practically all of last year's subscribers have renewed for the coming season, and many new subscriptions were sent in to the Boston office last Spring. The outlook for the orchestra in Philadelphia, as it is everywhere else, is most favorable, and the concerts should be as successful as those of last year.

During the end of August and the early part of September there were many reports circulated about the dire effect the war would have on the personnel of the orchestra. Evidently, as so often happens, the originators of these reports knew much more about the affairs of the orchestra than the management itself. As a matter of fact, twenty-odd members of the orchestra were in Europe when the war began and of these only a half dozen have been unable to return on account of having been called to military service. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was with Dr. Muck in Germany at the outbreak of the war and until the middle of September, and Dr. Muck was able to fill the vacancies satisfactorily.

Three soloists are announced at this

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore this winter has been in progress at Albaugh's ticket office since last Monday. The results are highly satisfactory from every point of view.

The season of the orchestra opened in Boston this last week, and the orchestra was able to present full ranks for its first concert. It contains this year some new members, as had been planned.

Dr. Muck has announced a tentative list of novelties, which promise much to the lover of new music. These include pieces by Schoenberg, who is called "the musical anarch;" Korngold, the marvelous boy composer of Vienna, and Stravinsky, the ultra-modern Russian composer.

1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 4 - 1914

Est

MUSIC NOTES

From present indications Providence is to have a successful and promising musical season, despite the fears of the pessimists who predicteed that the European war and the general business conditions would tend to affect the concert season here.

Now, however, comes the asurance of six concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with soloists of national note at each performance, and also the Steinert course of four concerts besides numerous other musical events and the frequent concerts by local musical clubs.

Since the original announcement made by the mcanagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regarding the six concerts that the Orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter, the name of Pasquale Amato has been added to the list of soloists. The list now stands, Amato, Madame Schumann-Heink, Florence Hinkle, Harold Bauer and Anton Witek; as strong and interesting a list as the Orchestra has ever presented in this city and one which comprises three most distinguished singers.

Amato is now on his way to America, having left Italy early in order to fill a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony. He is one of the rare Italian opera singers, who has made a success in concert work.

JOHN McCORMACK.
Irish Tenor Who Will Appear in the First Concert of the Steinert Series.

Amato will be recalled by a host of musical people here, who heard him in the Steinert course two years ago.

The date of the first of the Boston Symphony Concerts is Tuesday evening, Oct. 20, in Infantry Hall.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 1 191

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued the prospectus of its thirtieth season in Philadelphia. The orchestra will give, as usual, five concerts on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music. The dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1119 Chestnut street. There is already a large subscription for the concerts. Last year's subscribers have renewed for the season, and many new subscriptions were sent to the Boston office last spring.

Twenty members of the orchestra were in Europe when the war began, and of these only a half-dozen have been unable to return on account of having been called to military service. Manager Ellis was with Dr. Muck in Germany at the outbreak of the war and until the middle of September, and Dr. Muck was able to fill all the vacancies satisfactorily.

Three soloists are announced at this time for the Philadelphia concerts. They are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler. The management considers itself quite safe in promising that Kreisler will be in America at the time set for him, and it is in a position to do so, since Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is likewise Kreisler's manager. Kreisler, in the first part of the war, was a reserve lieutenant in a dragoon regiment. He was in Graz. Later he was on the Galician frontier. Evidently, however, the Austrian Government came to the conclusion that Kreisler was much more valuable as a live violinist than a dead soldier, and it recalled him to Vienna for staff duty. There he is now, but he will be released from that duty in time to fulfill his engagements in this country.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 0 1914

Est 884

THE Boston Symphony is making this year its thirtieth consecutive announcement of concerts here. It will give its usual series of five Monday evening concerts in the Academy. The dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. All reports to the contrary, the orchestra is beginning its season with practically its entire personnel intact. The war has affected it less than was feared, and such vacancies as have arisen have been satisfactorily filled by Dr. Muck, who returned from Europe this week. The management announces three soloists for the Philadelphia series: Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone; Harold Bauer, the pianist, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist. The latter, despite the many rumors as to misfortunes which have attended his military service in Austria, it is stated, will be in America to fulfil the engagements of his tour, which begins the 1st of January.

The Choral Society began rehearsals

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 1 1914

Est 1884

MUSICAL NOTES

With the arrival in America last Tuesday of Dr. Carl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the season of concerts by that orchestra is assured Washingtonians.

Despite rumors to the contrary, the war has had little effect upon the coming season, and as a matter of fact it looms more important and brilliant than ever. Unusual activity in American musical life, stimulated not only by the recognition of an opportunity for improving our own conditions, but considerably enlivened by the presence of many European exiles, is noticeable in every musical center on this side of the Atlantic.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1 1 1914

Establ 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued the prospectus of its thirtieth season in Philadelphia. It will give, as usual, five concerts on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music. The dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow (Monday) morning at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

There is already a large subscription for the concerts. Practically all of last year's subscribers have renewed for the coming season, and many new subscriptions were sent in to the Boston office last spring. The outlook for the orchestra in Philadelphia, as it is everywhere else, is most favorable and the concerts should be as successful as those of last year.

During the end of August and the early part of September, there were many reports circulated about the dire effect the war would have on the personnel of the orchestra. Evidently, as so often happens, the originators of these reports knew much more about the affairs of the orchestra than the management itself. As a matter of fact twenty-odd members of the orchestra were in Europe when the war began and of these only a half dozen have been unable to return on account of having been called to military service. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was with Dr. Muck in Germany at the outbreak of the war and until the middle of September and Dr. Muck was able to fill all the vacancies satisfactorily.

Three soloists are announced at this time for the Philadelphia concerts. They are Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer and Fritz Kressler. It is always the effort of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to engage as its soloists the most representative artists in the country, and it would be difficult to find three finer artists than those engaged for the Philadelphia series. Amato is one of those rare Italian singers whose ambition has taken him beyond the routine of opera, and has enabled him to become a most distinguished concert singer. Harold Bauer is, in a sense, unique. He is unquestionably one of the finest artists among the pianists now before the public.

The management considers itself quite safe in promising that Fritz Kreisler will be in America at the time set for him, and it is in a position to do so, since Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is likewise Mr. Kreisler's manager. Mr. Kreisler has not been killed, nor has he been mortally wounded. In the very first part of the war, in his capacity as a reserve lieutenant in a dragoon regiment, he was in Graz. Later he was on the Galician frontier. Evidently, however, the Austrian Government came to the conclusion that Mr. Kreisler was much more valuable as a live violinist than a dead soldier, and it recalled him to Vienna for staff duty. There he is now, but he will be released from this duty in time to fulfill his engagements in this country.

It is impossible at this time to give an outline of Dr. Muck's program plans for the season, but he will undoubtedly follow out his usual course of drawing equally from classical and modern composers.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 1 1 1914

Established:

Boston Sympho

THE period for the renewal of subscriptions by last year's patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Washington ended yesterday, and Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, who represents the orchestra here, reports that it was up to expectations. Such seats as have not already been taken for the season will be placed on sale at Droop's music store on Tuesday, October 20.

It is most gratifying for the management to be able to announce definitely that the war in Europe has deprived the orchestra of the services of only two of its musicians, and these two vacancies have been filled by Dr. Muck. Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, the third oboe, are serving in the French army. Mr. Grisez's place will be taken by Mr. Sand, a Russian clarinetist of great reputation, who, up to the outbreak of the war, was the first clarinet in the Deutsches Opernhaus of Berlin. Mr. Sand, of course, did not hold his place after the beginning of the war, and as a matter of fact Dr. Muck had considerable difficulty in getting permission for him to leave Berlin, as he is of military age, and all the Russians in Germany of military age are being kept there as prisoners of war. Mr. Fosse's place will be taken by H. H. Stanislaus, an Englishman, who up to this year has been the first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra in London.

Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, has not returned, as he has decided to stay in Germany. His place at the first desk of the cellos has been taken by Josef Malkin. Mr. Malkin is a cello virtuoso of international reputation. For a number of years he was the solo cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He was also cellist in the Brussels Quartet and the Witek Trio. As assistant conductor of the orchestra, Ernst Schmidt, of Darmstadt, has been engaged. Mr. Schmidt will be one of the first violins. He was a former concert master of the Darmstadt Orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society of that city. Another engagement of importance is that of V. Klicka, as a second harp of the orchestra. Mr. Klicka is a renowned harp virtuoso, and the orchestra was fortunate in securing his services, which it could not have done had it not been for the war putting an end to all music on the continent. Mr. Grisez had many concert engagements in Europe for the coming season, which he had to abandon.

Dr. Muck is back in America, and the rehearsals of the orchestra start tomorrow. The regular season of the orchestra opens next Friday afternoon in Boston.

The five Washington concerts will be given as usual on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, and March 16.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 1914

Establishe

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in Brooklyn on Friday evening in the Academy of Music. Pasquale Amato of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the soloist. The programme comprises Brahms's Symphony No. 2, Sibelins's "The Swan of Tuonela," and "Finlandia," and the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Mr. Amato will sing airs from Saint-Säens's "Henry VIII," and Handel's "Xerxes."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 1 - 1914

E k, 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given the coming week in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, at 8:15, and on Saturday afternoon, November 7, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	Brahms
Tone Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss
Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D Major	Brahms
Symphonic Sketches	Chadwick
"Finlandia"	Sibelius

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 1 - 1914

***

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will give its first concerts in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening's programme comprises Beethoven's Third Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan," and the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Brahms's Symphony No. 2, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 1

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given this week in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, at 8.15 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	Brahms
Tone Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss
Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber

Saturday's programme is:

Symphony No. 2 in D Major	Brahms
Symphonic Sketches	Chadwick
"Finlandia"	Sibelius

Es 1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 1 - 1914

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck hat für die beiden Eröffnungskonzerte der Bostoner am Abend des kommenden Donnerstag, resp. Nachmittag von Samstag, die folgenden Programme aufgestellt: Er dirigirt am Donnerstag: Beethoven's „Eroica"; Brahms' Variationen über ein Thema von Haydn; Strauß' „Don Juan" und Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouvertüre.

Das Samstag-Programm umfaßt Brahms' Zweite Symphonie in D-Dur; Chadwick, „Symphonic Sketches" und Sibelius. „Finlandia"

Establi

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 31 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

The annual series of five concerts by the Boston Sypphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck will open in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences next Friday evening, with Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, as soloist. The places of Grisez, the first clarinet, and Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French army, have been filled to the utmost satisfaction by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and by Mr. Stanislaus, first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queens Hall Orchestra, London.

Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of great musical interest for the opening concert in Brooklyn. The Symphony will be Brahms' delightful second in D Major. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the "Swan of Tueonela" and the stirring "Finlandia." The final number will be Weber's "Euryanthe Overture." Amato will sing twice, his first number being an aria from Saint-Saens opera "Henry VIII.," and his second number an air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," which is none other than the familiar tune of "Largo."

Es 1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1914
Date

The annual series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will open in the Academy of Music next Friday, November 6, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, with Pasquale Amato, the great Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House as soloist. Only two of the players are absent, Mr. Griesz, first clarinet, and Mr. Fosse, third oboe, both of whom are in the French army. Their places have been filled to Dr. Muck's satisfaction by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and by Mr. Stanislaus, first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, London. Concerts of the orchestra have been given with their wonted brilliancy in Boston. Dr. Muck's Brooklyn programme includes Brahms' delightful Second Symphony in D major. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the "Swan of Tuonela" and the stirring "Finlandia." The final number will be Weber's "Euryanthe Overture."

Mr. Amato will sing twice, his first number being an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Henry VIII," and his second number the "Largo" aria from Handel's opera "Xerxes." The programme in order follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D Major	Brahms
Aria from "Henry VIII"	Saint-Saens
"The Swan of Tuonela"	Sibelius
Aria "Ombra mai fu" (Largo)	Handel
Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber

1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 1 1914

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Establi

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Nov. 6.

COSTUME-SONG RECITAL BY MME YVONNE DE TREVILLE

John McCormack to Open His Fourth American Tour at Carnegie Hall—Recital by Harold Bauer and Tina Lerner Announced.

The annual series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Earl Muck will open in the Academy of Music next Friday evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Science, with Pasquale Amato, the distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, as soloist. This orchestral institution has been affected very little by the war. In the late summer there were grave doubts in Boston whether the orchestra could be assembled, for thirty of its members were on the Continent, part of them of military age, and it was impossible to learn how many, if any, could be released from their obligations in order that they might return to America. Fortunately, the situation cleared up rapidly and as it turned out, of those expected to return only two are definitely absent, Messrs. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are serving in the French army. Their places have been filled to the utmost satisfaction by Dr. Muck, Grisez's having been taken by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Foose's by Stanislaus, first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, London. Since their beginning in the middle of the month the concerts of the orchestra have been proceeding with their wonted brilliancy in Boston and despite the generally unfavorable conditions of the country, the patronage of the orchestra everywhere is as large this year as it has been in the past.

Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of great musical interest for the opening concert in Brooklyn. The Symphony will be Brahms' pieces by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the "Swan of Tuonela," and the stirring "Finlandia." The final number will be Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture.

Mr. Amato will sing twice, his first number being an aria from Saint-saens opera "Henry VIII," and his second number an air from Randel's opera "Xerxes" which is none other than the familar tune of "Largo." The programme in its proper order is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major; Saint-Saens, Aira from "Henry VIII;" Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela;" Handel, Air, "Ombra mai fu," (Largo); Weber, Overture, "Euryanthe."

From SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
Address
Date NOV 1 - 1914

A NUMBER of important concerts will be given in Baltimore this week, but the musical interest of the moment centres in the first Boston Symphony concert, which will take place at the Lyric on Wednesday evening. The soloist of the occasion will be Pasquale Amato, the noted baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, and the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven.

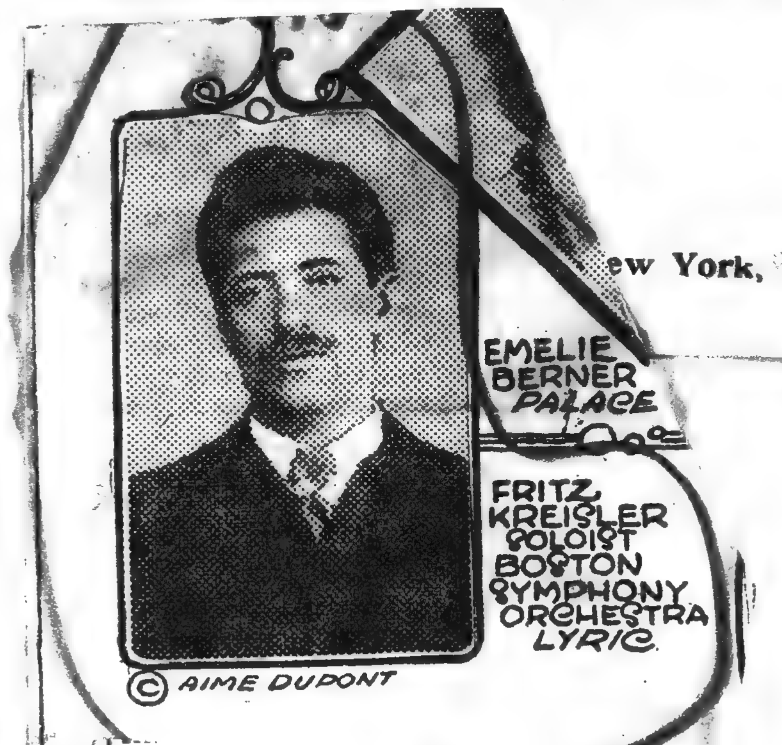
rk, 1884

The Boston Orchestra opened its season under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, about a fortnight ago, the big band consisting of its usual personnel, with the exception of three players, one of whom will return within a fortnight. The places of the other two have been satisfactorily filled, so that there is no reason to suppose that either the tone or the finesse of the orchestra will be any different from other years.

It is always interesting to hear Dr. Muck's readings of the classics, for he gives them an unusual amount of accent and color. Under his baton Beethoven becomes especially vital, so it will be agreeable to hear the Boston Orchestra play the "Eroica." This is the symphony that was inspired by Napoleon and which Beethoven first thought of writing as early as 1789, when he first became deeply interested in the career of the First Consul as soldier, lawgiver, statesman and hero, and which was largely written at Ober-Doebling, in 1803. At length, early in 1804, it was completed, a fair copy was made, on the outside page of which were the words "Napoleon Bonaparte—Louis van Beethoven," and it lay on the composer's table awaiting the proper opportunity for official transmission to Paris. On May 3 the motion for making Napoleon Emperor passed the Assembly, and on the 18th, after his elevation by plebiscite, he assumed the title. The news of this quickly reached Vienna. Beethoven, learning of it, flew into a terrible rage, for he was the most ardent of republicans, and the copy which was to have been presented to Napoleon was never sent. In a fury of disappointment and with a torrent of reproaches, the composer tore off the title page and dashed it to the ground. At some later time it received the new title, the one by which we now know it, and under which it was published: "Sinfonia

---

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1 - 1914



EMELIE BERNER PALACE
FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LYRIC © AIME DUPONT

ew York, 1884

THE LYRIC

Two Germans, a Frenchman, an Austrian and a Finn, as composers, and an Italian as soloist, make a very cosmopolitan program which Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer at the first concert of the season in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15. The composers are Beethoven, Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss, Handel and Sibelius, and the soloist is the great barytone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Eroica, which seems to be particularly appropriate at this time. The other orchestral numbers will be Richard Strauss's superb tone poem Don Juan and the stirring Finlandia of Sibelius.

Mr. Amato will sing twice, an aria from Saint-Saens' Henry VIII. and an air from Handel's forgotten opera Xerxes. This last tune is familiar to everybody as the Largo. The program in its proper form is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Saint-Saens, Aria from Henry VIII.; Strauss, Tone Poem, Don Juan; Handel, air, Ombra mai fu (Largo); Sibelius, Finlandia.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 1 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth successive season in Philadelphia with the first of the five concerts of the regular series to be given in the Academy of Music, to-morrow evening at 8.15. Like nearly all the great orchestras of this country, for several weeks after the beginning of the European war, there was much doubt as to how greatly the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be affected by it from the summoning to military service of its members. At the time of the opening of the war there were no less than thirty men on the Continent including Dr. Muck. Of these expected to return only three have failed to arrive, Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet, Mr. Fosse, first oboe and Mr. Anesy one of the double basses. Mr. Agnesy is expected any time but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Grisez's by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's by Mr. Stanislaus, sole oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

The soloist for this first concert will be the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato, who will sing two numbers. The program in its proper order is as follows:—

Beethoven	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Saint-Saens	Aria, "Henry VIII"
Richard Strauss	Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Handel	Air, "Ombra mai fu"
Smetana	Overture to "The Sold Bride"

* * *

Es 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date Nov 1, 1914

IF the concert season was a little later in starting this season than last, it is making up for lost time. More than a dozen recitals and concerts will take place during the week in Carnegie and Aeolian halls.

Most important in the list of orchestral concerts in New York are those played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, which makes its first appearance here with two concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday concert will be all German. Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica"), Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn, the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture will be heard. There will be no soloist at either concert. On Saturday, in addition to the German Brahms' symphony No. 2, which was played last week by the Symphony Society, America will be represented by Chadwick's symphonic sketches, and Finland by the tone poem "Finlandia," by Shibelius.

* * *

Esta 384

[29]

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 29 1914

WILL PERPETUATE MUSIC

Backer of Boston Symphony to Provide Liberally After Death.

Special to "The Record."

Boston, Oct. 28.—Music lovers are discussing with interest tonight the announcement of Mayor Curley that Major Henry L. Higginson will provide for the perpetuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by inserting in his will a bequest of more than $1,000,000 as an endowment to that organization. Mayor Curley made the announcement in an address at the banquet of the East Boston Catholic Literary Association at the Elks' Home on Somerset street.

A fund of $2,000,000 has been put on deposit at a Boston bank by Thomas A. Forsythe in his will, the Mayor said, to carry on the work of the Forsythe Dental Infirmary. Major Higginson informed the Mayor he makes up each year a $40,000 deficit for the orchestra, and that he already had expended more than $900,000 on it.

k, 1884

BROOKLYN

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date NOV 1 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, will come to Brooklyn this week for the first in the series of Philharmonic concerts which they are to give this season under Brooklyn Institute auspices. This will be in the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Brahms' Second Symphony in D major will be played. Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, and his numbers will be arias from "Henry VIII." and Handel's "Serse."

rk, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 25 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the audience at Infantry Hall Tuesday to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its series of concerts were: President Faunce of Brown University, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. George McClellan Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Douglas Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Mrs. William B. Waterman, Mrs. Robert W. Taft, Miss Eleanor Taft, Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Mrs. Harold J. Gross, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Dr. and Mrs. William H. Peters, Miss Isabel Peters, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. William MacColl, Mr. Hugh MacColl, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriet M. Smith, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Durfee, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Steinert, Mrs. Charles J. Steedman, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Hope Shepley Hollister, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mrs. Ernest Salisbury, Mrs. Fred Mason, Mrs. John Mason, Prof. John F. Green, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mrs. C. Prescott Knight, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Frank Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Addison P. Munroe, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar J. Lowenstein, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross.

Esta 884

From EVG. STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 24 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist in the first Boston Symphony concert of the season at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' opera "Henry VIII" and Handel's "Ombra mai fu," which is the familiar "Largo." The symphony will be Brahms' "Second in D Major," and the program will include two pieces by Sibelius and the "Euryanthe" overture.

Est 884

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 25 1914

A wholly new symphony began the programme at the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston the past week. It is the work of Guy Ropartz, a French composer, little known on this side of the Atlantic, who is said to be a faithful disciple of Franck with an individuality all his own. Only once before, 10 years ago, has a composition by Ropartz been played at the symphony concerts, when under M. Gericke a fantasy was played. The new symphony is described as being short, abounding in harmonic strike, contrapuntal complexity and restless modulation.

Es 1884

Newspaper

NEW

From Providence, R. I.

Address

Date OCT 21 1914

ren.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

To a large and appreciative audience the Boston Symphony orchestra opened its Providence season last night in Infantry hall, with a program which was calculated to please and inspire, as is the custom with the orchestra that for so long has attracted during the winter season large audiences of music lovers.

The program last night included a number of selections which have been presented here on other occasions, but were all enjoyed by the audience last evening. Especially several of the orchestral numbers which have been before presented.

The distinguished Italian baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company, Pasquale Amato, was greeted with great enthusiasm by the audience, which fully appreciated his excellent work. Mr. Amato first appeared in this city a few years ago in company with Mme. Mero, the pianist, and at that time won hearty applause for his wonderful voice and clear diction, which is none the less beautiful now than at that time. His aria, "Qun donc commande quandil aime?" and his air from "Serse," were both given with a quality of tone and perfection of diction that at once drew a responsive applause from the eager listeners.

The introduction of the modern tone poem of Richard Strauss, between the works of the older composers, contrasted them none the less favorably by the innovation.

Contrary to expectations, the few changes in the personnel of the orchestra this year affected its work to no degree that was at all noticeable.

The orchestral selection most appreciated last evening was Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica," rendered with a skill that was truly inspiring, as is the theme of the air. It is a fitting memorial to a great man, as its composer intended it to be, if we are to believe traditon, which has it that Beethoven composed it in inspiration of Napoleon, before the latter's downfall.

The people of Providence are glad that the Boston Symphony orchestra is once again to be with them from time to time, and look forward with pleasure to the 17th of November, at which time the orchestra will return to this city for the second concert. Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist at that time.

The program.

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major. "Eroica," Op. 55.
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funermre; Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Saint-Saens ……………………………
..Aria, "Qui donc commande quandil aime?" from "Henry VIII," Act 1, Scene 4.

Richard Strauss ……………………………
..Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.

Handel ……………………………
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse," Act I, Scene 1.

Weber………Overture to "Euryanthe."

Es k, 1884

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 29 1914

WILL PERPETUATE MUSIC

Backer Of Boston Symphony To Provide Liberally After Death.

Boston, Oct. 29.—Music lovers are discussing with interest the announcement of Mayor Curley that Major Henry L. Higginson will provide for the perpetuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by inserting in his will a bequest of more than $1,000,000 as an endowment to that organization. Mayor Curley made the announcement in an address at the banquet of the East Boston Catholic Literary Association at the Elks' Home on Somerset street.

A fund of $2,000,000 has been put on deposit at a Boston bank by Thomas A. Forsythe in his will, the Mayor said, to carry on the work of the Forsythe Dental Infirmary. Major Higginson informed the Mayor he makes up each year a $40,000 deficit for the orchestra, and that he already had expended more than $900,000 on it.

Es 1884

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 2:30 o'clock, Pasquale Amato, the distinguished barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, "Henry VIII," and Handel's "Ombra mai fu," which is nothing else than the familiar "Largo." The symphony will be Brahms' second in D major and the program will include two pieces by Sibelius and the "Euryanthe" overture.

York, 1884

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 25 1914

* * *

Pasquale Amato, who sang here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, has but recently landed in this country, arriving on the Duca di Genova. He tells of being suspected on the Austrian frontier of being an Italian spy and relates that he was halted on Sept. 11 at Cormons, the Austrian frontier station, because of having in his possession three Italian newspapers. After explaining that he was an opera singer, which revealed that they knew little about grand opera at Cormons, Amato sang the prologue to "Pagliacci" without music, which inspired the chief customs officer to send a telegram to Amato's lawyer at Trieste, and after a delay of eight hours the singer was allowed to go free on condition that he leave Austria within 24 hours.

Amato, who spent the greater part of the summer on his estate at Cesenatico, had been engaged to sing in Berlin, Vienna, Budapest and Paris, and was to have sung at the Albert Hall, London, week before last, but the war canceled everything.

Estal 84

Newspaper Cutting

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 2

The Boston Symphony

Although Strauss' "Don Juan" seems to be the orchestral fashion of the day—it has already been played by the Boston and Chicago Symphonies and is announced by Mr. Stransky in New York—it has not been played in this city, and so far is unannounced. Instead the conductors have arranged to play the "Eroica" symphony twice in eight days, as Doctor Muck will play it one week after Mr. Damrosch. With the Boston Symphony, which may be expected in full force by that time, will come Pasquale Amato, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar "Henry VIII" and Handel's "Ombra mai fu," under which title is concealed the familiar "Largo." The symphony was played at the opening concert in Boston and the critics and audience alike were unreserved in praise.

, 1884

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 2

* * *

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in an address to that organization at the close of its first rehearsal this season, made an urgent appeal to the musicians, who represent a variety of European nationalities, to avoid all friction and discord because of war conditions abroad, and to maintain the strictest neutrality, asking the men to "keep the name of the orchestra as bright as it has been in the past." In this connection he said: "Mutual forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensable. Without it the orchestra cannot live."

* * *

, 1884

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date 2

AMATO TO SING AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, November 4. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, Henry VIII., and Handel's Ombra Mai Fu, which is the familiar Largo. The Symphony will be Beethoven's Eroica and the other numbers will be Strauss' Don Juan and Sibelius' Finlandia. The orchestra will bring its entire strength of 100 musicians.

Establish

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 25 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 3. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, "Henry VIII," and Handel's "Ombra Mai Fu," which is nothing else than the familiar "Largo." The symphony will be Brahms' Second in D Major and the program will include two pieces by Sibelius and the "Euryanthe" overture.

E 1884

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 25 1914

The first pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. There will be no soloist at either concert. Dr. Muck will play the first Boston programme at the Thursday evening concert, which comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe." On Saturday afternoon he will play Brahms's Second Symphony, George W. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches and Sibelius's "Finlandia." All the members of the orchestra have arrived from abroad and the personnel now contains its usual quota of 100 musicians.

Est 884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 25 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, November 4. He will sing an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, Henry VIII., and Handel's Ombra mai fu, which is nothing else than the familiar Largo. The symphony will be Beethoven's Eroica, and the others numbers will be Strauss' Don Juan and Sibelius' Finlandia. The orchestra will bring its entire strength of 100 musicians.

Estal 884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Pasquale Amato, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, November 2. He will sign an aria from Saint-Saens' unfamiliar opera, "Henry VIII," and Haendel's "Ombra mai fu," which is none other than the familiar "Largo." The orchestra will come in its full strength of 100 musicians. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica."

k, 1884

BOSTON GLOBE—
OCTOBER 17,

34TH SYMPHONY SEASON BEGUN

Dr Muck and Orchestra Welcomed.

Same Incomparable Virtuosity as of Former Years.

Beethoven's 3d Symphony and the "Don Juan."

Emerging practically intact from the ow and menace of war, Boston's Symphony Orchestra, the gift of stinguished son, the glory and pride the city, assembled yesterday after- with its eminent conductor before first Friday rehearsal audience of ear. The dramatic interest of the nt lifted it above that of the open- f any other season since these concerts began.

Since these men dispersed their several ways last May the Continent of Europe has been caught in the throes of a deadly struggle. More than 30 of them were across the water at the war's outbreak. Those with Dr Muck at the Bayreuth festival, then in progress, say that for weeks thereafter he denied all probability of his return to Boston, for Dr Muck, an ardent patriot, had wished to take the field in the service of his Emperor.

Here were these men, representing the two great contending interests, with sympathies and convictions necessarily antipodal, yet banded together for the employment of a peaceful art, for the performance of music, to which each would supply his own program, and what may have been the emotions the associations provoked by the third symphony of Beethoven, music reasonably National in its suggestion.

As the audience sat awaiting the appearance of Dr Muck there were infinite conjectures and the fancies of imagination to fill the mind. The miracle of [illegible] these players upon the platform in their accustomed places, as [illegible] the apprehension of dangers [illegible] and the shock of possible [illegible] if not dismemberment [illegible] that Dr Muck himself should open the usual stage door, walk down the passageway, around the second violins and to his place at the desk was not too remote from the seeming reappearance of one from the dead. It was but the confirmation of the senses that both conductor and orchestra were spared to the city and how serious would have been their loss.

There was cause enough for a demonstration, not of the kind which should be considered and thoughtfully executed. An outburst of feeling rather, spontaneous and instant, by which every hearer in the hall would have leaped to his feet as one man and paid a tribute to Dr Muck and to the orchestra by the only appreciable means of expression, a tribute that neither they nor any one who partook in it ever should have forgotten.

It is not so much a matter of importance to record what actually happened. There was a half of the audience and perhaps more that rose to its feet, the scantest possible act of courtesy, and the least one that instinct or impulse could have prompted. The others remained comfortably seated in their chairs and applauded in a desultory fashion, as if a commendable although uninspired work by a local composer were being performed, and the observing composer might chance to sit in their vicinity.

The present Boston Symphony Orchestra, built of flesh and blood, of routine, of high exactions, of noble standards, of tireless effort of love, devotion and sacrifice, until it is a marvelous instrument, sensitive, plastic, eloquent. Had this membership been disrupted, had it been necessary to graft on new material, even though skillful as individuals, that perfection of ensemble, that extraordinary sense of unity, that perfect balance, that unrivalled euphosy, must have suffered. Such a crisis may visit the Boston Symphony Orchestra some day. If it should be so, the public that has listened and gone its way these years, however it may have supposed itself appreciative, will realize the lofty rank of the orchestra with a new conviction. It was a beautiful tribute to see Maj Higginson walk to the platform and greet his conductor and his men. It is to be hoped that the audience tonight will give Dr Muck and his associates the welcome which the time and the occasion require.

Had the concert of yesterday been given months later in the season, and subjected to expectations associated with that time, it scarcely could have been more free from blemish or imperfection. The program was a familiar one. It was an inspiration that Dr Muck should have chosen Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, not in any attempt to find a modern protagonist for the Napoleon to whom the work first was dedicated, but because it is filled with noble thoughts, music that might well inspire, strengthen, comfort in a day of terrible problems, of carnage and destruction, music wrung from a great soul and expressive of grave and serious things, especially the first two movements. The funeral march might have been a requiem for the dead in battle. It was played with a majestic solemnity that was religious, and how incongruous, how ill-timed the applause that followed.

It is not necessary nor fitting to consider in detail the manner of playing each number. Dr Muck comes back to us the same master interpreter, the same superlative artist in recreating the thoughts of the composer, at times even ennobling the commonplace in them, the same master of variety in all the ways and means that make musical expression the ineffable consummate speech of moods; peerless as before in that infallible sense of proportion, of rhythm, of shading, in the ability to approach and crown a climax, to profile a contrast, to maintain a line of unbroken song, an unimpaired continuity of thought.

The "Don Juan" tone poem of Strauss was the epitome of interpretative and orchestral virtuosity. Dr Muck's Juan may be the youth whose veins are filled with fire and wine less than he whom the man of mellower years now reflects upon and recalls. It may be possible to consider this music played with a more volcanic impetuosity, with a more hectic blood, and as indicative of an individual. It was heard yesterday as the music of a type, an ideal. The breadth of the closing apotheosis had the quality of the universal. The reading made the work an epic, gave to it heroic proportions. With what incomparable beauty the oboe's love song and its accompaniment were played.

Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn were given with the same virtuosity and searching quest for beauty. As for the music itself, as with many a variation honestly labored upon, the hearer wonders why the simplicity and favor of the original tune ever provoked so tedious an excursion. The final number was Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

Of the new members of the orchestra, the first clarinet, Mr Sand, late of the Charlottenburg Opera (Berlin), probably will be the most conspicuous. It is early yet to know his full abilities, but yesterday, particularly in the love music of the "Don Juan," beauty of tone and a finished style were evident in his playing. Mr Malkin, the new 'cellist, is expected before the next concerts.

For the second week's programs Dr Muck will show his breadth of choice by composing his program as follows: The fourth symphony of Guy Ropartz (first time in Boston), director of the Conservatory at Nancy; Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, Mr Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches and three pieces by Sibelius—"Karelia," the Swan of Tuonela, and Finlandia.

The audience at the first concert showed no appreciable diminution in size over those of former seasons.

JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 24,

SYMPHONY HALL CONCERTS OPEN SUNDAY, NOV. 1

Zimbalist to Appear With New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

OTHER BRILLIANT STARS ANNOUNCED

Ethel Leginska Will Make Her Boston Debut on Nov. 9.

A week from tomorrow afternoon the season of Sunday concerts at Symphony Hall will begin. Nearly every Sunday has been filled from Nov. 1 to May 1, and all of these concerts, except those given by local choral societies, will begin at 3.30.

The first concert will be given by the Philharmonic Society of New York under Josef Stransky, its conductor. Since this orchestra began to come regularly to Boston a few years ago, it has built up a very considerable public here.

The soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist. Zimbalist, a Russian and a pupil of Leopold Auer, has won deserved recognition as a truly great artist. If he has not made such a wide appeal to the general public as his fellow-countryman and fellow-pupil, Mischa Elman, with the connoisseur, at any rate, he is given a higher place in the world of music.

The program that Mr. Stransky has arranged is, from a symphonic point of view, frankly popular. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," just played by our own orchestra, and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Mr. Zimbalist will play Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy."

The second concert, Nov. 8, will present Olive Fremstad, the dramatic soprano, and Pasquale Amato, the eminent Italian barytone. Mme. Premstad will sing songs by Hugo Wolf, some Scandinavian selections and also a group of folk-songs. Mr. Amato will sing "Eri-tu," from "The Masked Ball," a group of Russian songs, a group of old Italian airs and two songs by Frank LaForge. The two artists will sing the duo, "La ci darem" from "Don Giovanni."

One of the most effective artistic combinations of the season will be the joint concert by Julia Culp, the Dutch lieder singer, and Olga Samaroff, the American pianist, at the third of the Sunday afternoon concerts, Nov. 15. This will be Mme. Lamaroff's first appearance in Boston in several years.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FRENCH NOVELTY

Also Performs Tribute to Gardiner M. Lane's Memory.

The Symphony concert yesterday opened with the Mozart "Masonic Funeral Music" as a tribute to the memory of Gardiner M. Lane. The music has that gentle and yet deeply appealing expression of sympathy which is found oftener in the music of Mozart and Bach than in the works of more modern composers.

The chief interest of the afternoon was in the Ropartz Symphony No. 4 in C major, which was played for the first time in Boston. Probably few musicians in Boston are familiar with the name of Ropartz, unless they are organists and have played his effective pieces for organ.

The symphony played yesterday afternoon did not tempt one to become more familiar with the works of this composer. The beginning, introducing immediately the rather striking main theme, and leading to a really thrilling climax, promised more than the main part of the symphony managed to fulfil.

Here and there were beautiful bits of suggestive orchestral color, and all through the symphony there was considerable variety in the rhythmic structure. On the whole, however, the work did not seem very spontaneous. The ending, quite soft, with the divided strings playing gentle, broad-spread chords, was especially lovely.

The remainder of the program contained four symphonic sketches by Chadwick, and three compositions by Sibelius, "Karelia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlaudia." In Mr. Chadwick's own vein of rhythmic dance and song, no one of our American composers can give more pleasure. The third of the symphonic sketches, named "Hobgoblin," is delightfully whimsical. Mr. Chadwick was forced to rise from his seat in the audience and acknowledge the applause which his pieces earned.

"The Swan of Tuonela" was the most individual of the Sibelius pieces, though the other two compositions which ended the program had a great deal of natural power of expression.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

ORCHESTRAL PARTISANSHIP AND ITS ENVIES

A Mean and Comic Letter Against the Boston Orchestra That Is Going the Rounds in New York—Mrs. Beach Returns to Boston—Concerts at Steinert Hall — Wartime Anecdotes and Judgments—Items About Composers, Concerts and Opera

FEW things in this strange old world are more strange, bitter, envious and deaf to reason and prudence than partisanship in music, and few will go to sillier or meaner lengths to [illegible]

…y their malevolence. Ten times a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra undertakes a concert in New York that fills Carnegie Hall to the last seat and of which the reviewers usually write long and warmly. However they may judge the chosen pieces, they almost always find ample and stated reasons to applaud the work of the conductor and the men. The audiences, the flower of the concert-going public of New York are like minded.

Now, sundry partisans of the resident orchestras cannot sit tranquil under these inevitable things, and an anonymous letter from one such has been the round of the newspapers in New York and has inevitably oozed out of "office gossip" into publicity. The writer proclaims himself "one interested in the welfare of New York's symphony orchestras"; he complains of "the slighting manner" in which their concerts are reviewed, and of "the sloppy and slushing praise" that is heaped upon those of the Boston orchestra "irrespective of the merit of the performance"; he remembers "that New York capital is invested in New York orchestras," and he sees in visions that unlikely day in which resident orchestras will vanish from New York for lack of support. Having thus relieved his perturbed spirit, he rises to the height of his argument. What, then, is the remedy? Not the bettering of the New York orchestras but the deprecatory reviewing of the concerts of the Boston band. "Business is business" and "local industries," which advertise heavily (whereas the Boston Orchestra has no need of such reclaim) should be encouraged. Neither the reviewers nor the managing editors of the New York newspapers happen "to be built that way." Only partisanship in music is of such mean—and comic—stature.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 22.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
OCTOBER 17, 1914.

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH ONE NOVELTY

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Masonic Funeral Music.
(In memory of Gardiner M. Lane.)
Guy Ropartz. Fourth Symphony. (First time in Boston.)
Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. An Orchestral Suite.
Sibelius. "Karelia" overture.
The swan of Tuonela.
Finlandia.

Again an orchestral concert, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, and one of good contrasts and with one novelty. The lack of a soloist at these great concerts is never felt, and sometimes a brilliant vocalist seems almost an intrusion, to those who place Music above the star system. The opening number was not for criticism, nor intended for applause (although a few did applaud), since it paid homage to the memory of an eminent Bostonian. But we can state that Mozart's work was not intended for a large hall. It was originally for about a dozen instruments, including a now obsolete Basset-horn, and a then novel clarinette, and honored the memory of Brothers Mecklenburg and Esterhazy of Mozart's Masonic Lodge. The mournful tone of the basset-horn is coming back in some modern scores, and we hope that sometime the brilliant color of the discant-trumpets, with their very narrow tubes and shallow mouth-pieces (of a still earlier epoch) may also be restored to the modern tonal palette, says Louis C. Elson in The Advertiser, in his Symphony review.

Guy Ropartz is one of the many celebrities who graduated from the work-shop of Cesar Franck. He is not, perhaps, the greatest of the group, but his works have kept better within the symmetrical form and lucid style of his master than some others. This was not a strained set of dissonances, of crabbed rhythms and of unheard-of modulations, masquerading under the name of symphony, even though it was a continuous work, the movements joined together, of "played without pause," as the programme said (which suggests breathless haste), although there were rests in it, which we presume were not counted as pauses.

The work had the essence of the four regular symphonic movements, however. The opening theme was earnest and noble, and worked to a strong climax. There was clear melodic line in spite of some involved harmony, and often there were heavy outbursts contrasted with mysterious passages of softest character, which gave, like some of Mahler's works, the impression of programme music, but with its story untold.

The Adagio was strikingly sombre and mysterious, the Intermezzo being in strong contrast. There was something Brahms-like in the Allegretto, and a captivating rhythm. A new Adagio after this seemed to make an innovation in form, but could be regarded as an introduction to the Finale. The last named had not so much to say for itself, but the orchestration was good.

In this there was even a reminiscence of Ropartz's teacher, but not enough to call plagiarism. The work was well received, although we doubt if it could have been perfectly understood on a first hearing.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 24, 1914

ROPARTZ WORK ON PROGRAM OF THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives Satisfactory Reading of French Composition—George W. Chadwick's Piece Is Warmly Applauded

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; second public rehearsal. The program: Mozart, Masonic funeral music, in memoriam, Gardiner Martin Lane; Guy Ropartz, symphony No. 4, C major, first time in Boston; Chadwick, "Symphonic Sketches," suite for orchestra; Sibelius, "Karelia," overture, "Swan of Tuonela," legend, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Three composers could hardly have been better chosen to supplement one another than Ropartz, Chadwick and Sibelius. Each in the pieces on the program stood for definite types of musical expression. The three composers together accomplished what the first of them professed to do but did not, they filled out the cycle of thought and sentiment which a symphony is supposed to comprise.

An example of shrewd program making, then, were the selections of the second pair of concerts. The Ropartz work, the Chadwick suite and the Sibelius pieces combined gave all the effects and introduced all the contrasts of a symphony constructed on the Beethoven pattern or of a tone poem written on the Strauss formula. Ropartz in his fourth symphony shows himself a composer purely intellectual in mood, without either light or somber moments. His work is continuously played, and in feeling as well as in form, it is in a single movement. It contains all those elements of exposition and development which belong to the introductory movement and not seldom to the concluding movement of the classic symphony. It contains midway in its course pages which have some outward show of contrast—pages that exploit orchestral colors and schemes of harmony different from those used in the early parts of the work. But these do not get away from the original intellectual standpoint. They continue the argumentative methods used at the beginning. They never make anecdotal or picturesque appeal.

There are so many modern symphonies of the Ropartz type that they almost seem to be a protest against the century-approved plan, which demands that the composer present his appeal in at least three distinct ways, that he prove himself a thinker, a humorist and a sentimentalist. As a picture of society, a document describing the manners of the times in which the composers write, the symphonic form has always in its most approved manifestations in the first place made plain, serious statement, then gone into the satirical aspect of the case and lastly looked at it from the viewpoint of romance. The satire and romance may have come in reverse order, but both had to be there in unmistakable intention if the symphony was to stick in the repertory.

The coming of the writers of the tone poem did not alter the problem in the slightest. The three elements were always expected, whether the work was in four movements or one, whether it followed the allegro, scherzo and andante pattern, as in Haydn, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, or followed some literary program, as in Liszt and Strauss. The pieces of Richard Strauss that have a title borrowed from the philosophy or fiction alcove of the libraries or that take some fanciful name out of the experience of the composer, have the three expected elements of expression almost invariably, though they may be in a new arrangement, the humorous element perhaps recurring at intervals, instead of forming a distinct division of the work.

Repartz in his symphony in C major responds to the first only of the three conditions which listeners who accept Beethoven and Strauss as their standards insist on. But he responds with strong purpose to this one. His symphony is an admirable composition of its type. In its general style it follow the conservative Franck and D'Ind methods, but it takes up in one or tw places certain manners of combining th colors of the wind instruments tha the advanced school, represented by D bussy, has developed. The composer refers to these briefly, as though to say that there is some good in all the strangeness of the Debussy school, after all; [illegible] is in it [illegible] here in the latter pages of this symphony.

The work is deeply, but not too academically studied. It has a fine flow of theme and it lends itself well to an orchestra of full-toned string sections and of delicately balanced wind sections. It was presented sympathetically and brilliantly by Dr. Muck and his men.

The Chadwick symphonic sketches, the scherzo of the program, were neatly played, of course. Dr. Muck likes an orchestral humorist, and knows how to interpret one as few conductors do. He caught both the fun of the numbers and their style. When the playing of the pieces was over, he refused to take any of the applause to himself and his players, letting the audience call the composer, who was present on the floor, to his feet, as it has done on many occasions before.

A conductor is not always to be expected to give his best to small, concluding works on the day he produces a new symphony, but Dr. Muck read the three beautiful pieces of Sibelius with the deepest interest and care. A Beethoven slow movement rarely has such poetic presentation as "Karelia," "The Swan" and "Finlandia," the andante of the program, had at his hands. Especially the last two numbers were read with a desire to bring out all their meaning as pieces of Finnish sentiment. These works are of remarkable charm, the one as an accompanied orchestral song, the other as a hymn for the orchestral choirs.

The conductor gave a delightfully blended accompaniment for the melody of the English horn such as he has so often given when he had on the platform a visiting artist playing the solo part of a concerto, whether of violin or piano. The plaintive song of the low-voiced reed instrument now arose out of the full orchestral tone, now was submerged beneath it, now filled the ear completely with its complaint, now was lost to hearing. The orchestral hymnn, "Finlandia," was phrased as effectively by the whole orchestra as if a single voice were chanting its melody. Only the most careful preparation of this little piece could have made it the most memorable, in the playing, of all the numbers on the program.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 17

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS 34TH SEASON

PROGRAMME CLASSICAL, "MADE IN GERMANY"

Fine, Indeed, and Sensibly Varied, Beginning With Beethoven and Ending With Weber.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme.
Strauss—"Don Juan." Tone poem.
Weber—"Euryanthe" overture.

This programme might be labelled "Made in Germany," and it was purely orchestral, a matter which we always approve of. Dr. Muck was welcomed with even more than the usual cordiality when he took the stand, for there was some doubt about our getting him out of the European cauldron, and when we found not only our German conductor, but some excellent Austrian, French and Belgian players saved to us (MM. Holy, Longy and Lenom, for example) we were glad to see that the war had not destroyed our symphonic art. Many of the audience rose as the conductor entered to do him honor.

There was not quite the ensemble in the opening Symphony that we shall get by mid-season, but there was such an excellent reading of the work, and so much of hearty enthusiasm, that the old work was as virile and powerful as ever. It was born of war. Every great war leaves music in its wake, and a century ago Europe was in almost as universal throes as at present.

It remains to be seen whether Richard Strauss will give us an orchestral setting of the present turmoil which shall stand beside the "Heroic" symphony.

In listening to the great first movement of the warlike work, it is well to remember the apothegm of Beethoven. "Even when music pictures something ugly, it must itself remain beautiful." The stormy gusts of passion of the passages at the end of the closing theme, and in the development of this first movement are not hideous, as the battle scene in "Heldenleben."

The funeral march must have appealed to many who are grief-stricken over the sufferings of the present, and the oboe-playing here demands especial praise, as well as the nobility of the cello theme. The light-hearted swing of the Scherzo was exhilarating, and the few sterner measures, coming like a clash of swords, a memory of heroic deeds, amid the chatter of the crowd, was made in effective contrast. But the finale, although well played, never seems to us a worthy climax of the work. Like the finales of the violin concerto, the emperor concerto and even the great ninth symphony, it does not assimilate well with what has gone before.

But, after all, what Boston craves just now is a powerful Baseball Symphony, with the most brilliant runs, the most phenomenal base-playing, and a noble score—say 3 to 1, winding up with "The Land of the Free and the Home of the Braves." Brahms' Variations are a peculiar kind of musical intellectuality. He was able to turn and twist a theme into a dozen ingenious shapes. Such a talent is a dangerous thing, for it leads the composer to continue the transformations until the auditor loses interest unless he be a trained musician; it is apt to become "musician's music" before it comes to its end. Probably Haydn's own march-like theme was more appreciated by many than its marvellous transformations. But in these variations one could easily recognize the especial excellences of the orchestra, as each department passed in review. Violins, clarinets, oboes, bassoons, flutes, horns, etc., all stood in the limelight a little while. There were fine contrasts and excellent balance, so that one could follow the form amidst all its metamorphoses, up to the triumphant ending.

"Don Juan" is not Strauss' greatest work, but it is exciting nevertheless, and even if one is not entirely in sympathy with the hero's scientific investigations of the female sex, and his rather exacting search after an ideal, the orchestration is sparkling and difficult, and the jugglery of figures attractive. It is not quite as definite programme-music, not quite as clear a set of pictures, as the baby and the Strauss family, in the "Sinfonia Domestica," and not at all on the level of "Zarathustra," not to speak of "Death and Transfiguration." But it was a great revelation to hear such a difficult score in the very first concert of the season. It had excellent ensemble and thrilling power. The violins did wonderfully well, and it was not the right kind of weather for a "biting" string tone. In spite of this and of the sultry atmosphere of the hall the violin tones were anything but "dead."

The horns and trumpets also come in for detailed praise; in fact it would be hypercritical to speak of any defect. It showed that the orchestral concerts are to be grander than ever this season.

The wild deviltry of the work was spicily caught up. This Don Juan is not exactly the Don Giovanni of Da Ponte and Mozart, but nevertheless he is not a party whom careful mothers would invite to a five o'clock tea.

The technique displayed proved at once that all of our old favorites have returned, only we miss the excellent Urack, and especially our fine clarinettist, M. Grisez. We seem to have bad luck with clarinettists, for the best one we ever heard is at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, and now another one is swallowed up by the war.

Weber's theatrical music formed a showy end to the concert. The contrasts here were very sharply drawn, but Weber stands these abrupt transitions very well. There is the glare of the footlights in all his overtures, and they are easily comprehended by the average auditor. "Euryanthe" made a showy end to a fine and sensibly varied programme. The 34th season of the Symphony Orchestra will be as great as its 33 predecessors.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 24,

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Chadwick and Sibelius Also on 2d Rehearsal Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The symphony of D major of Guy Ropartz was played for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of Gardiner Martin Lane, Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music" was played as a prelude to the programme. There were also played George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" for orchestra, and three short compositions by Sibelius: the Karelia overture; the "Swan of Tuonela," after an episode of the Finnish "Kalevala," and the symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

REMARKABLE COLORING

These pieces are not among the most important and distinctive music of Sibelius, although "The Swan from Tuonela" is a very beautiful and atmospheric composition and irresistibly sincere in its inspiration and its mood. The orchestral coloring is very remarkable. It is, indeed, as though not one ray of light pierced to the Kingdom of Death. The tonal background for the solo of the English horn, simple as it appears, is a piece of masterly instrumentation. And how admirable was the solo playing of the [illegible] "Finlandia" is a fiery, patriotic composition, very clearly and strongly written, and it can be played with overwhelming fury. The Karelia overture is for us too heavily orchestrated, and, clear as the form is, and the matter skilfully presented, this is one of Sibelius' most conventional compositions.

Camp Meeting Tunes

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic sketches are assuredly among his best compositions for orchestra. Granted the sentimentality of the "Noel," it is honestly felt. The most commonplace movement is the scherzo, which depends far more upon orchestral tricks than upon an inherent originality of ideas for its effect. The "Jubilee" movement has much real humor and same camp-meeting tunes that are happily treated, even though again this verges perilously on the sentimental. But the prize of the four movements is the Vagrom Ballad. It is a native and an unvarnished mood—music that only an American composer could write, and music that could only have come from Mr. Chadwick among American composers. A lugubrious prelude by the bass clarinet is heard, and then a rowdy tramp's ditty, strongly rhythmed, devil-may-care, which inexplicably resolves into a parody of the motive of Bach's G minor organ fugue. A call from a stopped trumpet—one does not swear that the composer has refrained from a parody of the trumpet call from the "Leonore" overture. One is ready to believe queer things anywhere as the piece progresses.

Composer Bows Acknowledgment

There is then the singular change of mood, as with sweeps of the harp and some dour progressions of low wind instruments there is the suggestion of "the 30 days to come," as the poetic motto of the piece puts it. And finally there is the insolent conclusion. It was with reason that this piece, especially, was applauded, and the composer rose twice to bow his acknowledgements.

The Ropartz symphony is in three movements, which follow each other without pause. It is strongly reminiscent of Franck, with whom Ropartz studied composition. It is the work of pedant who fears God and his teacher. Idioms of Franck prevail, harmonic progressions, orchestral colors, a similar manner in the treatment of themes and figures, but, unfortunately, a lack of Franck's splendid grasp of form and Franck's clearness of vision and resources in development. One thinks that after all this speech is not too native with Ropartz, and it must be admitted that this is essentially an unoriginal symphony.

The themes have not a clearly marked physiognomy, and hence do not lend themselves too well to the cyclic treatment. There are places where the composer is apparently at pause as to what step to take next, and there is too often repetition of a figure instead of true development of a thought. And the resemblance to the structure as well as the emotional evolution of the D Minor symphony is a little too striking.

Not that this symphony lacks honesty of purpose. It is an earnest and very sincere effort, and at the best there is a certain open-air serenity of feeling that compensates in a measure for its short-comings. But it cannot be catalogued, by any stretch of the judgment, as a work which takes a place among the significant productions of the modern French school.

POST, SATURDAY,

OCTOBER 17,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BRILLIANT

Superb Performance at First Public Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first public rehearsal this son of the Boston Symphony Orch tra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert, even for these remarkable concerts, was in many respects of uncommon brilliancy. Happily there was no soloist, so that the superb orchestra, the peer of all soloists, could be heard without distraction, without obtrusive contrasts.

When Dr. Muck entered, he and his men were extended a welcome of unmistakable cordiality by an audience which had felt much anxiety of late respecting both conductor and players, the loss or even temporary suspension of whose activities would have been an irreparable misfortune to this city.

MAJOR HIG

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 24, 1914

ROPARTZ WORK ON PROGRAM OF THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives Satisfactory Reading of French Composition—George W. Chadwick's Piece Is Warmly Applauded

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; second public rehearsal. The program: Mozart, Masonic funeral music, in memoriam, Gardiner Martin Lane; Guy Ropartz, symphony No. 4, C major, first time in Boston; Chadwick, "Symphonic Sketches," suite for orchestra; Sibelius, "Karelia," overture, "Swan of Tuonela," legend, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Three composers could hardly have been better chosen to supplement one another than Ropartz, Chadwick and Sibelius. Each in the pieces on the program stood for definite types of musical expression. The three composers together accomplished what the first of them professed to do but did not, they filled out the cycle of thought and sentiment which a symphony is supposed to comprise.

An example of shrewd program making, then, were the selections of the second pair of concerts. The Ropartz work, the Chadwick suite and the Sibelius pieces combined gave all the effects and introduced all the contrasts of a symphony constructed on the Beethoven pattern or of a tone poem written on the Strauss formula. Ropartz in his fourth symphony shows himself a composer purely intellectual in mood, without either light or somber moments. His work is continuously played, and in feeling as well as in form, it is in a single movement. It contains all those elements of exposition and development which belong to the introductory movement and not seldom to the concluding movement of the classic symphony. It contains midway in its course pages which have some outward show of contrast—pages that exploit orchestral colors and schemes of harmony different from those used in the early parts of the work. But these do not get away from the original intellectual standpoint. They continue the argumentative methods used at the beginning. They never make anecdotal or picturesque appeal.

There are so many modern symphonies of the Ropartz type that they almost seem to be a protest against the century-approved plan, which demands that the composer present his appeal in at least three distinct ways, that he prove himself a thinker, a humorist and a sentimentalist. As a picture of society, a document describing the manners of the times in which the composers write, the symphonic form has always in its most approved manifestations in the first place made plain, serious statement, then gone into the satirical aspect of the case and lastly looked at it from the viewpoint of romance. The satire and romance may have come in reverse order, but both had to be there in unmistakable intention if the symphony was to stick in the repertory.

The coming of the writers of the tone poem did not alter the problem in the slightest. The three elements were always expected, whether the work was in four movements or one, whether it followed the allegro, scherzo and andante pattern, as in Haydn, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, or followed some literary program, as in Liszt and Strauss. The pieces of Richard Strauss that have a title borrowed from the philosophy or fiction alcove of the libraries or that take some fanciful name out of the experience of the composer, have the three expected elements of expression almost invariably, though they may be in a new arrangement, the humorous element perhaps recurring at intervals, instead of forming a distinct division of the work.

Repartz in his symphony in C major responds to the first only of the three conditions which listeners who accept Beethoven and Strauss as their standards insist on. But he responds with strong purpose to this one. His symphony is an admirable composition of its type. In its general style it follows the conservative Franck and D'Indy methods, but it takes up in one or two places certain manners of combining the colors of the wind instruments that the advanced school, represented by Debussy, has developed. The composer refers to these briefly, as though to say that there is some good in all the strangeness of the Debussy school, after all; [illegible] how much good there is in it can [illegible] here in the latter pages of this symphony.

The work is deeply, but not too academically studied. It has a fine flow of theme and it lends itself well to an orchestra of full-toned string sections and of delicately balanced wind sections. It was presented sympathetically and brilliantly by Dr. Muck and his men.

The Chadwick symphonic sketches, the scherzo of the program, were neatly played, of course. Dr. Muck likes an orchestral humorist, and knows how to interpret one as few conductors do. He caught both the fun of the numbers and their style. When the playing of the pieces was over, he refused to take any of the applause to himself and his players, letting the audience call the composer, who was present on the floor, to his feet, as it has done on many occasions before.

A conductor is not always to be expected to give his best to small, concluding works on the day he produces a new symphony, but Dr. Muck read the three beautiful pieces of Sibelius with the deepest interest and care. A Beethoven slow movement rarely has such poetic presentation as "Karelia," "The Swan" and "Finlandia," the andante of the program, had at his hands. Especially the last two numbers were read with a desire to bring out all their meaning as pieces of Finnish sentiment. These works are of remarkable charm, the one as an accompanied orchestral song, the other as a hymn for the orchestral choirs.

The conductor gave a delightfully blended accompaniment for the melody of the English horn such as he has so often given when he had on the platform a visiting artist playing the solo part of a concerto, whether of violin or piano. The plaintive song of the low-voiced reed instrument now arose out of the full orchestral tone, now was submerged beneath it, now filled the ear completely with its complaint, now was lost to hearing. The orchestral hymnn, "Finlandia," was phrased as effectively by the whole orchestra as if a single voice were chanting its melody. Only the most careful preparation of this little piece could have made it the most memorable, in the playing, of all the numbers on the program.

ADVERTISER.

OCTOBER 17

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS 34TH SEASON

PROGRAMME CLASSICAL, "MADE IN GERMANY"

Fine, Indeed, and Sensibly Varied, Beginning With Beethoven and Ending With Weber.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme.
Strauss—"Don Juan." Tone poem.
Weber—"Euryanthe" overture.

This programme might be labelled "Made in Germany," and it was purely orchestral, a matter which we always approve of. Dr. Muck was welcomed with even more than the usual cordiality when he took the stand, for there was some doubt about our getting him out of the European cauldron, and when we found not only our German conductor, but some excellent Austrian, French and Belgian players saved to us (MM. Holy, Longy and Lenom, for example) we were glad to see that the war had not destroyed our symphonic art. Many of the audience rose as the conductor entered to do him honor.

There was not quite the ensemble in the opening Symphony that we shall get by mid-season, but there was such an excellent reading of the work, and so much of hearty enthusiasm, that the old work was as virile and powerful as ever. It was born of war. Every great war leaves music in its wake, and a century ago Europe was in almost as universal throes as at present.

It remains to be seen whether Richard Strauss will give us an orchestral setting of the present turmoil which shall stand beside the "Heroic" symphony.

In listening to the great first movement of the warlike work, it is well to remember the apothegm of Beethoven. "Even when music pictures something ugly, it must itself remain beautiful." The stormy gusts of passion of the passages at the end of the closing theme, and in the development of this first movement are not hideous, as the battle scene in "Heldenleben."

The funeral march must have appealed to many who are grief-stricken over the [illegible]ings of the present, and the oboe-[illegible] here demands especial praise, as [illegible] the nobility of the cello theme. [illegible]-hearted swing of the Scherzo was [illegible]ng, and the few sterner measures, [illegible] a clash of swords, a memory of heroic deeds, amid the chatter of the crowd, was made in effective contrast. But the finale, although well played, never seems to us a worthy climax of the work. Like the finales of the violin concerto, the emperor concerto and even the great ninth symphony, it does not assimilate well with what has gone before.

But, after all, what Boston craves just now is a powerful Baseball Symphony, with the most brilliant runs, the most phenomenal base-playing, and a noble score—say 3 to 1, winding up with "The Land of the Free and the Home of the Braves." Brahms' Variations are a peculiar kind of musical intellectuality. He was able to turn and twist a theme into a dozen ingenious shapes. Such a talent is a dangerous thing, for it leads the composer to continue the transformations until the auditor loses interest unless he be a trained musician; it is apt to become "musician's music" before it comes to its end. Probably Haydn's own march-like theme was more appreciated by many than its marvellous transformations. But in these variations one could easily recognize the especial excellences of the orchestra, as each department passed in review. Violins, clarinets, oboes, bassoons, flutes, horns, etc., all stood in the limelight a little while. There were fine contrasts and excellent balance, so that one could follow the form amidst all its metamorphoses, up to the triumphant ending.

"Don Juan" is not Strauss' greatest work, but it is exciting nevertheless, and even if one is not entirely in sympathy with the hero's scientific investigations of the female sex, and his rather exacting search after an ideal, the orchestration is sparkling and difficult, and the jugglery of figures attractive. It is not quite as definite programme-music, not quite as clear a set of pictures, as the baby and the Strauss family, in the "Sinfonia Domestica," and not at all on the level of "Zarathustra," not to speak of "Death and Transfiguration." But it was a great revelation to hear such a difficult score in the very first concert of the season. It had excellent ensemble and thrilling power. The violins did wonderfully well, and it was not the right kind of weather for a "biting" string tone. In spite of this and of the sultry atmosphere of the hall the violin tones were anything but "dead."

The horns and trumpets also come in for detailed praise; in fact it would be hypercritical to speak of any defect. It showed that the orchestral concerts are to be grander than ever this season.

The wild deviltry of the work was spicily caught up. This Don Juan is not exactly the Don Giovanni of Da Ponte and Mozart, but nevertheless he is not a party whom careful mothers would invite to a five o'clock tea.

The technique displayed proved at once that all of our old favorites have returned, only we miss the excellent Urack, and especially our fine clarinettist, M. Grisez. We seem to have bad luck with clarinettists, for the best one we ever heard is at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, and now another one is swallowed up by the war.

Weber's theatrical music formed a showy end to the concert. The contrasts here were very sharply drawn, but Weber stands these abrupt transitions very well. There is the glare of the footlights in all his overtures, and they are easily comprehended by the average auditor. "Euryanthe" made a showy end to a fine and sensibly varied programme. The 34th season of the Symphony Orchestra will be as great as its 33 predecessors.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 24,

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Chadwick and Sibelius Also on 2d Rehearsal Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The symphony of D major of Guy Ropartz was played for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of Gardiner Martin Lane, Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music" was played as a prelude to the programme. There were also played George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" for orchestra, and three short compositions by Sibelius: the Karelia overture; the "Swan of Tuonela," after an episode of the Finnish "Kalevala," and the symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

REMARKABLE COLORING

These pieces are not among the most important and distinctive music of Sibelius, although "The Swan from Tuonela" is a very beautiful and atmospheric composition and irresistibly sincere in its inspiration and its mood. The orchestral coloring is very remarkable. It is, indeed, as though not one ray of light pierced to the Kingdom of Death. The tonal background for the solo of the English horn, simple as it appears, is a piece of masterly instrumentation. And how admirable was the solo playing of the [illegible] "Finlandia" is a very patriotic composition, very clearly and strongly written, and it can be played with overwhelming fury. The Karelia overture is for us too heavily orchestrated, and, clear as the form is, and the matter skilfully presented, this is one of Sibelius' most conventional compositions.

Camp Meeting Tunes

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic sketches are assuredly among his best compositions for orchestra. Granted the sentimentality of the "Noel," it is honestly felt. The most commonplace movement is the scherzo, which depends far more upon orchestral tricks than upon an inherent originality of ideas for its effect. The "Jubilee" movement has much real humor and some camp-meeting tunes that are happily treated, even though again this verges perilously on the sentimental. But the prize of the four movements is the Vagrom Ballad. It is a native and an unvarnished mood—music that only an American composer could write, and music that could only have come from Mr. Chadwick among American composers. A lugubrious prelude by the bass clarinet is heard, and then a rowdy tramp's ditty, strongly rhythmed, devil-may-care, which inexplicably resolves into a parody of the motive of Bach's G minor organ fugue. A call from a stopped trumpet—one does not swear that the composer has refrained from a parody of the trumpet call from the "Leonore" overture. One is ready to believe queer things anywhere as the piece progresses.

Composer Bows Acknowledgment

There is then the singular change of mood, as with sweeps of the harp and some dour progressions of low wind instruments there is the suggestion of "the 30 days to come," as the poetic motto of the piece puts it. And finally there is the insolent conclusion. It was with reason that this piece, especially, was applauded, and the composer rose twice to bow his acknowledgements.

The Ropartz symphony is in three movements, which follow each other without pause. It is strongly reminiscent of Franck, with whom Ropartz studied composition. It is the work of pedant who fears God and his teacher. Idioms of Franck prevail, harmonic progressions, orchestral colors, a similar manner in the treatment of themes and figures, but, unfortunately, a lack of Franck's splendid grasp of form and Franck's clearness of vision and resources in development. One thinks that after all this speech is not too native with Ropartz, and it must be admitted that this is essentially an unoriginal symphony.

The themes have not a clearly marked physiognomy, and hence do not lend themselves too well to the cyclic treatment. There are places where the composer is apparently at pause as to what step to take next, and there is too often repetition of a figure instead of true development of a thought. And the resemblance to the structure as well as the emotional evolution of the D Minor symphony is a little too striking.

Not that this symphony lacks honesty of purpose. It is an earnest and very sincere effort, and at the best, there is a certain open-air serenity of feeling that compensates in a measure for its short-comings. But it cannot be catalogued, by any stretch of the judgment, as a work which takes a place among the significant productions of the modern French school.

POST, SATURDAY,

OCTOBER 17,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BRILLIANT

Superb Performance at First Public Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first public rehearsal this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert, even for these remarkable concerts, was in many respects of uncommon brilliancy. Happily there was no soloist, so that the superb orchestra, the peer of all soloists, could be heard without distraction, without obtrusive contrasts.

When Dr. Muck entered, he and his men were extended a welcome of unmistakable cordiality by an audience which had felt much anxiety of late respecting both conductor and players, the loss or even temporary suspension of whose activities would have been an irreparable misfortune to this city.

RIBUTE

Beethoven's "Eroica" [illegible] Major Higginson, going down to the front of the stage, gave Dr. Muck his hand, as the members of an orchestra which includes 14 nationalities in its ranks, and the majority of those in the auditorium rose to their feet on an occasion which recognized only the fortunate relations of artists and lovers of art. The programme was as follows: "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," Johannes Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Euryanthe" overture, Weber.

Two seasons ago when Dr. Muck returned to Boston for his second engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he gave a memorable performance of the Beethoven symphony. There were sentimentalists present yesterday who in some vague and mysterious way imagined that thoughts of heroism and distress on the other side of the Atlantic would move the conductor to some variety of superhuman eloquence. It is good to be able to say that Dr. Muck is no such sentimentalist or poseur.

The Master Musician

As a master musician he interpreted the "Eroica" two years ago. As an artist with equally high ideals and an equally inexorable will to do all that could be done for a great work of art he read the symphony yesterday. It was a remarkable performance, but not more so, at least for the average musical memory, or more of an inspiration to the hearer than the earlier interpretation.

Nor was the composer any more parochial in his spirit when he wrought that symphony, which in the year 1914, more than a century after its creation, astounds one by its heroism, the grandeur of the ideas, the audacity of the conception. A Strauss is far less daring than the hero of this symphony. How could they have understood it in the first decade of the 19th century? If there were any movement in which the performers excelled yesterday, it was in the series of stupendous variations which make the finale.

Great Dramatic Effect

Allowance must be made for growth of appreciation on the part of the commentator, yet we question whether these variations have been performed hereabouts in years with such masterly clearness and dramatic effect.

In turn, the Brahms Variations stood the hardest of tests successfully. They were neither flat nor pale, after Beethoven's accomplishment in the same form. We are not among those who are displeased by the fact that the greatest composers have delighted in displaying their technical skill, as well as an unlimited wealth of new ideas, in building variations on themes which were often, in themselves, of inferior worth. Each of the variations of the set heard yesterday deserved a bravo, and with each one, thanks largely to the most illuminative performance, the interest of the hearer accumulated.

"Don Juan" Youthful

A performance, however, in which we are sure that Dr. Muck excelled all previous efforts with the same composition, was that of Straus' tone-poem. After all this is a work of overwhelming power. It is early Strauss—Strauss not entirely clear in his aims or mature in his technic, Strauss when the bareness of an idea may show more clearly than it shows in later works, Strauss when he is still embarassed by traditional methods of development, but, after all, it is music of consuming fire and youth and genius. The orchestra blazes color, passion, pride, strength and conquest. We now are well acquainted with our Strauss and his splurging color scheme. We know more than a little of his pet technical devices, and we are aware of at least some details of his master craft when the well of inspirations runs dry for a moment. "Don Juan" we had often thought already old-fashioned. Yesterday it was as young as the day on which it was made, and as eloquent. The thin places had been mysteriously metamorphosed. The music was white-hot and as irresistible as a spring torrent, and the virtuosity of the entire performance was intoxicating.

The overture of Weber, as in the case of the Beethoven symphony and the Brahms variations, was played with doubled wind [illegible]ts Personally, we objected to this in two places, in the overture and in the trio of the scherzo of the symphony. Six horns are for us entirely too coarse and heavy in their sound for the contrasting theme of the rustling, murmuring movement which is so suggestive of the mysterious stirrings of the natural world. On the other hand, in the finale of the symphony and in the music of Brahms, the additional horns were of the greatest value. Finally, the augmented wind was sadly uncharacteristic of the thought of Weber.

The overture was certainly taken in a spirit other than that of its period. Justice, indeed, was done its most romantic and individual measures, the strange music which is associated with the thought of the rising of the ghost in the drama. But the general heaviness of tone and accent in the allegro was for us entirely out of perspective. Weber caracoles on his prancing steed, but yesterday that steed was a dray-horse.

Next week the symphony of Guy Ropartz will be performed for the first time in Bos[illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 24.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS ROPARTZ SYMPHONY

Work by Breton Composer at 2d Rehearsal—Mozart Music in Memory of Mr. Lane.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Mozart.....................Masonic Funeral Music
(In memoriam: Gardiner Martin Lane).
Ropartz.....................Symphony No. 4, C major
First time in Boston.
Chadwick.....................................
Symphonic Sketches: Suite for orchestra
Sibelius.. { "Karelia," overture, Op. 10.
"The Swan of Tuonela."
"Finlandia," symphonic poem, Op. 26, No. 7.

J. Guy Ropartz is a good Breton. He is also a pupil of Cesar Franck. As a Breton, he has written an opera on a Breton subject, incidental music for dramas, whose action takes place in Brittany, and orchestral works illustrative of life, manners and customs in his loved province. His first symphony is based on a Breton choral; his catalogue includes a Breton Landscape, a Breton Sunday. In his first string quartet he makes use of Breton folk-songs. His devotion to his province is equalled only by that of Mrs. Micawber to Mr. Micawber.

That M. Ropartz is a pupil of Cesar Franck is clearly shown in the music by him that I have heard and read. As soon as the apotheosis of Franck began many claimed to be the pupil of this composer neglected while he was alive. This incensed the chief disciple, M. d'Indy, who has taken pains to give the list of Cesar Franck's genuine, simon-pure pupils warranted. M. Ropartz's name does not lead all the rest, but he is one of the faithful and the elect now living.

This symphony in C major, played without pause, was performed for the first time in Paris three years ago this month. It might be described as a thoughtfully considered, carefully worked composition, highly respectable, not too conservative, not affectedly modern. It is lacking in compelling inspiration. The imaginative flight is neither high nor sustained. On the other hand, the employment of the "generative theme," after the formula of Franck, is often ingenious; there are a few pages of contemplative and melancholy beauty; there are some unusual transitional passages. In an Allegretto section there is a suggestion of folk dance tunes. The weakest part of the work is the finale, somewhat in the nature of a scherzo. This is labored and ineffective until the few slow and gentle measures of the conclusion.

There are constant reminders of Cesar Franck's melodic and harmonic schemes. There is the familiar formula of the ascending, questioning or dubitative melodic phrase. There is the Franckian chromatic bass. There are the plaintive, sighing, episodic measures. But there is not the prolixity that too often makes the warmest admirer of Franck restive, impatient. Here and there is a suggestion of d'Indy, nor does the influence of the Wagner of "Parsifal" escape the hearer.

Mr. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, among the most genial of his compositions, should remind young composers that orchestral music by an accomplished musician, thoroughly grounded in the technic of his art, can be light hearted, spirited, and even humorous, for "A Vagrom Ballad" is in admirable burlesque vein, with the reckless song of the tramp, the sly allusions to the classics, the mysterious measures that give relief to the parodied pomp of song and fanfares. To many of our composers, young and old, are musically in doleful dumps. They would tell of Oedipus or some nameless tragedy of a perturbed soul ill at ease with the infinite, or they write in Bunthornian vein. Mr. Chadwick's spirited "Jubilee" with its hints at "patting Juba," the "Noel," with its direct and obvious sentiment; the fantastical "Hobgoblin" and the final sketch greatly pleased the audience. The composer was present and bowed in acknowledgement of the applause.

Of the three pieces by Sibelius only "The Swan of Tuonela" is wholly worthy of his reputation. The "Karelia" overture is for a theatre or a garden concert, and even then it is not first-class of its kind. The music is common. Perhaps it would be more effective if it were arranged for a brass band. The admiring Mrs. Newmarch, who accepts Sibelius in bulk, finds in this overture an ethnological significance. We do not go to a concert to study ethnology.

A patriotic Finn may be fired to frenzy by "Finlandia," but this sort of musical thing has been done better by lesser composers. The symphonic poem sounds like a "piece d'occasion." The surprising feature of its history is that it did not take a prize offered by a society, academy, or a patron of the arts. The music has a certain alcoholic spirit; it is sufficiently boisterous; but the "essential earnestness and reasonableness of the Finnish people"—to quote Mrs. Newmarch again—are expressed in tones that even at the time of hearing make no impression except that justice is not done to this worthy folk.

But "The Swan of Tuonela" is most [illegible]. One need not be acquainted with "Kalevala," the epic, to appreciate the strange gloom and indescribable pathos of this music. Rare imagination here finds apt and complete expression. By reason of its inherent qualities this "Legend," as performed, was the feature of the concert.

The orchestral pieces to be played next week are Brahms's Symphony No. 2; Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride"; Enesco's Suite, op. 9. Pasquale Amato will sing an air from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII." and "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's "Serse," the air popularly known as "Handel's Largo."

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH ONE NOVELTY

NEW WORK BY ROPARTZ WAS WELL RECEIVED

Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music Played in Honor of Mr. Lane, and Chadwick's Spicy Sketches.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Masonic Funeral Music.
(In memory of Gardiner M. Lane.)
Guy Ropartz. Fourth Symphony. (First time in Boston.)
Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. An Orchestral Suite.
Sibelius. "Karelia" overture.
The swan of Tuonela.
Finlandia.

Again an orchestral concert, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, and one of good contrasts and with one novelty. The lack of a soloist at these great concerts is never felt, and sometimes a brilliant vocalist seems almost an intrusion, to those who place Music above the star system. The opening number was not for criticism, nor intended for applause (although a few did applaud), since it paid homage to the memory of an eminent Bostonian. But we can state that Mozart's work was not intended for a large hall. It was originally for about a dozen instruments, including a now obsolete Basset-horn, and a then novel clarinette, and honored the memory of Brothers Mecklenburg and Esterhazy of Mozart's Masonic Lodge. The mournful tone of the basset-horn is coming back in some modern scores, and we hope that sometime the brilliant color of the discant-trumpets, with their very narrow tubes and shallow mouth-pieces (of a still earlier epoch) may also be restored to the modern tonal palette.

Guy Ropartz is one of the many celebrities who graduated from the work-shop of Cesar Franck. He is not, perhaps, the greatest of the group, but his works have kept better within the symmetrical form and lucid style of his master than some others. This was not a strained set of dissonances, of crabbed rhythms and of unheard-of modulations, masquerading under the name of symphony, even though it was a continuous work, the movements joined together, of "played without pause," as the programme said (which suggests breathless haste), although there were rests in it, which we presume were not counted as pauses.

The work had the essence of the four regular symphonic movements, however. The opening theme was earnest and noble, and worked to a strong climax. There was clear melodic line in spite of some involved harmony, and often there were heavy outbursts contrasted with mysterious passages of softest character, which gave, like some of Mahler's works, the impression of programme music, but with its story untold.

The Adagio was strikingly sombre and mysterious, the Intermezzo being in strong contrast. There was something Brahms-like in the Allegretto, and a captivating rhythm. A new Adagio after this seemed to make an innovation in form, but could be regarded as an introduction to the Finale. The last named had not so much to say for itself, but the orchestration was good.

In this there was even a reminiscence of Ropartz's teacher, but not enough to call plagiarism. The work was well received, although we doubt if it could have been perfectly understood on a first hearing.

Chadwick's Symphonic sketches are deliciously unconventional. They are so thoroughly American in humor that we doubt if any foreigner can understand or be fully in sympathy with them. There is a vein of humor in the nature of this composer that is unfortunately very rare in the leading American composers. He can compose an "Aphrodite," or the most intricate fugues, and can also produce a successful comic opera, or a wild bit of slum orgie as the finale of this Suite. Those who know of his playful bits of skilful counterpoint (crab canons and the like) sent to friends, or of his playful poems, in private life, recognize this charming element in his character, and the public have glimpses of it in his orchestral works semi-occasionally.

The Symphonic Sketches, then, are in that mood which Beethoven called "aufgeknoepft." There is a kind mixture of plantation dreams and of circus festivity in "Jubilee," which begins the set. Parts of this and of the Finale might be a Western mining town in a frolic, or a hanging-day in Mississippi or Texas. But the sweetness of "Noel" which followed was a tender picture that gained much by contrast. The horn-playing in "Hobgoblin," which was a quaint little ghost story, deserves a word of especial praise. But the unrestrained Finale always pleases us the best. It might be slangily called "A Musical Jag," and only slang can describe it, with its bassoon gruntings and xyllophone clappings. It does what Charpentier did in his "Vie de Poete" and "Julien," only it does it better and with less gruesome humor. Its own motto:—

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come,

describes it best. We take it for just what it is, a wild excursion into a field which no other American composer would dare to attempt, yet which is graphic, compelling, and has a raison d'etre. The work was very heartily applauded, and Mr. Chadwick was obliged to rise from his seat in the audience, and bow many times.

The concert now came to its Finnish with three Sibelius numbers. Of these we like the "Finlandia" best, for it tells a story that ought to appeal to every lover of freedom. It was written in 1894, when Finland was still a nation. Its earnestness was almost a prophecy. Small wonder that it was prohibited by Russia, for it was the voice of Liberty. Its themes are not actual folk-songs, but Sibelius so thoroughly caught up the spirit of his country that his own themes are sometimes mistaken for the songs of the people.

Naturally then, complexity, learned modulation, juggling of cross rhythms, can find no place here. It is direct and simple, yet majestic and leading to a very lofty climax. The notes of combat are contrasted with a tender theme of hope, and the end is triumphant enough to indicate that hope has come to fulfilment. Dr. Muck gave this tremendous power. It could not have been more deafening if it had been played on Krupp howitzers, and the trumpets gave their fierce figure with grand power.

The "Swan of Tuouela" is almost entirely soft and mysterious, as its subject demands, and it is sombre to a high degree. We admire its picturesque monotony, and its violoncello theme was played in the most beautiful manner. It is a superb portrayal of that melancholy which is innate with the true Finn.

"Karelia" was in excellent contrast. Here there was peasant dance and festivity, lively rhythms and trumpet blares.

The programme was not over-long, yet several left before the last group. We advise the auditors not to do so in the repetition of this programme tonight, for these final numbers are specimens of the most lofty and most genuine modern music.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 31,

DR. MUCK MASTER AT SYMPHONY

Is Very Effective in Operatic Music—Amato Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Pasquale Amato was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He sang airs by Saint-Saens and Handel, and the orchestral pieces, which were performed with superlative brilliancy, were Brahms' second symphony, Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and Enesco's Suite for orchestra, opus 9.

DR. MUCK THE MASTER

There had not been given before in this city such a performance of Smetana's overture. There was, indeed, only one thing lacking—the rising of the curtain for the opera to begin. There has been one conspicuous thing lacking in operatic annals of this city. That is, a conductor of the personal energy as well as the commanding genius of Dr. Muck for the opera house. It is impossible to believe that he could not give superb performances of certain operas, after the performance of this overture and of many other operatic excerpts at the Symphony concerts. Dr. Muck, of even more experience in the theatre than in the concert hall, has the dramatic sense, the instinct for every effective bit of instrumentation, for the emphasis that is to carry across the footlights. A hundred details of orchestration which had not been noticed before by the average music lover in Smetana's overture appeared yesterday, and the comedy spirit of the music was irresistible.

Shows Acme of Wit

The overture is a masterpiece. The manner of the fugue, erroneously associated by many with the thought of merely academic knowledge on the part of the composer, becomes here the vehicle of vehicles for humorous effect. The contrast of the lilting peasant songs, the exceeding clearness and discretion of the instrumentation; all is the acme of liveliness and wit and inspiration.

Not less remarkable was the interpretation of Brahms' symphony. The second movement was never so easy to grasp and so profound in its meanings, and the delightful allegretto was made the more delightful by the logic and inevitability of the tempi and the [illegible]

IBUTE

Beethoven's "Eroica" [illegible] jor Higginson, going down to the front [illegible] the stage, gave Dr. Muck his hand, as the members of an orchestra which includes 14 nationalities in its ranks, and the majority of those in the auditorium rose to their feet on an occasion which recognized only the fortunate relations of artists and lovers of art. The programme was as follows: "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," Johannes Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Euryanthe" overture, Weber.

Two seasons ago when Dr. Muck returned to Boston for his second engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he gave a memorable performance of the Beethoven symphony. There were sentimentalists present yesterday who in some vague and mysterious way imagined that thoughts of heroism and distress on the other side of the Atlantic would move the conductor to some variety of superhuman eloquence. It is good to be able to say that Dr. Muck is no such sentimentalist or poseur.

The Master Musician

As a master musician he interpreted the "Eroica" two years ago. As an artist with equally high ideals and an equally inexorable will to do all that could be done for a great work of art he read the symphony yesterday. It was a remarkable performance, but not more so, at least for the average musical memory, or more of an inspiration to the hearer than the earlier interpretation.

Nor was the composer any more parochial in his spirit when he wrought that symphony which in the year 1914, more than a century after its creation, astounds one by its heroism, the grandeur of the ideas, the audacity of the conception. A Strauss is far less daring than the hero of this symphony. How could they have understood it in the first decade of the 19th century? If there were any movement in which the performers excelled yesterday, it was in the series of stupendous variations which make the finale.

Great Dramatic Effect

Allowance must be made for growth of appreciation on the part of the commentator, yet we question whether these variations have been performed hereabouts in years with such masterly clearness and dramatic effect.

In turn, the Brahms Variations stood the hardest of tests successfully. They were neither flat nor pale, after Beethoven's accomplishment in the same form. We are not among those who are displeased by the fact that the greatest composers have delighted in displaying their technical skill, as well as an unlimited wealth of new ideas, in building variations on themes which were often, in themselves, of inferior worth. Each of the variations of the set heard yesterday deserved a bravo, and with each one, thanks largely to the most illuminative performance, the interest of the hearer accumulated.

"Don Juan" Youthful

A performance, however, in which we are sure that Dr. Muck excelled all previous efforts with the same composition, was that of Straus' tone-poem. After all this is a work of overwhelming power. It is early Strauss—Strauss not entirely clear in his aims or mature in his technic, Strauss when the bareness of an idea may show more clearly than it shows in later works, Strauss when he is still embarassed by traditional methods of development, but, after all, it is music of consuming fire and youth and genius. The orchestra blazes color, passion, pride, strength and conquest. We now are well acquainted with our Strauss and his splurging color scheme. We know more than a little of his pet technical devices, and we are aware of at least some details of his master craft when the well of inspirations runs dry for a moment. "Don Juan" we had often thought already old-fashioned. Yesterday it was as young as the day on which it was made, and as eloquent. The thin places had been mysteriously metamorphosed. The music was white-hot and as irresistible as a spring torrent, and the virtuosity of the entire performance was intoxicating.

The overture of Weber, as in the case of the Beethoven symphony and the Brahms variations, was played with doubled wind [illegible] ts Personally, we objected to this [illegible] two places, in the overture and in the trio of the scherzo of the symphony. Six horns are for us entirely too coarse and heavy in their sound for the contrasting theme of the rustling, murmuring movement which is so suggestive of the mysterious stirrings of the natural world. On the other [illegible] the finale of the symphony and [illegible] the music of Brahms, the addit[illegible] horns were of the greatest value [illegible] finally, the augmented wind was sadly uncharacteristic of the thou[illegible]t of Weber.

Th[illegible] overture was certainly taken in a spirit other than that of its period. Justice, indeed, was done its most roman[illegible] and individual measures, the stra[illegible]e music which is associated with the thought of the rising of the ghost in t[illegible] drama. But the general heaviness of tone and accent in the allegro was f[illegible] us entirely out of perspective. Weber caracoles on his prancing steed, but yesterday that steed was a dray-horse.

Next week the symphony of Guy Ropartz will [illegible] performed for the first time in Bos

---

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 24.

ORCHESTRA PLAYSROPARTZ SYMPHONY

Work by Breton Composer at 2d Rehearsal—Mozart Music in Memory of Mr. Lane.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Mozart..................Masonic Funeral Music
(In memoriam: Gardiner Martin Lane).
Ropartz..............Symphony No. 4, C major
First time in Boston.
Chadwick..................................
Symphonic Sketches: Suite for orchestra
Sibelius.. { "Karelia," overture, Op. 10.
"The Swan of Tuonela."
"Finlandia," symphonic poem, Op. 26, No. 7.

J. Guy Ropartz is a good Breton. He is also a pupil of Cesar Franck. As a Breton, he has written an opera on a Breton subject, incidental music for dramas, whose action takes place in Brittany, and orchestral works illustrative of life, manners and customs in his loved province. His first symphony is based on a Breton choral; his catalogue includes a Breton Landscape, a Breton Sunday. In his first string quartet he makes use of Breton folk-songs. His devotion to his province is equalled only by that of Mrs. Micawber to Mr. Micawber.

That M. Ropartz is a pupil of Cesar Franck is clearly shown in the music by him that I have heard and read. As soon as the apotheosis of Franck began many claimed to be the pupil of this composer neglected while he was alive. This incensed the chief disciple, M. d'Indy, who has taken pains to give the list of Cesar Franck's genuine, simon-pure pupils warranted. M. Ropartz's name does not lead all the rest, but he is one of the faithful and the elect now living.

This symphony in C major, played without pause, was performed for the first time in Paris three years ago this month. It might be described as a thoughtfully considered, carefully worked composition, highly respectable, not too conservative, not affectedly modern. It is lacking in compelling inspiration. The imaginative flight is neither high nor sustained. On the other hand, the employment of the "generative theme," after the formula of Franck, is often ingenious; there are a few pages of contemplative and melancholy beauty; there are some unusual transitional passages. In an Allegretto section there is a suggestion of folk dance tunes. The weakest part of the work is the finale, somewhat in the nature of a scherzo. This is labored and ineffective until the few slow and gentle measures of the conclusion.

There are constant reminders of Cesar Franck's melodic and harmonic schemes. There is the familiar formula of the ascending, questioning or dubitative melodic phrase. There is the Franckian chromatic bass. There are the plaintive, sighing, episodic measures. But there is not the prolixity that too often makes the warmest admirer of Franck restive, impatient. Here and there is a suggestion of d'Indy, nor does the influence of the Wagner of "Parsifal" escape the hearer.

Mr. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, among the most genial of his compositions, should remind young composers that orchestral music by an accomplished musician, thoroughly grounded in the technic of his art, can be light hearted, spirited, and even humorous, for "A Vagrom Ballad" is in admirable burlesque vein, with the reckless song of the tramp, the sly allusions to the classics, the mysterious measures that give relief to the parodied pomp of song and fanfares. To many of our composers, young and old, are musically in doleful dumps. They would tell of Oedipus or some nameless tragedy of a perturbed soul ill at ease with the infinite, or they write in Bunthornian vein. Mr. Chadwick's spirited "Jubilee" with its hints at "patting Juba," the "Noel," with its direct and obvious sentiment; the fantastical "Hobgoblin" and the final sketch greatly pleased the audience. The composer was present and bowed in acknowledgement of the applause.

Of the three pieces by Sibelius only "The Swan of Tuonela" is wholly worthy of his reputation. The "Karelia" overture is for a theatre or a garden concert, and even then it is not first-class of its kind. The music is common. Perhaps it would be more effective if it were arranged for a brass band. The admiring Mrs. Newmarch, who accepts Sibelius in bulk, finds in this overture an ethnological significance. We do not go to a concert to study ethnology.

A patriotic Finn may be fired to frenzy by "Finlandia," but this sort of musical thing has been done better by lesser composers. The symphonic poem sounds like a "piece d'occasion." The surprising feature of its history is that it did not take a prize offered by a society, academy, or a patron of the arts. The music has a certain alcoholic spirit; it is sufficiently boisterous; but the "essential earnestness and reasonableness of the Finnish people"—to quote Mrs. Newmarch again—are expressed in tones that even at the time of hearing make no impression except that justice is not done to this worthy folk.

But "The Swan of Tuonela" is most poetic. One need not be acquainted with "Kalevala," the epic, to appreciate the strange gloom and indescribable pathos of this music. Rare imagination here finds apt and complete expression. By reason of its inherent qualities this "Legend," as performed, was the feature of the concert.

The orchestral pieces to be played next week are Brahms's Symphony No. 2; Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride"; Enesco's Suite, op. 9. Pasquale Amato will sing an air from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII." and "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's "Serse," the air popularly known as "Handel's Largo."

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH ONE NOVELTY

NEW WORK BY ROPARTZ WAS WELL RECEIVED

Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music Played in Honor of Mr. Lane, and Chadwick's Spicy Sketches.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Masonic Funeral Music.
(In memory of Gardiner M. Lane.)
Guy Ropartz. Fourth Symphony. (First time in Boston.)
Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. An Orchestral Suite.
Sibelius. "Karelia" overture.
The swan of Tuonela.
Finlandia.

Again an orchestral concert, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, and one of good contrasts and with one novelty. The lack of a soloist at these great concerts is never felt, and sometimes a brilliant vocalist seems almost an intrusion, to those who place Music above the star system. The opening number was not for criticism, nor intended for applause (although a few did applaud), since it paid homage to the memory of an eminent Bostonian. But we can state that Mozart's work was not intended for a large hall. It was originally for about a dozen instruments, including a now obsolete Basset-horn, and a then novel clarinette, and honored the memory of Brothers Mecklenburg and Esterhazy of Mozart's Masonic Lodge. The mournful tone of the basset-horn is coming back in some modern scores, and we hope that sometime the brilliant color of the discant-trumpets, with their very narrow tubes and shallow mouth-pieces (of a still earlier epoch) may also be restored to the modern tonal palette.

Guy Ropartz is one of the many celebrities who graduated from the work-shop of Cesar Franck. He is not, perhaps, the greatest of the group, but his works have kept better within the symmetrical form and lucid style of his master than some others. This was not a strained set of dissonances, of crabbed rhythms and of unheard-of modulations, masquerading under the name of symphony, even though it was a continuous work, the movements joined together, of "played without pause," as the programme said (which suggests breathless haste), although there were rests in it, which we presume were not counted as pauses.

The work had the essence of the four regular symphonic movements, however. The opening theme was earnest and noble, and worked to a strong climax. There was clear melodic line in spite of some involved harmony, and often there were heavy outbursts contrasted with mysterious passages of softest character, which gave, like some of Mahler's works, the impression of programme music, but with its story untold.

The Adagio was strikingly sombre and mysterious, the Intermezzo being in strong contrast. There was something Brahms-like in the Allegretto, and a captivating rhythm. A new Adagio after this seemed to make an innovation in form, but could be regarded as an introduction to the Finale. The last named had not so much to say for itself, but the orchestration was good.

In this there was even a reminiscence of Ropartz's teacher, but not enough to call plagiarism. The work was well received, although we doubt if it could have been perfectly understood on a first hearing.

Chadwick's Symphonic sketches are deliciously unconventional. They are so thoroughly American in humor that we doubt if any foreigner can understand or be fully in sympathy with them. There is a vein of humor in the nature of this composer that is unfortunately very rare in the leading American composers. He can compose an "Aphrodite," or the most intricate fugues, and can also produce a successful comic opera, or a wild bit of slum orgie as the finale of this Suite. Those who know of his playful bits of skilful counterpoint (crab canons and the like) sent to friends, or of his playful poems in private life, recognize this charming element in his character, and the public have glimpses of it in his orchestral works semi-occasionally.

The Symphonic Sketches, then, are in that mood which Beethoven called "aufgeknoepft." There is a kind mixture of plantation dreams and of circus festivity in "Jubilee," which begins the set. Parts of this and of the Finale might be a Western mining town in a frolic, or a hanging-day in Mississippi or Texas. But the sweetness of "Noel" which followed was a tender picture that gained much by contrast. The horn-playing in "Hobgoblin," which was a quaint little ghost story, deserves a word of especial praise. But the unrestrained Finale always pleases us the best. It might be slangily called "A Musical Jag," and only slang can describe it, with its bassoon gruntings and xyllophone clappings. It does what Charpentier did in his "Vie de Poete" and "Julien," only it does it better and with less gruesome humor. Its own motto:-

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come,

describes it best. We take it for just what it is, a wild excursion into a field which no other American composer would dare to attempt, yet which is graphic, compelling, and has a raison d'etre. The work was very heartily applauded, and Mr. Chadwick was obliged to rise from his seat in the audience, and bow many times.

The concert now came to its Finnish with three Sibelius numbers. Of these we like the "Finlandia" best, for it tells a story that ought to appeal to every lover of freedom. It was written in 1894, when Finland was still a nation. Its earnestness was almost a prophecy. Small wonder that it was prohibited by Russia, for it was the voice of Liberty. Its themes are not actual folk-songs, but Sibelius so thoroughly caught up the spirit of his country that his own themes are sometimes mistaken for the songs of the people.

Naturally then, complexity, learned modulation, juggling of cross rhythms, can find no place here. It is direct and simple, yet majestic and leading to a very lofty climax. The notes of combat are contrasted with a tender theme of hope, and the end is triumphant enough to indicate that hope has come to fulfilment. Dr. Muck gave this tremendous power. It could not have been more deafening if it had been played on Krupp howitzers, and the trumpets gave their fierce figure with grand power.

The "Swan of Tuouela" is almost entirely soft and mysterious, as its subject demands, and it is sombre to a high degree. We admire its picturesque monotony, and its violoncello theme was played in the most beautiful manner. It is a superb portrayal of that melancholy which is innate with the true Finn.

"Karelia" was in excellent contrast. Here there was peasant dance and festivity, lively rhythms and trumpet blares.

The programme was not over-long, yet several left before the last group. We advise the auditors not to do so in the repetition of this programme tonight, for these final numbers are specimens of the most lofty and most genuine modern music.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 31,

DR. MUCK MASTER AT SYMPHONY

Is Very Effective in Operatic Music—Amato Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Pasquale Amato was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He sang airs by Saint-Saens and Handel, and the orchestral pieces, which were performed with superlative brilliancy, were Brahms' second symphony, Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and Enesco's Suite for orchestra, opus 9.

DR. MUCK THE MASTER

There had not been given before in this city such a performance of Smetana's overture. There was, indeed, only one thing lacking—the rising of the curtain for the opera to begin. There has been one conspicuous thing lacking in operatic annals of this city. That is, a conductor of the personal energy as well as the commanding genius of Dr. Muck for the opera house. It is impossible to believe that he could not give superb performances of certain operas, after the performance of this overture and of many other operatic excerpts at the Symphony concerts. Dr. Muck, of even more experience in the theatre than in the concert hall, has the dramatic sense, the instinct for every effective bit of instrumentation, for the emphasis that is to carry across the footlights. A hundred details of orchestration which had not been noticed before by the average music lover in Smetana's overture appeared yesterday, and the comedy spirit of the music was irresistible.

Shows Acme of Wit

The overture is a masterpiece. The manner of the fugue, erroneously associated by many with the thought of merely academic knowledge on the part of the composer, becomes here the vehicle of vehicles for humorous effect. The contrast of the lilting peasant songs, the exceeding clearness and discretion of the instrumentation; all is the acme of liveliness and wit and inspiration.

Not less remarkable was the interpretation of Brahms' symphony. The second movement was never so easy to grasp and so profound in its meanings, and the delightful allegretto was made the more delightful by the logic and inevitability of the tempo and the [illegible]

[illegible] in the [illegible] mysterious murmur of nature, the play of winds, the glory of the sun, the heights of mountains and this movement, worthily interpreted by Dr. Muck was the fitting capstone of the work. Three times the conductor was recalled to acknowledge the long continued applause.

Admirably Balanced

The programme was admirably balanced. The Enesco Suite is assuredly one of the finest compositions by a composer of the second rank in modern orchestral music. Enesco, a Roumanian, has grown up in Paris. It is the more astonishing that he should show, in this suite, a personality so intact. His remarkable technical acquirements have not dissipated the force and the originality of his ideas.

This is not Debussy, or D'Indy, or a thinned-out paste of either. Neither is the music Wagnerian or Pre-Raphaelite. It is the music of an individual —Enesco. It is written in an archaic manner. Many a composer has affected this manner, with a fair measure of success, but with Enesco the mood seems to be genuine, native to his genius.

Display of Genius

The orchestral coloring is fascinating for the dark and melancholy garb which it throws over the music. But this music does not rely solely upon the orchestra. It has line, and the most clearly defined form, in addition to mood. The man who could pen the prelude, with a theme stated only by strings, in unison, without supporting harmony save for the roll of the kettle-drum which furnishes an organ point for a few measures, is a man who is past master of his weapons.

The most original movements, however, are the minuet, with its curious cross rhythms, its haunting, veiled pathos, and the last fantastic piece, which Dr. Muck interpreted with astonishing effect. Of what was the composer thinking when he created this singular movement? There are fragments of Roumanian folk-tunes, artistically metamorphosed, strange calls, the most original effects of rhythm and all a mood of wild melancholy. What of the ancestry and the character of the man who wrote this music? Interpret the music as one may—and every hearer has the right to his own interpretation—it is engrossing in its style and its general character, and stamps the composer as a man of sincerity and personality.

Mr. Amato is a master of dramatic diction, and yesterday afternoon proved that he could sing in concert as well as in opera. His voice is not, for us, what it used to be. He has borne the brunt of too many Metropolitan performances of late years, in too big an auditorium, against too big an orchestra, but it is a noble organ for all that, and it was employed with a masterly intelligence. We prefer the old air of Handel, better known to English-speaking peoples as the "Largo," than we do that of Saint-Saens. Mr. Amato employed an orchestration which called for more instruments than those of Handel's time. He was cordially received.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 31

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

GLORY OF BRAHMS' SECOND SYMPHONY

Amato Wins Triumph in an Aria From Handel's "Xerxes"—Programme Delightful.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Second Symphony. D major.
St. Saens. Air from "Henry VIII."
Soloist, Pasquale Amato.
Smetana. Overture to "The Sold Bride."
Handel. Aria from "Xerxes."
Pasquale Amato.
Enesco. Suite for Orchestra.

Not a bit of crabbed modernism in this programme, not a single puzzle, but just simply delightful and refreshing music. We had almost forgotten that a concert might be absolute enjoyment instead of profound study.

Dr. Muck evidently loves his Brahms, and he makes his audience love him, too. We cannot forget how he once electrified Boston with the first Brahms symphony, in C minor, and that work is much more intricate, and less directly melodic than this one. Of all the four this is the popular symphony of this composer, and when it is read as it was on this occasion it becomes something to rhapsodize over. It is as shapely as if it were a model for Conservatory use. There is distinct form almost from beginning to end. A clear-cut sonata-allegro, another with an abbreviated return of themes, a definite rondo on two themes, and another sonata-allegro—that is all. But after listening to it no one dare say that the formal lemon is squeezed dry, that one must shake off the shackles of classical form in order to become interesting.

There is a serenity in the first movement that reminds one of a Greek statue. Only the skips of the closing theme seem rather flea-like and undignified. But the Coda makes full amends, for anything purer and nobler we do not know. Here the horn deserves honorable mention, for its very important phrases were sweetly given.

The chief theme of the second movement is rather saccharine for Brahms, but it by no means became mawkish in this reading, and Brahms' ingenuity of treatment would save the dignity of any theme.

In [illegible] scherzo, which [illegible] of the regular Scherzo form with Trio, in this work, the chief theme is varied with much boldness, and Dr. Muck and his orchestra caught up these metamorphoses with excellent brilliancy. This movement has not the delicacy of Mendelssohn (the king of Scherzo composers), but it has a piquancy and spice which stands well in place of that humor which Brahms did not possess.

The mysterious vein of the chief theme of the Finale was finely brought out, but, even at its best, we do not quite rank the last movement with the greatness of the first. But one could bathe and revel in such cool, clear music, and forget that the feverish and tremendously-scored modern musical cubism existed.

With the general public, even in musical Boston, a fine larynx outweighs a fine orchestra, and there was three times as big a rush-line for gallery seats as at the two previous, purely orchestral, concerts. But we may, in some degree, agree with the popular verdict, in this case, for Pasquale Amato is probably the best baritone of the world today, in spite of the tremendous power of Titto Ruffo's lungs. There was emotion and power in the great aria from St. Saens' "Henry VIII.," that opera which introduces such strange caperings in "Le Parc de Richmon." But the finer test was in the old "Ombra mai fu," from the Handelian opera. Here was pure Bel Canto, not a run, or an embellishment of any kind, behind which the artist could conceal a flaw of timbre or tone, all steady, pure legato-work, as if the voice were a noble violoncello. And Amato came through this test unscathed. His steady tones and flawless phrasing spoke of a management of breath that can only be the result of artistic method; such breath-control is not found in one in a hundred of operatic artists.

The audience fully realized the excellence of the work, and recall after recall followed both vocal numbers. The words of the song of Henry VIII., complaining of the tyranny of love, seemed rather odd to the student of history, who may remember how Anne Boleyn threw herself at the head of that monarch.

Smetana (accent the first syllable, gentle reader) is likely to outstrip his temporarily more famous pupil, Dvorak, in the race for Fame. Some of Dvorak's work is fading rapidly, and one does not find his compositions upon the concert-programmes nearly as often as when he was alive. The overture to "The Sold Bride" is not as great music as Smetana composed when he was dealing with more national subjects. His great symphonic tone-poems on Bohemian history are finer; but there is much that is bright and fluent in the work, and the counterpoint is skilful in construction and difficult in performance, and it was whipped up to great speed by Dr. Muck, yet played by the strings without flaw. The rapid fugal beginning was very fiery, and Dr. Muck seemed to empty the whole jar of paprika into the spicy passages. It was, at times, a kettle-drum and piccolo-fest, but this energy and excitement exactly suited the composition which is opera comique after all.

There was an agreeable dessert to this musical banquet in the shape of Enesco's orchestral Suite. This was as it should be. There had been nothing indigestible upon the Menu, and anything much deeper would have been out of place. But Enesco's Suite is not musical confectionery, any more than the "Peer Gynt" or the "Arlesienne" Suites are. In fact, it leans toward complexity in spite of its remarkable prelude in unison. In this the strings played with an ensemble that made them sound like one great instrument. The runs and the extremely wide skips were given with remarkable effect. Surely there is no other body of strings like this in America, or, since the European war has made its havoc in art, in the world.

The Enesco Suite is scored rather fully, for a composition of this kind, and is, as intimated, sometimes a trifle intricate, but it is fluent and a good specimen of sensible modern music, even if we prefer the Suites of Bizet or Grieg—and, by the way, why not resuscitate one of the Suites of Lachner, some day?

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 31,

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Outplays Itself in Brilliance.

Mr Amato Makes First Appearance in These Concerts as Soloist.

Third public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, Dr Muck conductor. Pasquale Amato was the soloist:

Brahms ....Symphony No. 2
Saint-Saens.........air "Qui donc commande"
From Henry VIII, Act 1, Scene 4.
Smetana........Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Handel...................Air, "Ombra mai fu"
Enesco ....Suite op 9

The feature of the concert was the superb playing of the orchestra, particularly in the first and third movements of the symphony and in Smetana's sparkling comedy overture. Imagine the furious tempo of the opening fugue in the latter attempted by a conductor less authoritative and by string players of less virtuosity. It is difficult to recall an orchestrat performanceof such fire, such impeccable precision, such dazzling brilliance.

Dr Muck's treatment of the symphonic scherzo was that of a master artisan carving in ivory. There was flexibility, subtlety of tonal gradations, exquisite lightness of touch that did not weaken the fibre of the music. His interpretation of the first movement was a brilliant exposition of its material. How clearly lyric and dramatic passages were set off against each other; how virile and emotional the climaxes; with what vocal beauty the first theme was sung.

It may be that Mr Amato had heard of the [illegible] of the melody commonly [illegible] Handel's "Largo" at [illegible] this city, or had learned [illegible] was surreptitiously introduced as an "extra" the audience broke into loud and rapturous applause. The air, by no means an ignoble specimen of the majesty of Handelian melody, and unfortunately sentimentalized to a sad degree, was not well suited to Mr Amato's voice in his present condition, nor did he sing it well. Still the most eminent baritone of this country, Mr Amato easily may challenge his rivals, but the truth remains that his voice is less rich in quality and less flexible in range and dynamics than when it first added welcome distinction to performances at the Opera House. Perhaps as the pardonable practice of a dramatic singer, perhaps for other reasons, there was a tendency to scoop up in the attack of a tone that was more habitual with Mr Amato than the style of his numbers warranted.

Accustomed primarily to the environment of the stage and its accessories of action, costume, scenery, Mr Amato plausibly may have felt nervousness at this first essay in the most coveted, most exacting concert appearance in this country. Tonight the bloom as of old may return to his voice, for it was a noble one, eloquent in heroic and in tender sentiment, capable of a thousand shades of variety in accent and in color, as in his memorable Figaro in "The Barber of Seville." In Saint-Saens' perfunctory air, on a test of no pronounced emotional significance, Mr Amato was skilled in delivery and intelligent in style. But there are the signs of labor for upper notes in full voice that formerly were not there.

Eneso's suite is unequal in interest. The final movement, noisy, barren of ideas and prolix, is not to be associated with the author of the first two; nor is the third, beginning with well enough established mood, worth the length to which it is spun. The first is lofty, serene, chaste in style. Barring the possible charge again of monotony, the air for unison strings might have come from some master Italian melodist of the 17th or 18th century, melody springing as the flight of a bird from the basic tones, to which it returns now and again, melody which touches upon an improvisational rhapsodic character, without the touch of commonness. The passage in the minuet for divided strings in harmonics, reminiscent of the old church modes, is one of arresting, engrossing beauty, ecclesiastic, pontifical, yet not vulgar in show, music which paints transcept and nave of a great cathedral, its stained glass win-

---

BOSTON JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 31,

AMATO SINGS AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Brilliant Features of the Concert Furnished by the Orchestra.

Pasquale Amato of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the second Brahms symphony attracted an extra large audience to the Symphony concert yesterday. Mr. Amato was not happy in his choice of songs. "Qui donc commande quand il aime?"—culled from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII.—and "Ombra mai fu," from the Handel opera, "Xerxes," are lack-lustre airs. The first is dull when transplated away from the operatic scene to which it belongs, and the second is duller. Nor is Mr. Amato yet at his ease on the concert platform and able to do himself full justic,e except in thoroughly congenial and familiar operatic airs.

Those who heard the Italian barytone yesterday for the first time have yet to hear him at his best—and his best so far belongs to the opera house and to his favorite roles in "Pagliacci," "Trovatore" and "The Barber of Seville." Still, the audience yesterday was pleased with what he did and it recalled him several times after each song.

The brilliant features of the concert were the performances of the once despised Brahms symphony, which jarred Boston so severely a third of a century ago, but now is generally admired for its glowing beauty and mid-Victorian simplicity, and of the Smetana overture, "The Sold Bride." The overture was performed with astounding speed and skill. That alone was a feat of virtuosity to make the concert memorable. But so was the superbly poetical reading of the symphony.

The finale on this week's program, which will be given again tonight, is Enesco's suite for orchestra.

The orchestra will be away on tour next week. The program for the concerts on Nov. 13 and 14 comprises the Sibelius symphony in A minor, the Beethoven violin concerto in D major, with Anton Witek as soloist, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

HERALD.

OCTOBER 31.

AMATO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Music of Air from "Henry VIII." Well Suited to Rich Baritone Voice.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pasquale Amato, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House sang for the first time with this orchestra in Boston. The program was as follows:

Brahms.........Symphony No. 2, D-major
Saint-Saens—Air, "Qui Donc Commande Quand Il Aime?" from "Henry VIII."
Smetana.....Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Handel — Air, "Ombra Mai Fu," from "Serse."
Enesco..........Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9

Brahms' second symphony is one of the most genial of his works. It is possible, as some say, that the conception of it was in his head when he was inventing his first; that, austere, granitic in the symphony in C minor, he wished to show in the second that he was, after all, a human being. While there is nothing in the second so imaginative and so impressive as the Introduction to the Finale of the preceding symphony, the introduction in which Alp answers Alp, the symphony in D gives a keener pleasure to a far greater number by reason of its melodic freshness and spontaneity. Particularly is this true of the first and third movements; the first with its beautiful horn theme beautifully developed, its compliment to Mendelssohn, the episode with the ascending, surging bass; the allegretto with its pastoral motive, its rythmic capriciousness, its contrasting measures for wood-wind instruments and strings, and above all its curious blend of melancholy, gaiety, wistfulness. The other movements are not so striking. There are fine thoughts in the Adagio and Dr. Muck gave a remarkably clear reading of pages that have often seemed laboriously confused, not worth painstaking investigation. The Finale is the most matter of fact movement of the four. Mr. Kalbeck may dilate on the "mighty swing of the triumphant song-theme," but this theme, no matter how brilliantly is may be played, is at the best conventional.

The performance of the symphony and of Smetana's ever-welcome overture was incomparable. Among the many qualities that put Dr. Muck in the very front rank of conductors is his sense of continuity in the musical flow. In his elastic treatment of a composition, in his care for details and his appreciation of salient points and eloquent climaxes, there is always the logical development of expression, never the reduction of a movement into episodes and mosaic work. The performance of the symphony aroused the audience to enthusiasm; that of Smetana's overture was an astonishing and virtuoso achievement.

The Suite of Enesco has more character than other compositions by this Roumanian Frenchified musician that we have heard. The unison for strings is too long and toward the last of it the composer has nothing to say, like a long-winded after-dinner speaker. The minuet that follows is often on the verge of being fascinating through the suggestion of the antique. The exposition of the chief theme is clumsy, but there are interesting harmonical devices, and pale, therefore effective schemes of color. The suite is interesting in this: there is apparently an attempt to express archaic thoughts in a modern manner; to give artificial life to well-worn formulas and disguise in modern dress the old tonalities.

Mr. Amato sang with a degree of emotion that did not overstep the line between the concert stage and the opera house an air from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII.," the complaint of the royal amorist and defender of the faith against Anne Boleyn for her coy reluctance and capriciousness. The music is well suited to Mr. Amato's rich and noble voice.

Would that he had sung the air from Handel's "Serse" with a little more sustained simplicity! Would that the accompaniment had been only for strings as Handel wrote it! This air, originally composed for a male soprano and known familiarly as "Handel's Largo," is unsurpassable in serene simplicity. Dr. Burney characterized it well: "In a clear and majestic style, out of the reach of time and fashion." Here was an opportunity for Mr. Amato to display the "grand style." "Ombra mai fu" is not passionate; it is not melodramatic; it is sheer beauty. As it was sung yesterday, with the amplified, foolish, incongruous, anachronistic accompaniment, the hearer might have cried out: "Why all this fuss about the sweet shade of a dear and lovely plant?" for Xerxes under a plane tree apostrophizes it, and Handel, not Puccini, wrote the music.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Nov. 13, 14 will include these pieces: Sibelius, Symphony No. 4; Beethoven, violin concerto (Mr. Witek, violinist); Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

[34]

ments. In the finale there is the mysterious murmur of nature, the play of winds, the glory of the sun, the heights of mountains and this movement, worthily interpreted by Dr. Muck was the fitting capstone of the work. Three times the conductor was recalled to acknowledge the long continued applause.

Admirably Balanced

The programme was admirably balanced. The Enesco Suite is assuredly one of the finest compositions by a composer of the second rank in modern orchestral music. Enesco, a Roumanian, has grown up in Paris. It is the more astonishing that he should show, in this suite, a personality so intact. His remarkable technical acquirements have not dissipated the force and the originality of his ideas.

This is not Debussy, or D'Indy, or a thinned-out paste of either. Neither is the music Wagnerian or Pre-Raphaelite. It is the music of an individual—Enesco. It is written in an archaic manner. Many a composer has affected this manner, with a fair measure of success, but with Enesco the mood seems to be genuine, native to his genius.

Display of Genius

The orchestral coloring is fascinating for the dark and melancholy garb which it throws over the music. But this music does not rely solely upon the orchestra. It has line, and the most clearly defined form, in addition to mood. The man who could pen the prelude, with a theme stated only by strings, in unison, without supporting harmony save for the roll of the kettle-drum which furnishes an organ point for a few measures, is a man who is past master of his weapons.

The most original movements, however, are the minuet, with its curious cross rhythms, its haunting, veiled pathos, and the last fantastic piece, which Dr. Muck interpreted with astonishing effect. Of what was the composer thinking when he created this singular movement? There are fragments of Roumanian folk-tunes, artistically metamorphosed, strange calls, the most original effects of rhythm and all a mood of wild melancholy. What of the ancestry and the character of the man who wrote this music? Interpret the music as one may—and every hearer has the right to his own interpretation—it is engrossing in its style and its general character, and stamps the composer as a man of sincerity and personality.

Mr. Amato is a master of dramatic diction, and yesterday afternoon proved that he could sing in concert as well as in opera. His voice is not, for us, what it used to be. He has borne the brunt of too many Metropolitan performances of late years, in too big an auditorium, against too big an orchestra, but it is a noble organ for all that, and it was employed with a masterly intelligence. We prefer the old air of Handel, better known to English-speaking peoples as the "Largo," than we do that of Saint-Saens. Mr. Amato employed an orchestration which called for more instruments than those of Handel's time. He was cordially received.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 31

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

GLORY OF BRAHMS' SECOND SYMPHONY

Amato Wins Triumph in an Aria From Handel's "Xerxes"—Programme Delightful.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Second Symphony. D major.
St. Saens. Air from "Henry VIII."
Soloist, Pasquale Amato.
Smetana. Overture to "The Sold Bride."
Handel. Aria from "Xerxes."
Pasquale Amato.
Enesco. Suite for Orchestra.

Not a bit of crabbed modernism in this programme, not a single puzzle, but just simply delightful and refreshing music. We had almost forgotten that a concert might be absolute enjoyment instead of profound study.

Dr. Muck evidently loves his Brahms, and he makes his audience love him, too. We cannot forget how he once electrified Boston with the first Brahms symphony, in C minor, and that work is much more intricate, and less directly melodic than this one. Of all the four this is the popular symphony of this composer, and when it is read as it was on this occasion it becomes something to rhapsodize over. It is as shapely as if it were a model for Conservatory use. There is distinct form almost from beginning to end. A clear-cut sonata-allegro, another with an abbreviated return of themes, a definite rondo on two themes, and another sonata-allegro—that is all. But after listening to it no one dare say that the formal lemon is squeezed dry, that one must shake off the shackles of classical form in order to become interesting.

There is a serenity in the first movement that reminds one of a Greek statue. Only the skips of the closing theme seem rather flea-like and undignified. But the Coda makes full amends, for anything purer and nobler we do not know. Here the horn deserves honorable mention, for its very important phrases were sweetly given.

The chief theme of the second movement is rather saccharine for Brahms, but it by no means became mawkish in this reading, and Brahms' ingenuity of treatment would save the dignity of any theme.

In the Intermezzo, which takes the place of the regular Scherzo form with Trio, in this work, the chief theme is varied with much boldness, and Dr. Muck and his orchestra caught up these metamorphoses with excellent brilliancy. This movement has not the delicacy of Mendelssohn (the king of Scherzo composers), but it has a piquancy and spice which stands well in place of that humor which Brahms did not possess.

The mysterious vein of the chief theme of the Finale was finely brought out, but, even at its best, we do not quite rank the last movement with the greatness of the first. But one could bathe and revel in such cool, clear music, and forget that the feverish and tremendously-scored modern musical cubism existed.

With the general public, even in musical Boston, a fine larynx outweighs a fine orchestra, and there was three times as big a rush-line for gallery seats as at the two previous, purely orchestral, concerts. But we may, in some degree, agree with the popular verdict, in this case, for Pasquale Amato is probably the best baritone of the world today, in spite of the tremendous power of Titto Ruffo's lungs. There was emotion and power in the great aria from St. Saens' "Henry VIII.," that opera which introduces such strange caperings in "Le Parc de Richmon." But the finer test was in the old "Ombra mai fu," from the Handelian opera. Here was pure Bel Canto, not a run, or an embellishment of any kind, behind which the artist could conceal a flaw of timbre or tone, all steady, pure legato-work, as if the voice were a noble violoncello. And Amato came through this test unscathed. His steady tones and flawless phrasing spoke of a management of breath that can only be the result of artistic method; such breath-control is not found in one in a hundred of operatic artists.

The audience fully realized the excellence of the work, and recall after recall followed both vocal numbers. The words of the song of Henry VIII., complaining of the tyranny of love, seemed rather odd to the student of history, who may remember how Anne Boleyn threw herself at the head of that monarch.

Smetana (accent the first syllable, gentle reader) is likely to outstrip his temporarily more famous pupil, Dvorak, in the race for Fame. Some of Dvorak's work is fading rapidly, and one does not find his compositions upon the concert-programmes nearly as often as when he was alive. The overture to "The Sold Bride" is not as great music as Smetana composed when he was dealing with more national subjects. His great symphonic tone-poems on Bohemian history are finer; but there is much that is bright and fluent in the work, and the counterpoint is skilful in construction and difficult in performance, and it was whipped up to great speed by Dr. Muck, yet played by the strings without flaw. The rapid fugal beginning was very fiery, and Dr. Muck seemed to empty the whole jar of paprika into the spicy passages. It was, at times, a kettle-drum and piccolo-fest, but this energy and excitement exactly suited the composition which is opera comique after all.

There was an agreeable dessert to this musical banquet in the shape of Enesco's orchestral Suite. This was as it should be. There had been nothing indigestible upon the Menu, and anything much deeper would have been out of place. But Enesco's Suite is not musical confectionery, any more than the "Peer Gynt" or the "Arlesienne" Suites are. In fact, it leans toward complexity in spite of its remarkable prelude in unison. In this the strings played with an ensemble that made them sound like one great instrument. The runs and the extremely wide skips were given with remarkable effect. Surely there is no other body of strings like this in America, or, since the European war has made its havoc in art, in the world.

The Enesco Suite is scored rather fully, for a composition of this kind, and is, as intimated, sometimes a trifle intricate, but it is fluent and a good specimen of sensible modern music, even if we prefer the Suites of Bizet or Grieg—and, by the way, why not resuscitate one of the Suites of Lachner, some day?

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 31,

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Outplays Itself in Brilliance.

Mr Amato Makes First Appearance in These Concerts as Soloist.

Third public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, Dr Muck conductor. Pasquale Amato was the soloist:

Brahms ....Symphony No. 2
Saint-Saens.........air "Qui donc commande"
From Henry VIII, Act 1, Scene 4.
Smetana........Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Handel..................Air, "Ombra mai fu"
Enesco ....Suite op 9

The feature of the concert was the superb playing of the orchestra, particularly in the first and third movements of the symphony and in Smetana's sparkling comedy overture. Imagine the furious tempo of the opening fugue in the latter attempted by a conductor less authoritative and by string players of less virtuosity. It is difficult to recall an orchestrat performanceof such fire, such impeccable precision, such dazzling brilliance.

Dr Muck's treatment of the symphonic scherzo was that of a master artisan carving in ivory. There was flexibility, subtlety of tonal gradations, exquisite lightness of touch that did not weaken the fibre of the music. His interpretation of the first movement was a brilliant exposition of its material. How clearly lyric and dramatic passages were set off against each other; how virile and emotional the climaxes; with what vocal beauty the first theme was sung.

It may be that Mr Amato had heard of the popularity of the melody commonly known as Handel's "Largo" at the "Pop" concerts in this city, or had learned that when it was surreptitiously introduced as an "extra" the audience broke into loud and rapturous applause.

The air, by no means an ignoble specimen of the majesty of Handelian melody, and unfortunately sentimentalized to a sad degree, was not well suited to Mr Amato's voice in his present condition, nor did he sing it well. Still the most eminent baritone of this country, Mr Amato easily may challenge his rivals, but the truth remains that his voice is less rich in quality and less flexible in range and dynamics than when it first added welcome distinction to performances at the Opera House. Perhaps as the pardonable practice of a dramatic singer, perhaps for other reasons, there was a tendency to scoop up in the attack of a tone that was more habitual with Mr Amato than the style of his numbers warranted.

Accustomed primarily to the environment of the stage and its accessories of action, costume, scenery, Mr Amato plausibly may have felt nervousness at this first essay in the most coveted, most exacting concert appearance in this country. Tonight the bloom as of old may return to his voice, for it was a noble one, eloquent in heroic and in tender sentiment, capable of a thousand shades of variety in accent and in color, as in his memorable Figaro in "The Barber of Seville." In Saint-Saens' perfunctory air, on a test of no pronounced emotional significance, Mr Amato was skilled in delivery and intelligent in style. But there are the signs of labor for upper notes in full voice that formerly were not there.

Eneso's suite is unequal in interest. The final movement, noisy, barren of ideas and prolix, is not to be associated with the author of the first two; nor is the third, beginning with well enough established mood, worth the length to which it is spun. The first is lofty, serene, chaste in style. Barring the possible charge again of monotony, the air for unison strings might have come from some master Italian melodist of the 17th or 18th century, melody springing as the flight of a bird from the basic tones, to which it returns now and again, melody which touches upon an improvisational rhapsodic character, without the touch of commonness. The passage in the minuet for divided strings in harmonics, reminiscent of the old church modes, is one of arresting, engrossing beauty, ecclesiastic, pontifical, yet not vulgar in show, music which paints transcept and nave of a great cathedral, its stained glass win-

---

BOSTON JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 31,

AMATO SINGS AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Brilliant Features of the Concert Furnished by the Orchestra.

Pasquale Amato of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the second Brahms symphony attracted an extra large audience to the Symphony concert yesterday. Mr. Amato was not happy in his choice of songs. "Qui donc commande quand il aime?"—culled from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII.—and "Ombra mai fu," from the Handel opera, "Xerxes," are lack-lustre airs. The first is dull when transplated away from the operatic scene to which it belongs, and the second is duller. Nor is Mr. Amato yet at his ease on the concert platform and able to do himself full justic,e except in thoroughly congenial and familiar operatic airs.

Those who heard the Italian barytone yesterday for the first time have yet to hear him at his best—and his best so far belongs to the opera house and to his favorite roles in "Pagliacci," "Trovatore" and "The Barber of Seville." Still, the audience yesterday was pleased with what he did and it recalled him several times after each song.

The brilliant features of the concert were the performances of the once despised Brahms symphony, which jarred Boston so severely a third of a century ago, but now is generally admired for its glowing beauty and mid-Victorian simplicity, and of the Smetana overture, "The Sold Bride." The overture was performed with astounding speed and skill. That alone was a feat of virtuosity to make the concert memorable. But so was the superbly poetical reading of the symphony.

The finale on this week's program, which will be given again tonight, is Enesco's suite for orchestra.

The orchestra will be away on tour next week. The program for the concerts on Nov. 13 and 14 comprises the Sibelius symphony in A minor, the Beethoven violin concerto in D major, with Anton Witek as soloist, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

HERALD.

OCTOBER 31,

AMATO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Music of Air from "Henry VIII." Well Suited to Rich Baritone Voice.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pasquale Amato, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House sang for the first time with this orchestra in Boston. The program was as follows:

Brahms.........Symphony No. 2, D-major
Saint-Saens—Air, "Qui Donc Commande Quand Il Aime?" from "Henry VIII."
Smetana.....Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Handel — Air, "Ombra Mai Fu," from "Serse."
Enesco..........Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9

Brahms' second symphony is one of the most genial of his works. It is possible, as some say, that the conception of it was in his head when he was inventing his first; that, austere, granitic in the symphony in C minor, he wished to show in the second that he was, after all, a human being. While there is nothing in the second so imaginative and so impressive as the Introduction to the Finale of the preceding symphony, the introduction in which Alp answers Alp, the symphony in D gives a keener pleasure to a far greater number by reason of its melodic freshness and spontaneity. Particularly is this true of the first and third movements; the first with its beautiful horn theme beautifully developed, its compliment to Mendelssohn, the episode with the ascending, surging bass; the allegretto with its pastoral motive, its rythmic capriciousness, its contrasting measures for wood-wind instruments and strings, and above all its curious blend of melancholy, gaiety, wistfulness. The other movements are not so striking. There are fine thoughts in the Adagio and Dr. Muck gave a remarkably clear reading of pages that have often seemed laboriously confused, not worth painstaking investigation. The Finale is the most matter of fact movement of the four. Mr. Kalbeck may dilate on the "mighty swing of the triumphant song-theme," but this theme, no matter how brilliantly is may be played, is at the best conventional.

The performance of the symphony and of Smetana's ever-welcome overture was incomparable. Among the many qualities that put Dr. Muck in the very front rank of conductors is his sense of continuity in the musical flow. In his elastic treatment of a composition, in his care for details and his appreciation of salient points and eloquent climaxes, there is always the logical development of expression, never the reduction of a movement into episodes and mosaic work. The performance of the symphony aroused the audience to enthusiasm; that of Smetana's overture was an astonishing and virtuoso achievement.

The Suite of Enesco has more character than other compositions by this Roumanian Frenchified musician that we have heard. The unison for strings is too long and toward the last of it the composer has nothing to say, like a long-winded after-dinner speaker. The minuet that follows is often on the verge of being fascinating through the suggestion of the antique. The exposition of the chief theme is clumsy, but there are interesting harmonical devices, and pale, therefore effective, schemes of color. The suite is interesting in this: there is apparently an attempt to express archaic thoughts in a modern manner; to give artificial life to well-worn formulas and disguise in modern dress the old tonalities.

Mr. Amato sang with a degree of emotion that did not overstep the line between the concert stage and the opera house an air from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII.," the complaint of the royal amorist and defender of the faith against Anne Boleyn for her coy reluctance and capriciousness. The music is well suited to Mr. Amato's rich and noble voice.

Would that he had sung the air from Handel's "Serse" with a little more sustained simplicity! Would that the accompaniment had been only for strings as Handel wrote it! This air, originally composed for a male soprano and known familiarly as "Handel's Largo," is unsurpassable in serene simplicity. Dr. Burney characterized it well: "In a clear and majestic style, out of the reach of time and fashion." Here was an opportunity for Mr. Amato to display the "grand style." "Ombra mai fu" is not passionate; it is not melodramatic; it is sheer beauty. As it was sung yesterday, with the amplified, foolish, incongruous, anachronistic accompaniment, the hearer might have cried out: "Why all this fuss about the sweet shade of a dear and lovely plant?" for Xerxes under a plane tree apostrophizes it, and Handel, not Puccini, wrote the music.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Nov. 13, 14 will include these pieces: Sibelius, Symphony No. 4; Beethoven, violin concerto (Mr. Witek, violinist); Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

SUNDAY POST,
NOVEMBER 8,

Can it be possible that Mr. Walter Damrosch is responsible for certain absurd statements attributed to him by his press agent? For instance, "opera has had no part in the evolution of real music." It is "not music as an art, but music as a spectacle." Orchestral, symphonic music—"is the only real music." Mr. Damrosch uttered these sentiments, we are told, at the beginning of his 30th year as conductor of the Symphony Society of New York.

What would Mr. Toscanini or Dr. Carl Muck, more accomplished than Mr. Damrosch as an operatic conductor, and at least as much so in the concert room, say to this? If Mr. Damrosch says that orchestral music is the only real music, what can be done for his idol, Richard Wagner? And did Mr. Wagner's operas have "no part in the evolution of real music?" Perhaps Mr. Damrosch is among those who condescend to admire Wagner as an orchestral writer, and despise him as a dramatist. Perhaps he would say that Wagner's operas were not operas, but symphonic poems, or make some other pseudo smart, ultra-modern comment. But we doubt if Mr. Damrosch would go so far as that. If he does not go as far as that, how can he reconcile his operatic ideals and those of the "master"? Wagner, always a dramatist, was perpetually harping upon a cardinal point in his theories which seems to have escaped Mr. Damrosch; that the eye should reinforce the ear, that "spectacle"—all aspects of the scenic art, should form an integral part of the musico-dramatic representation; that the opera should represent the ideal union of all the fine arts. And does Mr. Damrosch deny that these views, and their extreme emphasis by Wagner, and their all-important influence upon musical development, are false, illogical, insignificant

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 1 1914

rk, 1884

The regular season of Boston symphony concerts in Washington will open next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 at the New National Theater, when the orchestra will appear under its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian barytone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy. The fact that there was doubt for a time whether the orchestra could be assembled for the season probably added somewhat to the enthusiastic welcome which was given to it and to Dr. Muck, but all the connoisseurs of Boston unite in saying that it has never played more brilliantly and its ensemble work is as if it were in the middle of the season, rather than at the beginning. The ranks of the orchestra are full and there are no more new members in it than usually are found at the beginning of the season. These new members have fully justified the reports which have preceded them. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibeliur—his exquisitely melancholy, "The Swan of Tuonela" and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has many admirers in Washington for he is probably the greatest barytone of our time and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo." The program in its proper form is as follows:

"Symphony No. 2 in D Major" Brahms), aria from "Henry VIII" Saint-Saens), a "The Swan of Tuonela," "Finlandia" (Sibelius), air, "Ombra mai ur", from "Xerxes" (Handel), overture, Euryanthe" (Weber).

---

rom
ddress Philadelphia, P ate OCT 31 1914

rk, 1884

Concert and Recital

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thir-successive season in Philadelphia the first of the five concerts of the lar series to be given in the Academy usic. Like nearly all the great or-tras of this country, for several weeks
r the beginning of the European war, e was much doubt as to how greatly Boston Symphony Orchestra would be ected by it from the summoning to ry service of its members. At the of the opening of the war there were than thirty men on the continent, uding Dr. Muck. Of those expected eturn, however, only three have fail-arrive.
soloist for this first concert will deservedly admired baritone of etropolitan Company, Pasquale who will sing two numbers, an Saint-Saens opera "Henry and an air by Handel. The orestral numbers comprise the "Eroica"
Richard Strauss'

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 3 1914

k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN FINE PROGRAM

Gaps Made by War in Great Organization Effectively Closed

AMATO IN GOOD VOICE

Barytone Sings Varied Numbers, Displaying Great Range and High Tonal Quality

FULLY equipped in all choirs for its thirtieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its initial appearance of the season last evening at the Academy of Music, with a sterling program of instrumental numbers—Beethoven's stately "Eroica" symphony, Richard Strauss' tumultuous "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the gay overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride."

There was here ample room and verge for display of orchestral virtuosity, and under Doctor Muck's assertive direction the amazing skill of the Boston musicians was brilliantly exercised. Pianissimos in Beethoven's wonderful score could scarcely have been fainter—they were like echoes from elfland—while in the rage and turmoil of Strauss' ultra example of modernity in orchestration, the crashing of trombones, trumpets and drums resounded afar and shook the lights in the corridors.

As in seasons gone by, the Boston musicians' superb string choir was the primum mobile of each interpretation, sonorous, satisfying and highly informed, with the rare quality of tonality that has been so long the standard and the despair of orchestral conductors everywhere. This great instrument is as flexible as a string quartet and as powerful as an exposition organ.

The gaps made by wars alarms in wood, wind and brass choirs have been effectively closed—the artistic primacy of Doctor's Muck's organization is still strongly in evidence.

Contrary to custom, this first concert introduced a soloist—Pasquale Amato, moreover, first among an illustrious coterie of living barytones, and as artistic and resourceful on the concert stage as when suffused in the dazzling glow of music drama.

Amato sang the "Qui donc commande" scena and aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII"—a royal plaint, monotonously persistent in minor mode, and useful as a concert number only so far as it serves to illustrate Amato's rare dramatic quality of interpretation.

Later, in the shadow song "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's ancient opera "Xerxes"—for generations familiar as the "Largo"—Amato made generous exhibition of the tonal virtuosity that has made him a refulgent star in many climes and lands.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 1 1914

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth successive season in Philadelphia with the first of the five concerts of the regular series to be given in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening at 8.15. Like nearly all the great orchestras of this country, for several weeks after the beginning of the European war, there was much doubt as to how greatly the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be affected by it from the summoning to military service of its members.

At the time of the opening of the war there were no less than thirty men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive, Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet; Mr. Fosse, first oboe, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the double basses. Mr. Agnesy is expected any time, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Grisez's by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

The soloist for this first concert will be the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato, who will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens opera, "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel. The orchestral numbers comprise the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."
Saint-Saens—Aria, "Henry VIII."
Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Handel—Air, "Ombra mai fu."
Smetana—Overture to "The Sold Bride."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 1 1914

ork, 1884

The regular season of Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will open next Tuesday afternoon at half-past 4 at the New National Theater, when the orchestra will appear under its conductor, Mr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy. The fact that there was doubt for a time whether the orchestra could be assembled for the season probably added somewhat to the enthusiastic welcome which was given to it and to Dr. Muck. The ranks of the orchestra are full and there are no more new members in it than usually are found at the beginning of the season. These new members have fully justified the reports which have preceded them. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius—his exquisitely melancholy "The Swan of Tuonela," and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has admirers in Washington, for he is probably the greatest baritone of our time, and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo." The program in its proper from is as follows: Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, Saint-Saens aria from "Henry VIII," Sibelius (a) "The Swan of Tuonela," (b) "Finlandia;" Handel, air, "Ombra caif fur," from "Xerxes;" Weber, overture, "Euryanthe."

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 31 1914

rk, 1884

Famous Barytone To Sing Wednesday

Pasquale Amato, barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will make his first concert appearance in Baltimore next Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric.

Amato made his local debut as Tonio in "Pagliacci" during the Metropolitan Company's 20-performance season at the Lyric five years ago.

His numbers at the Symphony concert will be an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," and the aria "Ombra mai Fui"—the familiar Largo—from Handel's "Xerxes."

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Orchestra, will present a remarkably interesting instrumental program, comprising Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (No. 3). Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius, the Finnish composer.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 31 1914

1884

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth local season in Philadelphia with the first of five concerts to be given in the Academy on Monday evening. At the time of the opening of the European war there were no less than thirty men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive, Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet: Mr. Fosse, first oboe, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the double basses. Mr. Agnesy is expected any time, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Grisez's by Mr. Sand, first clarinet, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London. The soloist for the first concert will be the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato, who will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens' opera "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel. The orchestral numbers comprise the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's Overture "The Bartered Bride."

The Matinee Musical Club will begin its

Higginso

ORCH
AIDE BAN

Boston music lov
interest today the
Mayor Curley that
Higginson will pro
petuation of the Orchestra by inser bequest of more tha
endowment to that
Mayor Curley ma
ment in an address
the East Boston
Association at the
Somerset street.
A fund of $2,000,
on deposit at a
Thomas A. Forsyth
Mayor said, to carr
the Forsythe Denta
Major Higginso
Mayor he makes up
000 deficit for the or he has already exp
$900,000 on it.

From EVENING
Address: Washi

Date

Estal

Boston Symp

The regular sea
phony concerts
open Tuesday afte
at the New Nation orchestra will ap
ductor, Dr. Karl great Italian barito
as soloist. Mr. S
Mr. Grisez's place has, it is said, sho
musician of great same is true of th
bers.
Dr. Muck has arr program. The Brahms Second, in will be two charact
Finnish composer,
Swan of Tuonela"
The other orchestr

ably the greatest bar
He will sing an aria fr
by Saint-Saens, and H
"The Whirl of t

From POST
Address: Washi

Date

E

Musical

THE regular Symphony ton will ope at 4:30 at the orchestr
it conductor, Dr. Kar great Italian baryton
as soloist.
The orchestra's seas
in the middle of the brilliancy.
Dr. Muck has arra
tive program for t
Washington season.
be the ever delightful
D major, his second.
characteristic pieces b
poser, Jean Sibelius—ancholy, "The Swan o
stirring "Finlandia."
number will be Weber
anthe."
Pasquale Amato, th
has many admirers in is probably the great time and he shines a cert as he does on the will sing an aria b
Handel's

SUNDAY POST,

NOVEMBER 8,

Can it be possible that Mr. Walter Damrosch is responsible for certain absurd statements attributed to him by his press agent? For instance, "opera has had no part in the evolution of real music." It is "not music as an art, but music as a spectacle." Orchestral, symphonic music—"is the only real music." Mr. Damrosch uttered these sentiments, we are told, at the beginning of his 30th year as conductor of the Symphony Society of New York.

What would Mr. Toscanini or Dr. Carl Muck, more accomplished than Mr. Damrosch as an operatic conductor, and at least as much so in the concert room, say to this? If Mr. Damrosch says that orchestral music is the only real music, what can be done for his idol, Richard Wagner? And did Mr. Wagner's operas have "no part in the evolution of real music?" Perhaps Mr. Damrosch is among those who condescend to admire Wagner as an orchestral writer, and despise him as a dramatist. Perhaps he would say that Wagner's operas were not operas, but symphonic poems, or make some other pseudo smart, ultra-modern comment. But we doubt if Mr. Damrosch would go so far as that. If he does not go as far as that, how can he reconcile his operatic ideals and those of the "master"? Wagner, always a dramatist, was perpetually harping upon a cardinal point in his theories which seems to have escaped Mr. Damrosch; that the eye should reinforce the ear, that "spectacle"—all aspects of the scenic art, should form an integral part of the musico-dramatic representation; that the opera should represent the ideal union of all the fine arts. And does Mr. Damrosch deny that these views, and their extreme emphasis by Wagner, and their all-important influence upon musical development, are false, illogical, insignificant in the face of phonic achievement?

D. C.

NOV 1 1914

of Boston sym- Washington will open ernoon at 4:30 at the New Theater, when the orchestra ppear under its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian barytone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

rk, 1884

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy. The fact that there was doubt for a time whether the orchestra could be assembled for the season probably added somewhat to the enthusiastic welcome which was given to it and to Dr. Muck, but all the connoisseurs of Boston unite in saying that it has never played more brilliantly and its ensemble work is as if it were in the middle of the season, rather than at the beginning. The ranks of the orchestra are full and there are no more new members in it than usually are found at the beginning of the season. These new members have fully justified the reports which have preceded them. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibeliur—his exquisitely melancholy, "The Swan of Tuonela" and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has many admirers in Washington for he is probably the greatest barytone of our time and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo." The program in its proper form is as follows:

"Symphony No. 2 in D Major" Brahms), aria from "Henry VIII" Saint-Saens), a "The Swan of Tuonela," "Finlandia" (Sibelius), air, "Ombra mai ur", from "Xerxes" (Handel), overture, Euryanthe" (Weber).

---

rom

ddress Philadelphia, P

ate OCT 31 1914

Concert and Recital

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thir- successive season in Philadelphia the first of the five concerts of the ular series to be given in the Academy Music. Like nearly all the great or- stras of this country, for several weeks the beginning of the European war, e was much doubt as to how greatly Boston Symphony Orchestra would be ected by it from the summoning to itary service of its members. At the of the opening of the war there were less than thirty men on the continent, uding Dr. Muck. Of those expected eturn, however, only three have fail- arrive.

soloist for this first concert will the deservedly admired baritone of Metropolitan Company, Pasquale who will sing two numbers, an from Saint-Saens opera "Henry and an air by Handel. The or- numbers comprise the "Eroica" Richard Strauss'

rk, 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 3 1914

k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN FINE PROGRAM

Gaps Made by War in Great Organization Effectively Closed

AMATO IN GOOD VOICE

Barytone Sings Varied Numbers, Displaying Great Range and High Tonal Quality

FULLY equipped in all choirs for its thirtieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its initial appearance of the season last evening at the Academy of Music, with a sterling program of instrumental numbers—Beethoven's stately "Eroica" symphony, Richard Strauss' tumultuous "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the gay overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride."

There was here ample room and verge for display of orchestral virtuosity, and under Doctor Muck's assertive direction the amazing skill of the Boston musicians was brilliantly exercised. Pianissimos in Beethoven's wonderful score could scarcely have been fainter—they were like echoes from elfland—while in the rage and turmoil of Strauss' ultra example of modernity in orchestration, the crashing of trombones, trumpets and drums resounded afar and shook the lights in the corridors.

As in seasons gone by, the Boston musicians' superb string choir was the primum mobile of each interpretation, sonorous, satisfying and highly informed, with the rare quality of tonality that has been so long the standard and the despair of orchestral conductors everywhere. This great instrument is as flexible as a string quartet and as powerful as an exposition organ.

The gaps made by wars alarms in wood, wind and brass choirs have been effectively closed—the artistic primacy of Doctor's Muck's organization is still strongly in evidence.

Contrary to custom, this first concert introduced a soloist—Pasquale Amato, moreover, first among an illustrious coterie of living barytones, and as artistic and resourceful on the concert stage as when suffused in the dazzling glow of music drama.

Amato sang the "Qui donc commande" scena and aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII"—a royal plaint, monotonously persistent in minor mode, and useful as a concert number only so far as it serves to illustrate Amato's rare dramatic quality of interpretation.

Later, in the shadow song "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's ancient opera "Xerxes"—for generations familiar as the "Largo"—Amato made generous exhibition of the tonal virtuosity that has made him a refulgent star in many climes and lands.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 1 1914

Es

1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth successive season in Philadelphia with the first of the five concerts of the regular series to be given in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening at 8.15. Like nearly all the great orchestras of this country, for several weeks after the beginning of the European war, there was much doubt as to how greatly the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be affected by it from the summoning to military service of its members.

At the time of the opening of the war there were no less than thirty men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive, Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet; Mr. Fosse, first oboe, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the double basses. Mr. Agnesy is expected any time, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Grisez's by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

The soloist for this first concert will be the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato, who will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens opera, "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel. The orchestral numbers comprise the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."
Saint-Saens—Aria, "Henry VIII."
Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Handel—Air, "Ombra mai fu."
Smetana—Overture to "The Sold Bride."

1884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 1 1914

ork, 1884

The regular season of Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will open next Tuesday afternoon at half-past 4 at the New National Theater, when the orchestra will appear under its conductor, Mr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy. The fact that there was doubt for a time whether the orchestra could be assembled for the season probably added somewhat to the enthusiastic welcome which was given to it and to Dr. Muck. The ranks of the orchestra are full and there are no more new members in it than usually are found at the beginning of the season. These new members have fully justified the reports which have preceded them. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius—his exquisitely melancholy "The Swan of Tuonela," and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has admirers in Washington, for he is probably the greatest baritone of our time, and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo." The program in its proper from is as follows: Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, Saint-Saens aria from "Henry VIII," Sibelius (a) "The Swan of Tuonela," (b) "Finlandia;" Handel, air, "Ombra caif fur," from "Xerxes;" Weber, overture, "Euryanthe."

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 31 1914

rk, 1884

Famous Barytone To Sing Wednesday

Pasquale Amato, barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will make his first concert appearance in Baltimore next Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric.

Amato made his local debut as Tonio in "Pagliacci" during the Metropolitan Company's 20-performance season at the Lyric five years ago.

His numbers at the Symphony concert will be an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII." and the aria "Ombra mai Fui"—the familiar Largo—from Handel's "Xerxes."

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Orchestra, will present a remarkably interesting instrumental program, comprising Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (No. 3). Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius, the Finnish composer.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 31 1914

1884

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth local season in Philadelphia with the first of five concerts to be given in the Academy on Monday evening. At the time of the opening of the European war there were no less than thirty men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive, Mr. Grisez, the first clarinet: Mr. Fosse, first oboe, and Mr. Agnesy, one of the double basses. Mr. Agnesy is expected any time, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Grisez's by Mr. Sand, first clarinet, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Fosse's by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London. The soloist for the first concert will be the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato, who will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens' opera "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel. The orchestral numbers comprise the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's Overture "The Bartered Bride."

The Matinee Musical Club will begin its

Higginso

ORCH AIDE BAN

Boston music lov
interest today the
Mayor Curley that
Higginson will pro
petuation of the Orchestra by insert bequest of more tha endowment to that
Mayor Curley ma
ment in an address
the East Boston
Association at the
Somerset street.
A fund of $2,000,
on deposit at a
Thomas A. Forsyth
Mayor said, to carr
the Forsythe Denta
Major Higginso
Mayor he makes up
000 deficit for the o
he has already exp
$900,000 on it.

From EVENING
Address: Washi

Date

Esta

Boston Symp

The regular sea
phony concerts
open Tuesday afte
at the New Nation
orchestra will ap
ductor, Dr. Karl great Italian barit
as soloist. Mr. S
Mr. Grisez's place has, it is said, sho
musician of great same is true of t
bers.
Dr. Muck has arr program. The s
Brahms Second, in
will be two charact
Finnish composer,
Swan of Tuonela'
The other orchestr

ably the greatest bar
He will sing an aria fr
by Saint-Saens, and H

"The Whirl of th

From POST
Address: Washi

Date

E

Musical

THE regular Symphony ton will ope at 4:30 at the orchest
it conductor, Dr. Kar great Italian baryto
as soloist.
The orchestra's seas
in the middle of the brilliancy.
Dr. Muck has arra
tive program for
Washington season.
be the ever delightfu
D major, his second.
characteristic pieces
poser, Jean Sibelius—ancholy, "The Swan o
stirring "Finlandia."
number will be Webe
anthe."
Pasquale Amato, th
has many admirers in
is probably the great time and he shines a cert as he does on the will sing an aria b
Handel's

BOSTON AMERICAN, OCTOBER 28, 1914.

Higginson Million for Symphony

ORCHESTRA AIDED BY BANKER

Boston music lovers discussed with interest today the announcement of Mayor Curley that Major Henry L. Higginson will provide for the perpetuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by inserting in his will a bequest of more than $1,000,000 as an endowment to that organization.

Mayor Curley made the announcement in an address at the banquet of the East Boston Catholic Literary Association at the Elks' Home on Somerset street.

A fund of $2,000,000 has been put on deposit at a Boston bank by Thomas A. Forsythe in his will, the Mayor said, to carry on the work of the Forsythe Dental Infirmary.

Major Higginson informed the Mayor he makes up each year a $40,000 deficit for the orchestra, and that he has already expended more than $900,000 on it.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The regular season of Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will open Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock at the New National Theater, when the orchestra will appear under its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has, it is said, shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged an attractive program. The symphony will be Brahms Second, in D major. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia." The other orchestral number will be [illegible] ably the greatest baritone of the day. He will sing an aria from "Henry VIII," by Saint-Saens, and Handel's "Largo."

---

"The Whirl of the World."

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 1 1914

Musical Events

THE regular season of Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will open Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 at the National, when the orchestra will appear under it conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian barytone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius—his exquisitely melancholy, "The Swan of Tuonela," and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has many admirers in Washington, for he is probably the greatest barytone of our time and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo."

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 1 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth season in Philadelphia in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. For several weeks after the beginning of the European war there was fear that the orchestra would be greatly affected by the summoning of members to military service. At the time of the opening of the war there were 30 orchestra men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive—Grises, the first clarinet; Fosse, first oboe, and Agnesy, one of the double basses. Agnesy is expected soon, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled by Sand, first clarinet, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

Copyright by Aimee Dupont, N. Y.
PASQUALE AMATO.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

AMATO TO SING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Barytone Will Be Heard With Dr. Muck's Musicians Tomorrow Night

MADAME SAMAROFF ILL

aniste To Be Replaced on Stokowski's Program by Efrem Zimbalist, Violinist

Pasquale Amato is a name which should aw many persons to the concert to be en tomorrow evening in the Academy Music by the Boston Symphony Orestra, when that organization opens its ritieth consecutive season in Philadelhia. Besides the barytone, there will be a number of interesting features, especially the first appearance, in their new capacities, of players who replaced regular members of the orchestra, detained in Europe by the war.

These men are Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, who assumes the duties of Mr. Grisez, and Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London, who substitutes for Mr. Fosse, first oboist. The place of Mr. Agnesy, one of the double bassi, who had not yet arrived from abroad, has not been filled, as his return is expected soon.

Mr. Amato, whose assumption of leading roles with the Metropolitan Opera Company here has made him a vital figure in the domain of local music, will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel, "Ombra mai fu." The orchestral offerings, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, will comprise the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' familiar but fine tone poem, "Don Juan," and the lively overture to Bedrick Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," which, unfortunately, is [illegible]

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1 - 1914

FAMOUS BARYTONE COMING WEDNESDAY

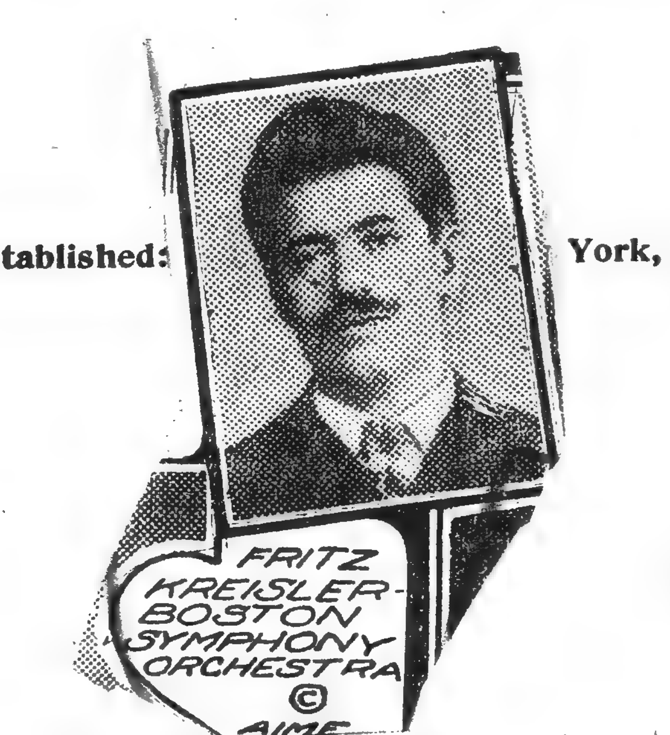
PASQUALE AMATO

Pasquale Amato, first barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will sing two numbers at the Lyric Wednesday night, when he will appear as soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season.

His first offering will be an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII." and his second the celebrated largo from Handel's "Xerxes."

Dr. Muck, the director, will present

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 31 1914



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC

Two Germans, a Frenchman, an Austrian and a Finn, as composers, and an Italian as soloist, make a very cosmopolitan program which Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer at the first concert of the season in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15. The composers are Beethoven, Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss, Handel and Sibelius, and the soloist is the great barytone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Eroica, which seems to be particularly appropriate at this time. The other orchestral numbers will be Richard Strauss's superb tone poem Don Juan and the stirring Finlandia of Sibelius.

Mr. Amato will sing twice, an aria from Saint-Saens' Henry VIII. and an air from Handel's forgotten opera Xerxes. This last tune is familiar to everybody as the Largo. The program in its proper form is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Saint-Saens, Aria from Henry VIII.; Strauss, Tone Poem, Don Juan; Handel, air, Ombra mai fu (Largo); Sibelius, Finlandia.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Opening Symphony Concert of Local Season Given Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, who would have been fighting in the German army had he been allowed his way, but whose application was rejected, gave the first concert of its thirtieth local season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of one of those large and brilliant audiences which these occasions almost invariably attract. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was the central feature of the program, an unfortunate circumstance in view of the fact that the same composition was so recently given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. It is true that not very many heard it then, but there were some who did, and they would have preferred a change last evening.

How it happens that different orchestras so frequently duplicate their productions is a mystery upon which many have speculated, but which no one yet has risen to explain. Is the repetition a mere coincidence, an almost incredible hypothesis, or is it that one conductor wants to show the superiority of his particular interpretation over that of some other? Whatever may be the explanation, the occurrence is frequent, and it may be remarked in passing that Smetana's overture to the "Bartered Bride," which was played so brilliantly last evening, is also to be performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday and Saturday of the present week. There is something more than natural in this. In all conscience there is a sufficiently extended repertoire from which to choose.

There is little need to enlarge on the manner in which the Beethoven number was performed. It was characterized by all the excellence for which the Boston organization has long been distinguished, by the utmost beauty of tone, by a perfect precision of movement, by an admirable fluidity of response to the indications of the conductor and with a fine eloquence of emotional expression. Besides the Smetana overture the other orchestral selection was the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, which was given with splendid force and fire. The assisting artist of the occasion was that excellent baritone, Mr. Paquale Amato, whose vine voice and cultivated method were effectively displayed in an air from Saint-Saens' "Henry the Eighth," and in Handel's "Ombra mai fu," the well-known largo. Hearty and prolonged applause bespoke the appreciation of the audience.

To Address Laryngologists

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 31 1914

The Boston Symphony

The 30th successive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will begin at the Academy of Music Monday night when Dr. Karl Muck will conduct the "Eroica" symphony. The roster of the band is practically complete. Messrs. Fosse, first oboe; Grisez, first clarinet, and Agnesy, one of the double basses, are the only ones held up by the war. Mr. Agnesy is momentarily expected, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Sand coming from the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, for Mr. Griesz's place, and Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist, of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London, taking Mr. Fosse's position. With the Symphony will come Pasquale Amato, called by the press agent "the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House," a characterization which will not be challenged.

It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck will conduct also the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, because this number seems to be the high favorite among conductors this season. Doctor Muck, Mr. Stransky, in New York, and Mr. Stock, in Chicago, included it in their first programs. As it it not announced by the local orchestra, Philadelphians will be grateful to Boston for bringing it. The "Eroica" symphony has also been popular this year. It was played at the Academy by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra a week ago in a manner which will make music-lovers all the more anxious to hear it properly done Monday night. The circle will be complete when Mr. Stokowski conducts the same symphony in his last but one program, early in April.

The complete program for the Boston Symphony is as follows:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Saint-Saens	Aria, "Henry VIII"
Richard Strauss	Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Handel	Air, "Ombra mai fu"
Smetana	Overture to "The Sold Bride"

[36]

J. MacB.

BOSTON AMERICAN, OCTOBER 28, 1914.

Higginson Million for Svmphony

ORCHESTRA AIDED BY BANKER

Boston music lovers discussed with interest today the announcement of Mayor Curley that Major Henry L. Higginson will provide for the perpetuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by inserting in his will a bequest of more than $1,000,000 as an endowment to that organization.

Mayor Curley made the announcement in an address at the banquet of the East Boston Catholic Literary Association at the Elks' Home on Somerset street.

A fund of $2,000,000 has been put on deposit at a Boston bank by Thomas A. Forsythe in his will, the Mayor said, to carry on the work of the Forsythe Dental Infirmary.

Major Higginson informed the Mayor he makes up each year a $40,000 deficit for the orchestra, and that he has already expended more than $900,000 on it.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Da NOV 1 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth season in Philadelphia in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. For several weeks after the beginning of the European war there was fear that the orchestra would be greatly affected by the summoning of members to military service. At the time of the opening of the war there were 30 orchestra men on the Continent, including Dr. Muck. Of those expected to return only three have failed to arrive—Grises, the first clarinet; Fosse, first oboe, and Agnesy, one of the double basses. Agnesy is expected soon, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled by Sand, first clarinet, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

Copyright by Aimee Dupont, N. Y.
PASQUALE AMATO.

Es
k, 1884

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1 - 1914

FAMOUS BARYTONE COMING WEDNESDAY

Est
, 1884

PASQUALE AMATO

Pasquale Amato, first barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will sing two numbers at the Lyric Wednesday night, when he will appear as soloist at the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season.

His first offering will be an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII." and his second the celebrated largo from Handel's "Xerxes."

Dr. Muck, the director, will present

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Opening Symphony Concert of Local Season Given Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, who would have been fighting in the German army had he been allowed his way, but whose application was rejected, gave the first concert of its thirtieth local season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of one of those large and brilliant audiences which these occasions almost invariably attract. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was the central feature of the program, an unfortunate circumstance in view of the fact that the same composition was so recently given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. It is true that not very many heard it then, but there were some who did, and they would have preferred a change last evening.

How it happens that different orchestras so frequently duplicate their productions is a mystery upon which many have speculated, but which no one yet has risen to explain. Is the repetition a mere coincidence, an almost incredible hypothesis, or is it that one conductor wants to show the superiority of his particular interpretation over that of some other? Whatever may be the explanation, the occurrence is frequent, and it may be remarked in passing that Smetana's overture to the "Bartered Bride," which was played so brilliantly last evening, is also to be performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday and Saturday of the present week. There is something more than natural in this. In all conscience there is a sufficiently extended repertoire from which to choose.

There is little need to enlarge on the manner in which the Beethoven number was performed. It was characterized by all the excellence for which the Boston organization has long been distinguished, by the utmost beauty of tone, by a perfect precision of movement, by an admirable fluidity of response to the indications of the conductor and with a fine eloquence of emotional expression. Besides the Smetana overture the other orchestral selection was the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, which was given with splendid force and fire. The assisting artist of the occasion was that excellent baritone, Mr. Paquale Amato, whose vine voice and cultivated method were effectively displayed in an air from Saint-Saens' "Henry the Eighth," and in Handel's "Ombra mai fu," the well-known largo. Hearty and prolonged applause bespoke the appreciation of the audience.

To Address Laryngologists

1884

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Estal

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The regular season of Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will open Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock at the New National Theater, when the orchestra will appear under its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian baritone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist. Mr. Sand, who has taken Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinetist, has, it is said, shown himself to be a musician of great virtuosity, and the same is true of the other new members.

Dr. Muck has arranged an attractive program. The symphony will be Brahms Second, in D major. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia." The other orchestral number will be ably the greatest baritone of the day. He will sing an aria from "Henry VIII," by Saint-Saens, and Handel's "Largo."

"The Whirl of the World."

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

AMATO TO SING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Barytone Will Be Heard With Dr. Muck's Musicians Tomorrow Night

MADAME SAMAROFF ILL

Pianiste To Be Replaced on Stokowski's Program by Efrem Zimbalist, Violinist

k, 1884

Pasquale Amato is a name which should draw many persons to the concert to be given tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when that organization opens its thritieth consecutive season in Philadelphia. Besides the barytone, there will be a number of interesting features, especially the first appearance, in their new capacities, of players who replaced regular members of the orchestra, detained in Europe by the war.

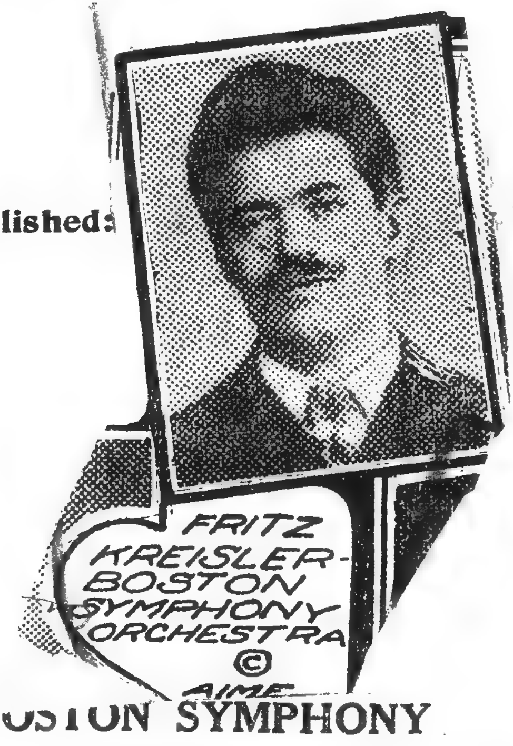
These men are Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, who assumes the duties of Mr. Grisez, and Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London, who substitutes for Mr. Fosse, first oboist. The place of Mr. Agnesy, one of the double bassi, who had not yet arrived from abroad, has not been filled, as his return is expected soon.

Mr. Amato, whose assumption of leading roles with the Metropolitan Opera Company here has made him a vital figure in the domain of local music, will sing two numbers, an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," and an air by Handel, "Ombra mai fu." The orchestral offerings, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, will comprise the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Richard Strauss' familiar but fine tone poem, "Don Juan," and the lively overture to Bedrick Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," which, unfortunately, is

---

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 31 1914

Established: York, 1884



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC

Two Germans, a Frenchman, an Austrian and a Finn, as composers, and an Italian as soloist, make a very cosmopolitan program which Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer at the first concert of the season in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15. The composers are Beethoven, Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss, Handel and Sibelius, and the soloist is the great barytone of the Metropolitan Opera House, Pasquale Amato.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Eroica, which seems to be particularly appropriate at this time. The other orchestral numbers will be Richard Strauss's superb tone poem Don Juan and the stirring Finlandia of Sibelius.

Mr. Amato will sing twice, an aria from Saint-Saens' Henry VIII. and an air from Handel's forgotten opera Xerxes. This last tune is familiar to everybody as the Largo. The program in its proper form is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Saint-Saens, Aria from Henry VIII.; Strauss, Tone Poem, Don Juan; Handel, air, Ombra mai fu (Largo); Sibelius, Finlandia.

From POST
Address: Washingto
Date

Musical E

THE regular season o Symphony concerts in W ton will open Tuesday at at 4:30 at the National, the orchestra will appear it conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with the great Italian barytone, Pasquale Amato, as soloist.

The orchestra's season in Boston started in the middle of the month with unusual brilliancy.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the opening of the Washington season. The symphony will be the ever delightful one of Brahms, in D major, his second. There will be two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius—his exquisitely melancholy, "The Swan of Tuonela," and his stirring "Finlandia." The other orchestral number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Pasquale Amato, the soloist, naturally has many admirers in Washington, for he is probably the greatest barytone of our time and he shines as brilliantly in concert as he does on the operatic stage. He will sing an aria by Saint-Saens and Handel's "Largo."

PUBLIC LEDGER
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 31 1914

The Boston Symphony

The 30th successive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will begin at the Academy of Music Monday night when Dr. Karl Muck will conduct the "Eroica" symphony. The roster of the band is practically complete. Messrs. Fosse, first oboe; Grisez, first clarinet, and Agnesy, one of the double basses, are the only ones held up by the war. Mr. Agnesy is momentarily expected, but the places of the other two musicians have been filled, Mr. Sand coming from the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, for Mr. Griesz's place, and Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist, of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London, taking Mr. Fosse's position. With the Symphony will come Pasquale Amato, called by the press agent "the deservedly admired baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House," a characterization which will not be challenged.

It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck will conduct also the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, because this number seems to be the high favorite among conductors this season. Doctor Muck, Mr. Stransky, in New York, and Mr. Stock, in Chicago, included it in their first programs. As it it not announced by the local orchestra, Philadelphians will be grateful to Boston for bringing it. The "Eroica" symphony has also been popular this year. It was played at the Academy by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra a week ago in a manner which will make music-lovers all the more anxious to hear it properly done Monday night. The circle will be complete when Mr. Stokowski conducts the same symphony in his last but one program, early in April.

The complete program for the Boston Symphony is as follows:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Saint-Saens	Aria, "Henry VIII"
Richard Strauss	Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Handel	Air, "Ombra mai fu"
Smetana	Overture to "The Sold Bride"

Es
84

J. MacB.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Season Begins With Amato as the Soloist.

The thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia was inaugurated in the Academy of Music last night. For the symphony Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, chose the Beethoven "Eroica." Under his direction the solemn and always beautiful Marcia Funebre became overwhelmingly impressive—a veritable poem of sorrow—a tribute to the woe of nations in conflict. What a dazzling play of light and joy he brought from the sparkling themes of the scherzo, and with what skill and ease he produced the contrast! The brilliancy and fire of the Allegro brought to a close a memorable reading of a great work, and left the audience with the conviction that true Beethoven had been heard.

The soloist, Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, quite stormed the audience by his magnificent singing of the lovely aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," "Qui Donc Commands Quand il Aime?" If Henry of the many amours had been gifted with Amato's charming personality, to say nothing of his voice, the susceptible femininity of that period would have made greater inroads in the King's record as a matrimonial possibility than history records. The second aria was not such a happy choice. Haendel's "Ombra Mai Fu," from Serse," is not for the Amato style, although he did it beautifully. Haendel is much too smooth and tame for a mettlesome singer of the Amato type.

The Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem sounded exactly like every other orchestral effusion of this composer, and, while it showed the brilliancy and versatility of the orchestra, was not especially enjoyable. The gay little overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" completed the program.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3

The Boston Symphony.

Perhaps by way of sharp contrast, Dr. Karl Muck placed upon the program of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy the same symphony chosen by Damrosch for his concert last week. Nothing could have been more effective in showing the vast gulf that separates the two leaders and the two orchestras. Last night's rendition was so nearly perfect as to hold one spellbound. All of the dignity and greatness that is latent in Beethoven's "Eroica" was vitalized by the remarkable virtuosity of this band of players and the performance left one with the sense of having heard something almost superhuman, both in composition and interpretation. It was a fitting beginning for the thirtieth season of the Boston orchestra in this city.

In strong contrast to the mood of the symphony was the colorful "Don Juan" tone poem of Richard Strauss, bringing, as it did, every force of the orchestra into play. It was a stirring reading of the score, one which will leave a lasting impression of virility and spontaneity upon those who heard it. So, too, with the final number on the program—the "Bartered Bride" overture of Smetana, which Dr. Muck took at a tremendous pace.

The soloist of the evening was Pasquale Amato, the operatic baritone, whose work upon the stage is thoroughly familiar here. He sang an aria from Saint Saens' "Henry VIII," and "Ombra mai fu," from Haendel's "Serse," which has been made almost hackneyed through its arrangement for violin played by every student as Haendel's "Largo." The singer did not seem to be in his usual resonant voice and sang with some apparent effort, but, for all that, he met with a flattering receptio after both numbers.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

PASQUALE AMATO HEARD AT ACADEMY WITH BOSTON BAND

Beethoven and Strauss Played to Perfection by Doctor Muck and His Wonderful Band.

The 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia began last night at the Academy of Music. Dr. Karl Muck brought his entire band of 100 musicians, with but two substitutions caused by the war. The personnel of the orchestra, with Messrs. Witek, Longy, Warnke and Maquarre, is as familiar and as grateful to Philadelphia as the buff-covered program with Mr. Hale's delightfully inconsequential notes. And last night, when that familiarity was justified by the perfect performance which the orchestra gave, the enthusiasm of the audience touched even Dr. Muck [illegible] movement of sympathy

What the Boston Symphony has above everything is perfect tone, not only in the superb wind choir, not only in the solo oboe or in the horns, but in its ensemble, a vastly more difficult thing to attain. Last night there was perhaps but one second of time in which the tone fell off. The rest of the evening it was impeccable, and although the pieces they played is none of them dependent wholly on tone, the fulness and the grandeur of each was realized through that quality. To single out the work of Mr. Warnke and Mr. Longy in the funeral march of the "Eroica," of the horns in the "Don Juan," and of the strings in the delicate fugal interludes of the "Bartered Bride" is only to indicate that in the most difficult of parts the Boston players are at their best.

Doctor Muck's program was wisely, almost cleverly, arranged. Its symphony is familiar, but Doctor Muck chose to play it because he was able to make a new thing of it. Against it he placed the tempestuous "Don Juan" and evoked melodious beauty and sensuous appeal of an extraordinary power. The quality in the "Don Juan" which makes it so powerful is that, unlike the Beethoven, its emotional appeal is centered through the burning glass of the intellect, while Beethoven is pure sunshine, fire and air. It is generally considered that the injection of the mind into an affair of passion is ruinous. The appeal of last night's tone poem was adequate answer to this ill-considered opinion. Then, to slacken the strain, the orchestra played Smetana, gloriously humorous and healthy, played it with joyous spirit and almost reckless enthusiasm.

Pasquale Amato was the soloist of the evening, and very good he had to be to make himself a place there. That Mr. Amato's triumph was personal, while that of the geniuses of the orchestra was social, is hardly to be held against him. He was the soloist and not a member of the playing organization. He assuredly triumphed, in spite of some difficulties with the second verse of his Saint-Saens aria, because his voice was rich and robust, his tones well sustained, and his dramatic feeling, again in Saint-Saens, irreproachable. In the Handel air, known familiarly in what Mr. Hale calls "the preposterous arrangement" of the "Largo," Mr. Amato could not be dramatic; the song is a pure flow of easy, almost expressionless feeling, and Mr. Amato was artistically just in his singing. He sang easily, without a trace of labored "production." That he made a great many people think of Titta Ruffo, and think without prejudice to himself, is sufficient compliment to him.

The Beethoven symphony was by divine right the triumph of the evening. The fact that it was heard in the same place a week ago contributed to the further glory of Doctor Muck and his men. From the moment the 'cellos gave out the sonorous first theme, to the exuberant apotheosis of the last moment, the playing was of the highest order, and that being said, there remains only consideration of the interpretation which Dr. Muck put upon the music. It is more than a century since the "Eroica" was first played, and it is very possible that many conductors have played it correctly before. It is certain that most have played it vilely. Last night it was played as Beethoven might have wished it, and played so as to end forever the rather silly discussions as to "what it stands for." In all the meanings ascribed to it, Wagner's alone has sense. The "Eroica" is Napoleonic because at the time it was written Napoleon appeared to Beethoven as the complete man, the balancing of all human powers into titanic perfection. That is all. But what life meant to Beethoven is even more important than the individual who represented life at its best to him. The meaning of the funeral march with the dashing, fearless scherzo placed after it, was made beautifully clear last night. It is that in the midst of death we are in life—and that is a more glorious truth than that in the midst of death we are in life. That is why the "Eroica" is the bravest, the sublimest of symphonies. Played as it was last night it made the ordinary affairs of existence things of precious and wonderful importance. It achieved what all great music should, what Mahler's Fifth Symphony, for example, achieves in the same way—the transformation of life into a more splendid thing than it seems.

That achievement marks the greatness of Doctor Muck. He conducted last night with all his old aristocratic power, passionless and proud, apparently, but moving his orchestra and his hearers to passion and to pain. The restrained and ordered power of his leading, the final ability to command the rarest subtleties of feeling, were his. His gaunt Mephistolean graces stood apart from the orchestra; he seemed to command and to listen with all the air of a conqueror. His conquest, for that, was immeasurably good.

From BULLETIN
Address Phil
Date NOV

in several seasons.

The Boston Orchestra

First Concert of Season, With Pasquale Amato as Soloist

The first of a series of five concerts, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirtieth season in Philadelphia, was given by that organization before an audience which completely filled the Academy of Music last evening, the principal orchestral feature being Beethoven's third symphony, in E-flat major, the "Eroica," while Pasquale Amato, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist. The third symphony of Beethoven is counted one of his greatest—if a comparison in greatness is to be made in the list of that master composer's symphonic productions—and next to the superlatively beautiful fifth is perhaps most popular with the discerning musical public. The work requires an interpretation of glowing excellence to bring out the full significance of its title, and such an interpretation, it is almost needless to say, was given it under the baton of Dr.

The orchestra may be said to have reached its highest point of attainment in the scherzo and in the finale allegro movement. Just at the first, not all the beauty and richness of tone that have long been accepted as characteristic of this famous ensemble of instrumentalists was apparent, the opening movement, and even the funeral march, impressively as this famous adagio movement was played, being surpassed by the joyful exuberance of the scherzo, with its exquisitely produced effects in the string and woodwind choirs, and in the sweeping grandeur of the climax, which was brought out with full splendor of sonorous orchestral power. Dr. Muck's conducting is sedate, scholarly and sound in its musicianship. He seldom exhibits emotionalism, although imparting emotion to the music, and it is noticeable that much of his leading is done solely with the right hand. He used the score throughout last night's concert, and appeared to be rather closely confined to the notes, though with no appreciable lessening of freedom in his conducting.

In addition to the symphony, which opened the program, the orchestra played Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and the overture to Friedrich Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride," both of which were given in a manner that roused the fully justified enthusiasm of the audience. Strauss, the frequently unmelodious, put much of real melody into his "Don Juan," the opening measures being quite alluring in their tunefulness, and there are moments when even those music lovers that have small patience with what is known as "modernism" in musical composition, a field in which Richard Strauss leads the van, are led to forgive the German composer for some of the conglomerations of unmusical sounds with which he outrages the musical ear.

"Don Juan" at times verges upon the extravagant and the wildly discordant, but its alluring moments are many, with some truly beautiful strains, such as those in which the brief violin solo—exquisitely played by Concertmeister Witek last evening occurs, and the passages of seraphic rhapsodizing by the harp, and in such an interpretation as the Boston orchestra gives it all that is best and most rational is made to predominate. The Smetana overture is a rollicking piece of accelerando composition, radiated by many sparkling melodious effects, and aptly termed a "comedy overture." Its spirited measures last evening formed an appropriate climax to a truly notable concert.

Mr. Amato's two contributions to the program did much to add to the pleasure of the audience, which received him with marked cordiality and recalled him several times after both of his numbers. He sang first an aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII." in which the baritone's distinguished ability as a dramatic singer was shown to advantage, though he did not seem to be in the best of voice and his tones lacked some of their wonted breadth and richness. His second number, the air, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Sense," the famous "Largo," was even more enjoyed, the fluent Italian seeming to bring out better the resonance and sympathy of Amato's voice, his delivery of the solemnly beautiful strains of the familiar Handel air being sincere and impressive. The second of the Boston Symphony's concerts will take place on Monday evening, November 30

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY STARTS SEASON HERE

Carnegie Hall Completely Filled by Audience Which Welcomes Orchestra and Dr. Muck.

Next to the opera's opening no musical function in a New York season interests prominent citizens to the extent of the first concert in the annual series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night brought the opening autumn programme by these musicians, and as a consequence the street approaches to Carnegie Hall were jammed with vehicles long before the hour set for the introductory number.

When Dr. Karl Muck walked to the conductor's stand he was greeted with an enthusiasm that might have led the uninitiated to assume that instead of a visitor the audience, which completely filled the auditorium, was welcoming one exclusively its own. But if the people seemed glad to have the Boston organization and Dr. Muck back again, they too appeared no less pleased.

The programme, as befitted the occasion, was one of serious musical dimensions. Assigning the entire first half to Beethoven's Third Symphony, in E flat, the "Eroica," the remainder was composed of the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

In every work the orchestra attained an artistic height that left little to be reasonably wished for. The symphony especially was played with a degree of spirituality and a nobility of tone that could scarcely have been bettered. And every change in nuance was accomplished by the musicians with that sort of unanimity which is the peculiar property of only a few truly great orchestras.

Admirable qualities were disclosed in the performance of the Brahms composition, but not until the "Don Juan" tone poem was reached did the orchestra give its hearers the brilliance of tone and the technical snap for which it is so justly distinguished. To Dr. Muck belongs the credit due one whose scholarly leadership methods were manifestly those required for an occasion such as this one.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 6 1914

CROWDS HAIL SYMPHONY OPENING

Programme of Germanic Compositions Enthusiastically Received at Carnegie Hall, Especially the Rendition of "Eroica"

THE usual capacity audience with the privileged number of standees attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall.

This truly wonderful organization enjoys a unique position in New York and probably in the world. Each year the entire allotment of seats for entire season is sold in advance, and each season the waiting list of eager subscribers is lengthened. This year it is reported that there are several hundred names booked for the first available tickets.

After an evening spent in listening to the marvellous work of musicians and conductor one can easily understand that the patronage is deserved and that the clamor that the clamor is no vogue or fad.

Last evening's programme was devoted entirely to Germanic compositions. A profound impression was made by Dr. Muck's masterly reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. As it was played last night it bore traces of individuality in accentuation and emphasis. But this was not done in an endeavor to be eccentric or unique. The score had been studied with diligence and patience, and the result was a magnificent and eloquent performance.

The "Marche Funebre" was played with affecting but not depressing poignancy, and the audience was particularly interested in the orchestra's work in the scintillating scherzo, for the conductor led with a glance or a slight toss of his head, allowing his customary authoritative baton to hang limp in his hand.

Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme" was presented with variety of tone and warmth of color; Strauss' "Don Juan" (recently given by the Philharmonic) and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture were the closing numbers.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 6 1914

With only a few changes in its personnel, and with Dr. Karl Muck, safely returned from the war zone, as its conductor, the Boston Symphony received a warm welcome at its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night.

The most distinguished musical audience of the season is usually gathered by this orchestra. Last night was no exception.

The programme was a familiar one, with Beethoven in the lead with the superb Eroica symphony played with a perfection of time and a clarity of interpretation that was unimpeachable. Brahms' variations for a theme by Haydn, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Weber's beautiful overture to "Euryanthe," one of the classics to be revived at the Metropolitan this season, also were on the programme.

Dr. Muck's first programme was "all German" as far as the composers were concerned. What interested his listeners was not the merely Teutonic quality of anything these composers voiced, but what was beautiful and therefore universal.

[37]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Season Begins With Amato as the Soloist.

The thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia was inaugurated in the Academy of Music last night. For the symphony Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, chose the Beethoven "Eroica." Under his direction the solemn and always beautiful Marcia Funebre became overwhelmingly impressive—a veritable poem of sorrow—a tribute to the woe of nations in conflict. What a dazzling play of light and joy he brought from the sparkling themes of the scherzo, and with what skill and ease he produced the contrast! The brilliancy and fire of the Allegro brought to a close a memorable reading of a great work, and left the audience with the conviction that true Beethoven had been heard.

The soloist, Pasquale Amato, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, quite stormed the audience by his magnificent singing of the lovely aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," "Qui Donc Commands Quand il Aime?" If Henry of the many amours had been gifted with Amato's charming personality, to say nothing of his voice, the susceptible femininity of that period would have made greater inroads in the King's record as a matrimonial possibility than history records. The second aria was not such a happy choice. Haendel's "Ombra Mai Fu," from Serse," is not for the Amato style, although he did it beautifully. Haendel is much too smooth and tame for a mettlesome singer of the Amato type.

The Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem sounded exactly like every other orchestral effusion of this composer, and, while it showed the brilliancy and versatility of the orchestra, was not especially enjoyable. The gay little overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" completed the program.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3

Est 884

The Boston Symphony.

Perhaps by way of sharp contrast, Dr. Karl Muck placed upon the program of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy the same symphony chosen by Damrosch for his concert last week. Nothing could have been more effective in showing the vast gulf that separates the two leaders and the two orchestras. Last night's rendition was so nearly perfect as to hold one spellbound. All of the dignity and greatness that is latent in Beethoven's "Eroica" was vitalized by the remarkable virtuosity of this band of players and the performance left one with the sense of having heard something almost superhuman, both in composition and interpretation. It was a fitting beginning for the thirtieth season of the Boston orchestra in this city.

In strong contrast to the mood of the symphony was the colorful "Don Juan" tone poem of Richard Strauss, bringing, as it did, every force of the orchestra into play. It was a stirring reading of the score, one which will leave a lasting impression of virility and spontaneity upon those who heard it. So, too, with the final number on the program—the "Barterd Bride" overture of Smetana, which Dr. Muck took at a tremendous pace.

The soloist of the evening was Pasquale Amato, the operatic baritone, whose work upon the stage is thoroughly familiar here. He sang an aria from Saint Saens' "Henry VIII," and "Ombra mai fu," from Haendel's "Serse," which has been made almost hackneyed through its arrangement for violin played by every student as Haendel's "Largo." The singer did not seem to be in his usual resonant voice and sang with some apparent effort, but, for all that, he met with a flattering receptio after both numbers.

"Within the

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

PASQUALE AMATO HEARD AT ACADEMY WITH BOSTON BAND

Beethoven and Strauss Played to Perfection by Doctor Muck and His Wonderful Band.

The 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia began last night at the Academy of Music. Dr. Karl Muck brought his entire band of 100 musicians, with but two substitutions caused by the war. The personnel of the orchestra, with Messrs. Witek, Longy, Warnke and Maquarre, is as familiar and as grateful to Philadelphia as the buff-covered program with Mr. Hale's delightfully inconsequential notes. And last night, when that familiarity was justified by the perfect performance which the orchestra gave, the enthusiasm of the audience touched even Dr. Muck [illegible] a movement of sympathy

---

What the Boston Symphony has above everything is perfect tone, not only in the superb wind choir, not only in the solo oboe or in the horns, but in its ensemble, a vastly more difficult thing to attain. Last night there was perhaps but one second of time in which the tone fell off. The rest of the evening it was impeccable, and although the pieces they played is none of them dependent wholly on tone, the fulness and the grandeur of each was realized through that quality. To single out the work of Mr. Warnke and Mr. Longy in the funeral march of the "Eroica," of the horns in the "Don Juan," and of the strings in the delicate fugal interludes of the "Bartered Bride" is only to indicate that in the most difficult of parts the Boston players are at their best.

Doctor Muck's program was wisely, almost cleverly, arranged. Its symphony is familiar, but Doctor Muck chose to play it because he was able to make a new thing of it. Against it he placed the tempestuous "Don Juan" and evoked melodious beauty and sensuous appeal of an extraordinary power. The quality in the "Don Juan" which makes it so powerful is that, unlike the Beethoven, its emotional appeal is centered through the burning glass of the intellect, while Beethoven is pure sunshine, fire and air. It is generally considered that the injection of the mind into an affair of passion is ruinous. The appeal of last night's tone poem was adequate answer to this ill-considered opinion. Then, to slacken the strain, the orchestra played Smetana, gloriously humorous and healthy, played it with joyous spirit and almost reckless enthusiasm.

Pasquale Amato was the soloist of the evening, and very good he had to be to make himself a place there. That Mr. Amato's triumph was personal, while that of the geniuses of the orchestra was social, is hardly to be held against him. He was the soloist and not a member of the playing organization. He assuredly triumphed, in spite of some difficulties with the second verse of his Saint-Saens aria, because his voice was rich and robust, his tones well sustained, and his dramatic feeling, again in Saint-Saens, irreproachable. In the Handel air, known familiarly in what Mr. Hale calls "the preposterous arrangement" of the "Largo," Mr. Amato could not be dramatic; the song is a pure flow of easy, almost expressionless feeling, and Mr. Amato was artistically just in his singing. He sang easily, without a trace of labored "production." That he made a great many people think of Titta Ruffo, and think without prejudice to himself, is sufficient compliment to him.

The Beethoven symphony was by divine right the triumph of the evening. The fact that it was heard in the same place a week ago contributed to the further glory of Doctor Muck and his men. From the moment the 'cellos gave out the sonorous first theme, to the exuberant apotheosis of the last moment, the playing was of the highest order, and that being said, there remains only consideration of the interpretation which Dr. Muck put upon the music. It is more than a century since the "Eroica" was first played, and it is very possible that many conductors have played it correctly before. It is certain that most have played it vilely. Last night it was played as Beethoven might have wished it, and played so as to end forever the rather silly discussions as to "what it stands for." In all the meanings ascribed to it, Wagner's alone has sense. The "Eroica" is Napoleonic because at the time it was written Napoleon appeared to Beethoven as the complete man, the balancing of all human powers into titanic perfection. That is all. But what life meant to Beethoven is even more important than the individual who represented life at its best to him. The meaning of the funeral march with the dashing, fearless scherzo placed after it, was made beautifully clear last night. It is that in the midst of death we are in life—and that is a more glorious truth than that in the midst of death we are in life. That is why the "Eroica" is the bravest, the sublimest of symphonies. Played as it was last night it made the ordinary affairs of existence things of precious and wonderful importance. It achieved what all great music should, what Mahler's Fifth Symphony, for example, achieves in the same way—the transformation of life into a more splendid thing than it seems.

That achievement marks the greatness of Doctor Muck. He conducted last night with all his old aristocratic power, passionless and proud, apparently, but moving his orchestra and his hearers to passion and to pain. The restrained and ordered power of his leading, the final ability to command the rarest subtleties of feeling, were his. His gaunt Mephistolean graces stood apart from the orchestra; he seemed to command and to listen with all the air of a conqueror. His conquest, for that, was immeasurably good.

From BULLETIN
Address Phila
Date NOV

in several seasons.

The Boston Orchestra

First Concert of Season, With Pasquale Amato as Soloist

The first of a series of five concerts, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirtieth season in Philadelphia, was given by that organization before an audience which completely filled the Academy of Music last evening, the principal orchestral feature being Beethoven's third symphony, in E-flat major, the "Eroica," while Pasquale Amato, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist. The third symphony of Beethoven is counted one of his greatest—if a comparison in greatness is to be made in the list of that master composer's symphonic productions—and next to the superlatively beautiful fifth is perhaps most popular with the discerning musical public. The work requires an interpretation of glowing excellence to bring out the full significance of its title, and such an interpretation, it is almost needless to say, was given it under the baton of D

The orchestra may be said to have reached its highest point of attainment in the scherzo and in the finale allegro in the first, not all the movement. Just at the [illegible] tone that have long been accepted as characteristic of this famous ensemble of instrumentalists was apparent, the opening movement, and even the funeral march, impressively as this famous adagio movement was played, being surpassed by the joyful exuberance of the scherzo, with its exquisitely produced effects in the string and woodwind choirs, and in the sweeping grandeur of the climax, which was brought out with full splendor of sonorous orchestral power. Dr. Muck's conducting is sedate, scholarly and sound in its musicianship. He seldom exhibits emotionalism, although imparting emotion to the music, and it is noticeable that much of his leading is done solely with the right hand. He used the score throughout last night's concert, and appeared to be rather closely confined to the notes, though with no appreciable lessening of freedom in his conducting.

In addition to the symphony, which opened the program, the orchestra played Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and the overture to Friedrich Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride," both of which were given in a manner that roused the fully justified enthusiasm of the audience. Strauss, the frequently unmelodious, put much of real melody into his "Don Juan," the opening measures being quite alluring in their tunefulness, and there are moments when even those music lovers that have small patience with what is known as "modernism" in musical composition, a field in which Richard Strauss leads the van, are led to forgive the German composer for some of the conglomerations of unmusical sounds with which he outrages the musical ear.

"Don Juan" at times verges upon the extravagant and the wildly discordant, but its alluring moments are many, with some truly beautiful strains, such as those in which the brief violin solo—exquisitely played by Concertmeister Witek last evening occurs, and the passages of seraphic rhapsodizing by the harp, and in such an interpretation as the Boston orchestra gives it all that is best and most rational is made to predominate. The Smetana overture is a rollicking piece of accelerando composition, radiated by many sparkling melodious effects, and aptly termed a "comedy overture." Its spirited measures last evening formed an appropriate climax to a truly notable concert.

Mr. Amato's two contributions to the program did much to add to the pleasure of the audience, which received him with marked cordiality and recalled him several times after both of his numbers. He sang first an aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII." in which the baritone's distinguished ability as a dramatic singer was shown to advantage, though he did not seem to be in the best of voice and his tones lacked some of their wonted breadth and richness. His second number, the air, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Sense," the famous "Largo," was even more enjoyed, the fluent Italian seeming to bring out better the resonance and sympathy of Amato's voice, his delivery of the solemly beautiful strains of the familiar Handel air being sincere and impressive. The second of the Boston Symphony's concerts will take place on Monday evening, November 30, when Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist.

◆

HONEST MERCHANTS PROTECTEI

Date

k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY STARTS SEASON HERE

Carnegie Hall Completely Filled by Audience Which Welcomes Orchestra and Dr. Muck.

Next to the opera's opening no musical function in a New York season interests prominent citizens to the extent of the first concert in the annual series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night brought the opening autumn programme by these musicians, and as a consequence the street approaches to Carnegie Hall were jammed with vehicles long before the hour set for the introductory number.

When Dr. Karl Muck walked to the conductor's stand he was greeted with an enthusiasm that might have led the uninitiated to assume that instead of a visitor the audience, which completely filled the auditorium, was welcoming one exclusively its own. But if the people seemed glad to have the Boston organization and Dr. Muck back again, they too appeared no less pleased.

The programme, as befitted the occasion, was one of serious musical dimensions. Assigning the entire first half to Beethoven's Third Symphony, in E flat, the "Eroica," the remainder was composed of the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

In every work the orchestra attained an artistic height that left little to be reasonably wished for. The symphony especially was played with a degree of spirituality and a nobility of tone that could scarcely have been bettered. And every change in nuance was accomplished by the musicians with that sort of unanimity which is the peculiar property of only a few truly great orchestras.

Admirable qualities were disclosed in the performance of the Brahms composition, but not until the "Don Juan" tone poem was reached did the orchestra give its hearers the brilliance of tone and the technical snap for which it is so justly distinguished. To Dr. Muck belongs the credit due one whose scholarly leadership methods were manifestly those required for an occasion such as this one.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 6 1914

k, 1884

CROWDS HAIL SYMPHONY OPENING

Programme of Germanic Compositions Enthusiastically Received at Carnegie Hall, Especially the Rendition of "Eroica".

THE usual capacity audience with the privileged number of standees attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall.

This truly wonderful organization enjoys a unique position in New York and probably in the world. Each year the entire allotment of seats for entire season is sold in advance, and each season the waiting list of eager subscribers is lengthened. This year it is reported that there are several hundred names booked for the first available tickets.

After an evening spent in listening to the marvellous work of musicians and conductor one can easily understand that the patronage is deserved and that the clamor-that the clamor is no vogue or fad.

Last evening's programme was devoted entirely to Germanic compositions. A profound impression was made by Dr. Muck's masterly reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. As it was played last night it bore traces of individuality in accentuation and emphasis. But this was not done in an endeavor to be eccentric or unique. The score had been studied with diligence and patience, and the result was a magnificent and eloquent performance.

The "Marche Funebre" was played with affecting but not depressing poignancy, and the audience was particularly interested in the orchestra's work in the scintillating scherzo, for the conductor led with a glance or a slight toss of his head, allowing his customary authoritative baton to hang limp in his hand.

Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme" was presented with variety of tone and warmth of color; Strauss' "Don Juan" (recently given by the Philharmonic) and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture were the closing numbers.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 6 1914

Estab 4

With only a few changes in its personnel, and with Dr. Karl Muck, safely returned from the war zone, as its conductor, the Boston Symphony received a warm welcome at its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night.

The most distinguished musical audience of the season is usually gathered by this orchestra. Last night was no exception.

The programme was a familiar one, with Beethoven in the lead with the superb Eroica symphony played with a perfection of time and a clarity of interpretation that was unimpeachable. Brahms' variations for a theme by Haydn, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Weber's beautiful overture to "Euryanthe," one of the classics to be revived at the Metropolitan this season, also were on the programme.

Dr. Muck's first programme was "all German" as far as the composers were concerned. What interested his listeners was not the merely Teutonic quality of anything these composers voiced, but what was beautiful and therefore universal.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York

Date NOV 6 - 1914

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest musical "instrument" given to one man to play on in a topsy-turvy world, its first New York concert at Carnegie Hall last night was expected to be sensational. The event proved that, and more. A house sold out for months to come left a percentage of people on the waiting list actually higher than the proportion of new men among the hundred in the band. The full stage got a hand of greeting as Concertmaster Witek took his seat. Conductor Karl Muck was applauded thirty seconds when he walked out, and a whole minute when he ended the "Eroica" symphony, by a world genius whose family history on this earth had revolved around the fated Belgian cities of Malines, Antwerp and Louvain.

Beethoven's funeral march in that Napoleonic number was cited in a programme book as evidence of the "militarism" found by French Vincent d'Indy in its warlike rhythm. The dazzling scherzo was played without a leader. For Dr. Muck laid down his baton after rapping for silence, and let his men go on with hardly a gesture of command. They earned their standing recall at the close. The orchestra was at its best in the later Strauss "Don Juan," played as perhaps never before. Here Muck himself showed amazing warmth. He had not lived untouched by the supreme experiences of European upheaval. Only lesser heights were reached in the Brahms-Haydn variations, beautiful of their kind, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," soon to be staged at the Metropolitan.

New York's finest audience packed the hall, as its motors did the streets outside. The one box sold last night, which was Muck's own, was bought and paid for by so distinguished a visitor as Marcella Sembrich in the new musical metropolis of creation. Mischa Elman and his sister were guests nearby. Geraldine Farrar, her father and mother, also sat with C. A. Ellis in the parterre row. Major H. L. Higginson, who celebrates his eightieth birthday this Nov. 18 by publishing a history of his famous organization's thirty-four years, was not present. W. H. Brennan sent him a telegram of congratulation in advance to Boston.

Muck's "all-German" season's opener will not be repeated in two more concerts here this trip. Neither was it done in Washington, where the diplomatic proprieties were observed with episodes, both Russian and French. Would a Prussian leader dare show his head in Berlin if he had started the war year in far America with a programme "all French?" To ask the question is to give the answer. It was unnecessary, it was unwise, to allow the faintest hint of national lines. However subtly implied, the violation of the spirit of man in art at its highest is the unpardonable sin.

What else is it, as a recent English poet sings, "to bay the British with Beethoven, put Schubert in the melting pot, and pray in aid the noble Haydn? While all the while the truckler tries to seem a saint in Uncle Sam's sight; but Sam has got no taste for wiles; they're much too feeble—by a Brahms' sight."

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 4 - 1914

AMATO SINGS TONIGHT

Barytone To Be Soloist At Opening Of The Boston Symphony Season At Lyric.

Pasquale Amato, first barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will make his initial concert appearance in this city at the Lyric tonight, when he will be the soloist at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season.

Amato has not sung in Baltimore for five years, and, owing to his extreme popularity and to the fact that Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Orchestra, has selected a particularly good program for the first concert, even more interest than usual is being shown in the performance. The indications are that the house will be entirely sold out.

The symphony tonight will be the third of Beethoven, called the "Eroica." This great work was composed when Beethoven was fired with enthusiasm over the astounding genius of Napoleon Bonaparte, and the original dedication was to him. But when the master learned that his hero had accepted the Emperor's scepter he struck his pen ruthlessly through the dedicatory lines and wrote instead the word "Eroica."

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address: New York City

Date NOV 6 - 1914

"HOFFMANN" AT CENTURY; MUCK ORCHESTRA HERE

Unscathed by the draft of a very few of its members by the exigencies of the appalling and yet paltry history that is being made in Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in New York last night for the first of its series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck was again at the conductor's desk, and both he and his men received from the audience that filled the auditorium a most warm evidence of the real obligation New York feels itself under to the Boston band.

Dr. Muck restricted his programmatic efforts in this opening concert to Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss and Weber, and it may be that this exclusively Teutonic selection well call forth some comment. Yet nothing of this sort need be necessary. Music is music, particularly when the Boston Orchestra plays it.

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the "Eroica" symphony of the master of Bonn, the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Strauss's earliest tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," which opera the Metropolitan is to revive during the approaching season.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, with the possibility of a single exception in the case of the work in C minor, is probably the most familiar to concert-goers in the whole symphonic repertoire. Beethoven's original intention of therein raising a great monument to Napoleon Bonaparte and then characteristically striking the name of the idealized hero from the title page when his lack of ideality became apparent is also familiar enough.

What perhaps concerns us most in this necessarily meagre record of the performance is the fact that Dr. Muck played the symphony, particularly in its marcia funebre and finale, with bounty of painstaking minutiae of eloquence, so apportioned in the general scheme of interpretation as to produce a vital proclamation of its soaring nobility.

The Haydn Variations are hardly Brahms in one of his most interesting phases. In the midst of this exhibition of scholarly mastery there is, perhaps, just too much of the mere scholarly, and the simple exaltation, veiled as in a mist of the remote, infusing the original theme, overshadows in beauty and appeal the corruscations Brahms has built upon it.

In the face of the latter tone poems of Strauss, "Don Juan"—the first of them—seems to possess some modicum of simplicity, and yet the real Strauss in method and manner is here as well as in matters both later and earlier. There is the characteristic commonplaceness of theme, albeit not quite so commonplace as at other times, and there is the same stupendous talent for flexibly apposite orchestral device.

The orchestra played the Strauss tone poem with exceptional virtuosity even for them. The wondrousness of rich and solid tone was once more a wooing delight, the technical certainty and intelligent responsiveness of the several choirs as a whole and the first instruments individually were something to make those starved with New York's lack of them glad of heart.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

Date OV 6 -

Die Boſtoner.

Eine Sympathie-Demonſtration wärmſter Art empfing geſtern Abend Dr. Muck, den bewährten Führer der Boſtoner ſymphoniſchen [illegible] mit ſeinem leichtbeſchwingten, elaſtiſchen Schritt dem Dirigentenplatz zuging. Muck hatte ein ganz deutſches Programm für das Eröffnungskonzert der New Yorker Saiſon gewählt, daſſelbe, das auch den Boſtoner Reigen eingeleitet hatte. An der Spitze der mächtigen Vortragsreihe ſtand Beethoven's „Eroica“.

Noch nie habe ich den genialen Flügelſchlag dieſes Koloſſes ſo verſpürt als geſtern! Sie iſt eines der muſikaliſchen Weltwunder, dieſe „heroiſche“ Symphonie, zugleich die Symphonie unſerer großen, ſturmbewegten Zeit! Es griff an unſer Herz, was da Dr. Muck an trotzigem Mannesmuth und unbeugſamer Kraft in dieſen monumentalen erſten Satz legte, ein heldenhaftes Ringen und Kämpfen, ein Fels in ſturmbewegter Gegenwart. Und dann die erhabene Todtenklage des zweiten Satzes! Daß man doch ſeine Gedanken von den Vorgängen da drüben nicht ablenken kann! Dieſer Trauermarſch ertönte ſo mächtig, düſter, als ob er das Fallen nicht eines, vieler, unzähliger Helden beklage und zugleich ihren Ruhm verkündete, der in Aeonen nicht untergehen wird. Und als zum Schluſſe Dirigent und Orcheſter in die dunkle Myſtik immer tiefer verſanken, als einzelne Theile des Themas förmlich auseinanderfielen, und das ganze in immer leiſeren Zuckungen erſtarb, da dauerte es viele Sekunden, bis das Publikum ſich aus ſeiner Bewegung zum Applaus ſammeln konnte.

Die Spannung löſte ſich erſt mit dem optimiſtiſcheren Scherzo mit ſeinem Wechſel von gleichſam grollendem Humor und phantaſtiſchem Treiben. Auch da ſchwebte ernſte Manneswürde über dem Ganzen, wenn man auch die freundlichen Epiſoden, namentlich die Waldesluſt der drei Waldhörner, (welch' prächtige Löſung des ſchwierigen Einſatzes!) nach Gebühr genießen konnte. Zum Schluß dann die immer höher ſchlagende Begeiſterung! Man vergaß die Virtuoſität des Orcheſters über der großen Ausgeſtaltung. Das waren keine kontrapunktiſchen Verſchlingungen, keine Variationen und Fugati, das war ein einziges Jubellied. Die Helden ſind todt, ihr Werk aber wird leben — ewig, unſterblich! Durch Macht zum Licht! Das erklang aus dieſen hehren Tönen, aus der Symphonie unſerer Zeit, unſerer Hoffnungen!

Ein anderer Höhepunkt des Konzertes war Strauß's „Don Juan“, der in unvergleichlich durchgeiſtigter Virtuoſität vorüberrauſchte. Die erleſenen Virtuoſen an den erſten Pulten ergriffen die Gelegenheit, ihren Part zur Geltung zu bringen, dabei aber immer als dienende Glieder des großen Ganzen. Konzertmeiſter Witek's Geige ſchlug zauberhafte Töne an, — auch er war bei ſeinem erſten Erſcheinen freundlich begrüßt worden, wie ein guter, alter Bekannter.

Zwiſchen dem fließenden Feuerſtrom der Symphonie und der impoſanten Polychromie des „Don Juan“ nahmen ſich die Brahms'ſchen „Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Thema“ ungeachtet ihrer glänzenden Orcheſtrirung etwas dürftig aus. Muck's Wiedergabe ließ an edler Vollendung und glänzender Knappheit der Faſſung keinen Wunſch unerfüllt. Den Schluß bildete die glänzende „Euryanthe“-Ouverture, die der Dirigent ungemein feingliedrig darlegte. Der Beifall des Publikums ſchlug hohe Wellen. Das ganze Orcheſter mußte wiederholt für den Applaus durch Erheben danken. Ein glänzender Anfang!

H.

Leonard Borwick.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Organization, Under Dr. Muck, Scores Usual Artistic Success.

The usual capacity audience, with many people standing, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at its first concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the celebrated Italian baritone Pasquale Amato as soloist. Dr. Muck ever delights with his polish and fineness, and he gets absolute response from this organization that has no peer in this country in its infinite variety of tone painting of the purest and tenderest colors. The personal charm of Pasquale Amato vied with the dramatic appeal of his singing, making one wish to hear him in his greatest realm of the opera.

The symphony was the Brahms No. 2, in D major, heard here for the second time this season. Dr. Muck made it all fair and gracious, full of rhythm with every detail showing perfect finish and tone. The tender and melodious themes with which it abounds were worked out against a flowing undercurrent of tone that formed a rich background. The adagio was in no way emotional, but showed a real perfection in the cello introduction and the development of the theme given the winds. The scherzo was a fairy dance with most exquisite work in the strings and changes of mood; while the brilliant and spirited finale was divided between some rare piannissimo and a real abandon.

In the dramatic scene from Saint-Saens' opera "Henry VIII," Mr. Amato was most brilliant in the middle section which was impassioned and spirited, leading up to a climax of big full voice and rich tone, but he was less pleasing in the declamatory introduction and finale because of a lack of mellowness. The Handel "Largo" brought out a warm baritone depth, however, and his high voice was ever brilliant and full.

The two Sibelius numbers, given by the orchestra, were strongly contrasted. "The Swan of Tuowela" was a rare rendition, showing the very subdued and sustained work that this orchestra handles so wonderfully. It was a legend with a faraway tragic note in it, worked out with much simplicity and exquisite spirit and tone. The rugged "Finland" symphonic poem, with its big building up and down of the whole orchestral fiber, and its strange national quality was given with much spirit and admirable control.

The ever joyous "Euryanthe," overture of Weber, with its beauty and singing melody, is always a happy close to a program. Dr. Muck gave it brilliantly, his interpretation being marked with crispness, vigor, and much variety.

J. MacB.

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 3 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

Dr. Muck Presents Beethoven's "Eroica" and Pasquale Amato Is the Soloist.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
Saint-Saens—Aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from "Henry VIII," Act I, Scene 4
Richard Strauss—Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20
Handel—Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera, "Serse," Act I, Scene 1
Smetana—Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist—Pasquale Amato.

It would almost seem that there was a significance in Dr. Karl Muck's having chosen the "Eroica," Beethoven's immortal symphony, to open his concert in Boston two weeks ago, as well as in Philadelphia last evening. Just from the scene of the great struggle in Europe, the conductor was no doubt impressed, by scenes he had witnessed, of the graphic description Beethoven had worked into his Symphony No. 3. The inspiration for this work has been variously attributed. Was it his admiration for Napoleon? He himself wrote with a pencil on his score "Written on Bonaparte." The allegro movement is a musical impression of a sea fight, with the famous "Funeral March" in memory of Nelson, or General Abercrombie, or one of the other of the immortal heroes of his period.

Symphony a Supreme Effort.

But without questioning a reason for his choice, the "Eroica" has always appealed strongly to Dr. Muck, and it was the first symphony he gave in Philadelphia when he returned to this city two years ago after an absence of four years. His favorable inclination would naturally lead to a supreme effort on his part and a better reading of the "Eroica" has never been heard in this city. The strong contrast of last evening's effectiveness is marked in comparison with the rather indifferent reading of a week ago on the same concert stage.

Dr. Muck has given the most patient study to this, probably next to the fifth, the most widely known and loved of the nine Beethoven Symphonies. He was able to impart his own individual interpretation to his instrumentalists, and in consequence it was an inspiring, a thoughtful, and a most sublime effort on the part of every one concerned, which met a response from the audience at its finish that must have been most gratifying.

Amato Sings Two Numbers.

The soloist of the evening was Pasquale Amato, the eminent barytone, who sang two numbers practically unfamiliar here, especially as to the first number, an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," and the second number, well known as Handel's "Largo," although rarely heard as a vocal number. Amato was in fine voice, but in neither number was he able to satisfy the audience with an organ that has given so much delight for many years in opera.

The "Henry VIII" selection is short and only in its final notes is the singer able to find an opportunity to bring out the great power and luscious tone which has won him lasting fame. His brilliant high tones in this number were striking in comparison with his equally brilliant low tones in the Handel aria, showing the marvelous range of his voice.

Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan" was given between the two vocal numbers and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" closed the concert, both of which were played with fine effect, and assisted in the varying of the program.

The next Boston Symphony Concert will be on November 30, with Harold Bauer as the soloist.

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 3 - 1914

AMATO IS DUE TODAY

Famous Barytone Will Appear With Boston Symphony.

Pasquale Amato, the noted barytone who will be the soloist at the Lyric tomorrow evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gives its first Baltimore concert of the current season, is expected to arrive in town some time this afternoon.

He has not been heard here for a number of years, but operagoers will recall with pleasure his famous debut in this city, when, quite unknown and unheralded, he replaced Scotti, who was ill at the time, and created a furore.

Mr. Amato has taken an apartment at the Belvedere, where he will remain until Thursday.

Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York

Date NOV 6 - 1914

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest musical "instrument" given to one man to play on in a topsy-turvy world, its first New York concert at Carnegie Hall last night was expected to be sensational. The event proved that, and more. A house sold out for months to come left a percentage of people on the waiting list actually higher than the proportion of new men among the hundred in the band. The full stage got a hand of greeting as Concertmaster Witek took his seat. Conductor Karl Muck was applauded thirty seconds when he walked out, and a whole minute when he ended the "Eroica" symphony, by a world genius whose family history on this earth had revolved around the fated Belgian cities of Malines, Antwerp and Louvain.

Beethoven's funeral march in that Napoleonic number was cited in a programme book as evidence of the "militarism" found by French Vincent d'Indy in its warlike rhythm. The dazzling scherzo was played without a leader. For Dr. Muck laid down his baton after rapping for silence, and let his men go on with hardly a gesture of command. They earned their standing recall at the close. The orchestra was at its best in the later Strauss "Don Juan," played as perhaps never before. Here Muck himself showed amazing warmth. He had not lived untouched by the supreme experiences of European upheaval. Only lesser heights were reached in the Brahms-Haydn variations, beautiful of their kind, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," soon to be staged at the Metropolitan.

New York's finest audience packed the hall, as its motors did the streets outside. The one box sold last night, which was Muck's own, was bought and paid for by so distinguished a visitor as Marcella Sembrich in the new musical metropolis of creation. Mischa Elman and his sister were guests nearby. Geraldine Farrar, her father and mother, also sat with C. A. Ellis in the parterre row. Major H. L. Higginson, who celebrates his eightieth birthday this Nov. 18 by publishing a history of his famous organization's thirty-four years, was not present. W. H. Brennan sent him a telegram of congratulation in advance to Boston.

Muck's "all-German" season's opener will not be repeated in two more concerts here this trip. Neither was it done in Washington, where the diplomatic proprieties were observed with episodes, both Russian and French. Would a Prussian leader dare show his head in Berlin if he had started the war year in far America with a programme "all French?" To ask the question is to give the answer. It was unnecessary, it was unwise, to allow the faintest hint of national lines. However subtly implied, the violation of the spirit of man in art at its highest is the unpardonable sin.

What else is it, as a recent English poet sings, "to bay the British with Beethoven, put Schubert in the melting pot, and pray in aid the noble Haydn? While all the while the truckler tries to seem a saint in Uncle Sam's sight; but Sam has got no taste for wiles; they're much too feeble—by a Brahms' sight."

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 4 -

AMATO SINGS TONIGHT

Barytone To Be Soloist At Opening Of The Boston Symphony Season At Lyric.

Pasquale Amato, first barytone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will make his initial concert appearance in this city at the Lyric tonight, when he will be the soloist at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season.

Amato has not sung in Baltimore for five years, and, owing to his extreme popularity and to the fact that Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Orchestra, has selected a particularly good program for the first concert, even more interest than usual is being shown in the performance. The indications are that the house will be entirely sold out.

The symphony tonight will be the third of Beethoven, called the "Eroica." This great work was composed when Beethoven was fired with enthusiasm over the astounding genius of Napoleon Bonaparte, and the original dedication was to him. But when the master learned that his hero had accepted the Emperor's scepter he struck his pen ruthlessly through the dedicatory lines and wrote instead the word "Eroica."

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address: New York City

Date NOV 6 - 1914

"HOFFMANN" AT CENTURY; MUCK ORCHESTRA HERE

Unscathed by the draft of a very few of its members by the exigencies of the appalling and yet paltry history that is being made in Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in New York last night for the first of its series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck was again at the conductor's desk, and both he and his men received from the audience that filled the auditorium a most warm evidence of the real obligation New York feels itself under to the Boston band.

Dr. Muck restricted his programmatic efforts in this opening concert to Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss and Weber, and it may be that this exclusively Teutonic selection well call forth some comment. Yet nothing of this sort need be necessary. Music is music, particularly when the Boston Orchestra plays it.

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the "Eroica" symphony of the master of Bonn, the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Strauss's earliest tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," which opera the Metropolitan is to revive during the approaching season.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, with the possibility of a single exception in the case of the work in C minor, is probably the most familiar to concert-goers in the whole symphonic repertoire. Beethoven's original intention of therein raising a great monument to Napoleon Bonaparte and then characteristically striking the name of the idealized hero from the title page when his lack of ideality became apparent is also familiar enough.

What perhaps concerns us most in this necessarily meagre record of the performance is the fact that Dr. Muck played the symphony, particularly in its marcia funebre and finale, with bounty of painstaking minutiae of eloquence, so apportioned in the general scheme of interpretation as to produce a vital proclamation of its soaring nobility.

The Haydn Variations are hardly Brahms in one of his most interesting phases. In the midst of this exhibition of scholarly mastery there is, perhaps, just too much of the mere scholarly, and the simple exaltation, veiled as in a mist of the remote, infusing the original theme, overshadows in beauty and appeal the corruscations Brahms has built upon it.

In the face of the latter tone poems of Strauss, "Don Juan"—the first of them—seems to possess some modicum of simplicity, and yet the real Strauss in method and manner is here as well as in matters both later and earlier. There is the characteristic commonplaceness of theme, albeit not quite so commonplace as at other times, and there is the same stupendous talent for flexibly apposite orchestral device.

The orchestra played the Strauss tone poem with exceptional virtuosity even for them. The wondrousness of rich and solid tone was once more a wooing delight, the technical certainty and intelligent responsiveness of the several choirs as a whole and the first instruments individually were something to make those starved with New York's lack of them glad of heart.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

Date OV 6 -

Die Boſtoner.

Eine Sympathie-Demonſtration wärmſter Art empfing geſtern Abend Dr. Muck, den bewährten Führer der Boſtoner ſymphoniſchen [illegible] mit ſeinem leichtbeſchwingten, elaſtiſchen Schritt dem Dirigentenplatz zuging. Muck hatte ein ganz deutſches Programm für das Eröffnungskonzert der New Yorker Saiſon gewählt, daſſelbe, das auch den Boſtoner Reigen eingeleitet hatte. An der Spitze der mächtigen Vortragsreihe ſtand Beethoven's „Eroica".

Noch nie habe ich den genialen Flügelſchlag dieſes Koloſſes ſo verſpürt als geſtern! Sie iſt eines der muſikaliſchen Weltwunder, dieſe „heroiſche" Symphonie, zugleich die Symphonie unſerer großen, ſturmbewegten Zeit! Es griff an unſer Herz, was da Dr. Muck an trotzigem Mannesmuth und unbeugſamer Kraft in dieſen monumentalen erſten Satz legte, ein heldenhaftes Ringen und Kämpfen, ein Fels in ſturmbewegter Gegenwart. Und dann die erhabene Todtenklage des zweiten Satzes! Daß man doch ſeine Gedanken von den Vorgängen da drüben nicht ablenken kann! Dieſer Trauermarſch ertönte ſo mächtig, düſter, als ob er das Fallen nicht eines, vieler, unzähliger Helden beklage und zugleich ihren Ruhm verkündete, der in Aeonen nicht untergehen wird. Und als zum Schluſſe Dirigent und Orcheſter in die dunkle Myſtik immer tiefer verſanken, als einzelne Theile des Themas förmlich auseinanderfielen, und das ganze in immer leiſeren Zuckungen erſtarb, da dauerte es viele Sekunden, bis das Publikum ſich aus ſeiner Bewegung zum Applaus ſammeln konnte.

Die Spannung löſte ſich erſt mit dem optimiſtiſcheren Scherzo mit ſeinem Wechſel von gleichſam grollendem Humor und phantaſtiſchem Treiben. Auch da ſchwebte ernſte Manneswürde über dem Ganzen, wenn man auch die freundlichen Epiſoden, namentlich die Waldesluſt der drei Waldhörner, (welch' prächtige Löſung des ſchwierigen Einſatzes!) nach Gebühr genießen konnte. Zum Schluß dann die immer höher ſchlagende Begeiſterung! Man vergaß die Virtuoſität des Orcheſters über der großen Ausgeſtaltung. Das waren keine kontrapunktiſchen Verſchlingungen, keine Variationen und Fugati, das war ein einziges Jubellied. Die Helden ſind todt, ihr Werk aber wird leben — ewig, unſterblich! Durch Nacht zum Licht! Das erklang aus dieſen hehren Tönen, aus der Symphonie unſerer Zeit, unſerer Hoffnungen!

Ein anderer Höhepunkt des Konzertes war Strauß's „Don Juan", der in unvergleichlich durchgeiſtigter Virtuoſität vorüberrauſchte. Die erleſenen Virtuoſen an den erſten Pulten ergriffen die Gelegenheit, ihren Part zur Geltung zu bringen, dabei aber immer als dienende Glieder des großen Ganzen. Konzertmeiſter Witek's Geige ſchlug zauberhafte Töne an, — auch er war bei ſeinem erſten Erſcheinen freundlich begrüßt worden, wie ein guter, alter Bekannter.

Zwiſchen dem fließenden Feuerſtrom der Symphonie und der impoſanten Polychromie des „Don Juan" nahmen ſich die Brahms'ſchen „Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Thema" ungeachtet ihrer glänzenden Orcheſtrirung etwas dürftig aus. Muck's Wiedergabe ließ an edler Vollendung und glänzender Knappheit der Faſſung keinen Wunſch unerfüllt. Den Schluß bildete die glänzende „Euryanthe"-Ouverture, die der Dirigent ungemein feingliedrig darlegte. Der Beifall des Publikums ſchlug hohe Wellen. Das ganze Orcheſter mußte wiederholt für den Applaus durch Erheben danken. Ein glänzender Anfang!

H.

Leonard Borwick.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date 4

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Organization, Under Dr. Muck, Scores Usual Artistic Success.

The usual capacity audience, with many people standing, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at its first concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the celebrated Italian baritone Pasquale Amato as soloist. Dr. Muck ever delights with his polish and fineness, and he gets absolute response from this organization that has no peer in this country in its infinite variety of tone painting of the purest and tenderest colors. The personal charm of Pasquale Amato vied with the dramatic appeal of his singing, making one wish to hear him in his greatest realm of the opera.

The symphony was the Brahms No. 2, in D major, heard here for the second time this season. Dr. Muck made it all fair and gracious, full of rhythm with every detail showing perfect finish and tone. The tender and melodious themes with which it abounds were worked out against a flowing undercurrent of tone that formed a rich background. The adagio was in no way emotional, but showed a real perfection in the cello introduction and the development of the theme given the winds. The scherzo was a fairy dance with most exquisite work in the strings and changes of mood; while the brilliant and spirited finale was divided between some rare piannissimo and a real abandon.

In the dramatic scene from Saint-Saens' opera "Henry VIII," Mr. Amato was most brilliant in the middle section which was impassioned and spirited, leading up to a climax of big full voice and rich tone, but he was less pleasing in the declamatory introduction and finale because of a lack of mellowness. The Handel "Largo" brought out a warm baritone depth, however, and his high voice was ever brilliant and full.

The two Sibelius numbers, given by the orchestra, were strongly contrasted. "The Swan of Tuowela" was a rare rendition, showing the very subdued and sustained work that this orchestra handles so wonderfully. It was a legend with a faraway tragic note in it, worked out with much simplicity and exquisite spirit and tone. The rugged "Finland" symphonic poem, with its big building up and down of the whole orchestral fiber, and its strange national quality was given with much spirit and admirable control.

The ever joyous "Euryanthe," overture of Weber, with its beauty and singing melody, is always a happy close to a program. Dr. Muck gave it brilliantly, his interpretation being marked with crispness, vigor, and much variety.

J. MacB.

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 3 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

r. Muck Presents Beethoven's "Eroica" and Pasquale Amato Is the Soloist.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
Saint-Saens—Aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from "Henry VIII," Act I, Scene 4
Richard Strauss—Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20
Handel—Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera, "Serse," Act I, Scene 1
Smetana—Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist—Pasquale Amato.

It would almost seem that there was a significance in Dr. Karl Muck's having chosen the "Eroica," Beethoven's immortal symphony, to open his concert in Boston two weeks ago, as well as in Philadelphia last evening. Just from the scene of the great struggle in Europe, the conductor was no doubt impressed, by scenes he had witnessed, of the graphic description Beethoven had worked into his Symphony No. 3. The inspiration for this work has been variously attributed. Was it his admiration for Napoleon? He himself wrote with a pencil on his score "Written on Bonaparte." The allegro movement is a musical impression of a sea fight, with the famous "Funeral March" in memory of Nelson, or General Abercrombie, or one of the other of the immortal heroes of his period.

Symphony a Supreme Effort.

But without questioning a reason for his choice, the "Eroica" has always appealed strongly to Dr. Muck, and it was the first symphony he gave in Philadelphia when he returned to this city two years ago after an absence of four years. His favorable inclination would naturally lead to a supreme effort on his part and a better reading of the "Eroica" has never been heard in this city. The strong contrast of last evening's effectiveness is marked in comparison with the rather indifferent reading of a week ago on the same concert stage.

Dr. Muck has given the most patient study to this, probably next to the fifth, the most widely known and loved of the nine Beethoven Symphonies. He was able to impart his own individual interpretation to his instrumentalists, and in consequence it was an inspiring, a thoughtful, and a most sublime effort on the part of every one concerned, which met a response from the audience at its finish that must have been most gratifying.

Amato Sings Two Numbers.

The soloist of the evening was Pasquale Amato, the eminent barytone, who sang two numbers practically unfamiliar here, especially as to the first number, an aria from Saint-Saens' "Henry VIII," and the second number, well known as Handel's "Largo," although rarely heard as a vocal number. Amato was in fine voice, but in neither number was he able to satisfy the audience with an organ that has given so much delight for many years in opera.

The "Henry VIII" selection is short and only in its final notes is the singer able to find an opportunity to bring out the great power and luscious tone which has won him lasting fame. His brilliant high tones in this number were striking in comparison with his equally brilliant low tones in the Handel aria, showing the marvelous range of his voice.

Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan" was given between the two vocal numbers and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" closed the concert, both of which were played with fine effect, and assisted in the varying of the program.

The next Boston Symphony Concert will be on November 30, with Harold Bauer as the soloist.

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 3 - 1914

AMATO IS DUE TODAY

Famous Barytone Will Appear With Boston Symphony.

Pasquale Amato, the noted barytone who will be the soloist at the Lyric tomorrow evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gives its first Baltimore concert of the current season, is expected to arrive in town some time this afternoon.

He has not been heard here for a number of years, but operagoers will recall with pleasure his famous debut in this city, when, quite unknown and unheralded, he replaced Scotti, who was ill at the time, and created a furore.

Mr. Amato has taken an apartment at the Belvedere, where he will remain until Thursday.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BEETHOVEN

Dr. Carl Muck Gives Programme of Masters, but One Number Failed to Reach Standard.

BRILLIANT PLAYING OF STRAUSS

Hamish MacKay Is Heard at Aeolian Hall in Programme of British Music.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was the usual large audience, which, however, attentive it may be during the actual performance of the musical numbers, will not follow the excellent example of Boston and relapse into silence a minute or two before the music begins. Dr. Muck was compelled several times to rap sharply for order.

The symphony played was Beethoven's "Eroica." There was a singular lack of animation about the execution of the first movement as well as some inaccuracies. During the intermission an explanation, or what purported to be an explanation of this, flew from lip to lip among the conversationalists of the corridors. It ran to the effect that the musicians had been told that their reception would not be what it was in the past owing to the disturbed state of international politics and their German nationality. Some color was unfortunately given to this palpable and disgraceful nonsense by the fact that in an evening paper there had appeared a fantastic article scourging Dr. Muck for announcing a "German" programme and accusing him of German propaganda.

Dr. Muck's Programme.

He should have given neutral music, it was urged. I confess I do not know what neutral music means, unless it be the symphonic striving of Hottentots. I suppose it means music written by composers belonging to nations other than those now fighting. A concert of such works would indeed be a strange one.

The programme consisted of Beethoven, Brahms, Strauss and Weber. Three of these are dead and are numbered with the immortals. In any case, nothing could be more grossly inartistic than to import political rancor into the field of abstract art. One blushes at a state of affairs that compels a writer to mention these elementary considerations.

If Dr. Muck and his instrumentalists did, as was alleged, suffer from nervousness, it should have been dissipated very early in the concert, for conductor and orchestra were most heartily welcomed But whatever the season may be, the "Eroica" did not receive the clear, emphatic and highly poetic interpretation that Dr. Muck has given it so often.

Strauss's "Don Juan."

The playing of the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Strauss's was brilliant as ever, and there was power and solidity about the rendering of the Brahms Variations. The un-neutral concert, which consisted of the works of four of the greatest masters the world has known, and the precious possessions of all men and all ages, closed with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV

* * *

The new symphony by Ropartz, which was recently produced in Boston at a symphony concert, proved a disappointment, lacking in individuality and vitality. Mr. Parker in the Boston Transcript said of the symphony, after devoting some space to an analysis of it in comparison with the work of Cesar Franck and his influence on his pupils:

"From beginning to end, except in happy strokes of detail, it is imitative work and Ropartz in the 50th year of his age should have left such doing three decades behind. On the surface are the Franckian contours, skilfully modelled and the Franckian colors laid on with an adroit hand; superficially, the carver of the music has caught the Franckian feeling, yet within the symphony is empty of all the vitalizing emotions and the kindling personality that make Franck's music what it is. And in technical perfections, flawless jointure, the laying of paragraph and paragraph and almost phrase and phrase impeccably side by side, Ropartz's symphony is a carven music. Try as they might Dr. Muck and his men could not animate its delicate incisiveness, its meandering suavities, its gravely gentle clangors, its momentary explosions. There are moods in hearers that invite such music; there are quite as many in perverse human nature that almost resent it."

* * * 67

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 4 1914

FINE CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra Greeted by Large Audience—Pasquale Amato, Soloist, Adds to Laurels.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were warmly greeted yesterday afternoon at the National Theater when they made their appearance at the first of the series of concerts for this season. Among several changes of interest in the personnel of the orchestra, a new cellist, Mr. Malkin, takes the vacancy left by Mr. Wrak, and Mr. E. Schmidt, violinist, a newcomer, fills the role of first violinist and assistant conductor.

Those who went yesterday to hear repeated the same Brahms symphony—the No. 2—given here last week by Damrosch, must have come away rejoicing at the opportunity of hearing, at close range of time, the readings of the two conductors. There is a subtlety of outline and shading, a fineness of balance, all combined with an architectural comprehension in Dr. Muck's work that comes out strongly in contrast with the work of other men. Much, of course, is due the orchestra in speaking of the work of any conductor of this great organization; but it would be interesting to know how much hard work the conductor puts into his scores. The subtlety of expression of which Dr. Muck is master, was finely shown yesterday in the allegretto movement, in which the fairy-like passages were etherealized against contrasting themes of vigor and energy.

One of the most interesting numbers was the "Swan of Tuonela," of Sibelius, in which the English horn takes the Swan theme over an accompaniment that suggests the flow of water quite as realistically as that of Wagner's Rhine maidens scene. The "Finlandia," also a composition of Sibelius, was in happy contrast, a work for the most part in the broad style, full of big masses of harmony, and distinguished by a strikingly lovely theme.

"The Euryanthe," of Weber, was never more beautifully played. The conductor's baton seemed a thing of magic.

Pasquale Amato, barytone, the soloist, sang Saint-Saens' aria "Fui donc Commande Quand il aime?" from Henry VIII, and the air from Handel's Xerxes that in the instrumental version is known as Handel's "Largo." Mr. Amato was born in Naples, educated musically, chiefly in Trieste, and many vicissitudes of fortune brought him, finally, five years ago, to the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

He has a voice of great beauty, he sang without flourish or affectation, but with great power and dramatic force, the aria of Saint-Saens, and the Handel number with appropriate simplicity. It will be the good fortune of Washington to hear him again—in concert—this year.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at the first concert of the season, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting the orchestra and Pasquale Amato, the Italian baritone, as soloist.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 2, in D major, with two Sibelius numbers, "The Swan of Towela" and the symphonic poem, "Finland," and the Weber overture, "Euryanthe," as supplemental contributions of the orchestra. Signor Amato was heard in a scene from Saint-Saens' "Henry VII" and the Handel "Largo."

The applause of the audience throughout was genuine in its sincerity of welcome and appreciation and fairly divided between the great singer and the equally splendid orchestra and its accomplished conductor.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The Boston Symphony Concert yesterday, the first of the season, attracted as always a brilliant audience. The German ambassador entertained a box party, having as his guests Prince and Princess von Hatzfeld Trachenberg, Baroness Zweidenek, Miss Harriet Southerland and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had with her in her box Mrs. Lindley M. Garrison, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. Frederick Dent Grant. Mrs. Edward B. McLean and Miss Virginia Mott. Mrs. James McMillan occupied a box and had a number of guests, including Mrs. Henry Corbin, Miss Margery Colton and Mrs. Preston Gibson. General and Mrs. Crozier had Gen. and Mrs. W. W. Wotherspoon with them, and with Mrs. Calderon Carlisle were Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Phillips. Mrs. A. Lisner was hostess for a party of guests, among them Mrs. Percy Hickling. Many prominent Washingtonians occupied seats in the body of the house.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS FINISHED PRODUCT

Dr. Muck and Boston Orchestra Reveals Rare Poise and Fineness of Shading.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday at the National Theater under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Pasquale Amato, baritone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony No. 2, in D major, which was presented last week by another symphony orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch, was the first number. The work of Dr. Muck is marked by a fineness of shading which reveals an endless amount of work on the part of both orchestra and director, yet there were no dramatics practiced by Dr. Muck. His leadership is all that is poised and finished, for his teaching is evidently done at rehearsals, and only the perfect product is given to his audiences.

Two numbers by Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela," from the Finnish folk epic, "Kavela" and "Finlandia," a symphonic poem arranged for orchestral work, aside from being rarely beautiful are intensely interesting as typical of Finland. None of their weird beauty was lost through the interpretation of Dr. Muck.

Amato, the great baritone, while duly appreciated and pleasantly received by the audience, was somewhat of a disappointment, due entirely to his choice of numbers. He was heard in Saint-Saen's aria, "Qui donc commande quand it aime?" from Henry Vill, and the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse" of Handel, familiarly known, as the program stated, "through the preposterous arrangement known as Handel's Largo."

While his first number gave promise of his glorious voice, and the broad Handel showed the placid richness of a perfect organ, at no time did the audience receive the full benefit of his complete range. As long as his selections were two in number and could have been chosen with more of an eye for graciously satisfying an audience hungry and eager to hear the great baritone, his choice is regrettable. He merely whetted the appetite. In view of the fact that we have no grand oper here, and that there is but one oth opportunity for hearing him in Was ing, he was, to say the least, clos

F. E. YODE

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 4 - 191

THE opening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Lyric will attract a large and fashionable audience. While these concerts have always been well patronized by society, this year they will probably be more brilliant than ever, as, owing to the absence of any opera performances, they will be the chief musical events.

A number of boxes have been engaged for the season in

From [illegible]
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 191

AT THE CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

For the second concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon there was again that distinctive audience which always gathers to listen to work of this remarkably unified body of musicians.

By the compositions selected for this second programme, Dr. Karl Muck has demonstrated that he is not "provincially nationalistic" in his musical tastes. Brahm's Second Symphony, Chadwick's symphonic sketches and Sibelius' "Finlandia," since it represented Dr. Muck's own country in the first, this country in the second and the Allies in the third, is indication of the real cosmopolitan spirit becoming in a musician of Dr. Muck's superior training.

There is nothing new to be said about the Boston Symphony, and "the high gift of praising" must again be employed for the beautiful balance of tone, the unanimity of the players and the superb leadership of Dr. Muck.

Not many soloists could adequately follow the great band from Boston and give a recital in the same hall a few hours after those players had departed. Yet Harold Bauer did that last night, and to do him justice it should be said that never for a moment did his work at the [illegible] seem like an anti-climax to the [illegible] of the afternoon.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9

THOUSANDS LISTEN TO MUSIC OF WEEK END

Two orchestral concerts, with a young violinist making his first New York appearance at one of them; a recital by Harold Bauer, the annual baton luxuriance of John Philip Sousa and the usual Sunday evening potpourri of the Century Opera Company made up the musical activities of a busy week-end and thousands were found to listen to all of these diversified outpourings.

Let us, therefore, condense our impressions and comment of and upon these things. Of chief significance, it need hardly be said, was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck was less profuse in his offering than on the previous Thursday evening and presented the Brahms D major symphony, the Symphonic Sketches of George W. Chadwick, American, New Englander and Bostonian and the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," of Jan Sibelius.

It has become almost customary to denominate the playing of any of the standard symphonic repertoire by Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra as "memorable." There is no question as to the appositeness of the adjective. There is merely the cogitation as to why the adjective is reserved only for the visits of the men from Boston. The adjective is kept in camphor, as it were, from month to month, because it is rather fairly certain that it will not be needed orchestrally during any of the intervening weeks—the moral of which is, perhaps, that endowments do not necessarily make an orchestra.

Dr. Muck's performance of the second Brahms symphony was quite as much entitled to the decamphoration of the adjective as was that of the "Eroica" symphony on the previous Thursday. It was unmistakably and thrillingly not a matter of orchestral repertoire routine. It had been studied in variety of detail and it was revealed in a consequent variety of expressiveness, whose eloquence consisted in this variety's illustration of a general idea of comprehending insight. The "Finlandia," a stirring piece of orchestral music, which proclaims folk character, without a slavish adhesion to folk childishness, was played with superb spirit.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck machte im Samſtags-Konzert mit ſeiner mänlich ſtarken und farbenprächtigen Wiedergabe von Brahm's Zweiter Symphonie einen tiefen Eindruck, der mit der nächſtfolgenden Nummer, Chadwick „Symhonic Sketches“ ſtark herabgeſtimmt wurde. Ich bin gewiß dafür, daß amerikaniſche Komponiſten zu Wort gelangen ſollen, und namentlich Chadwick, für den ich ſehr viel übrig habe, hat beſtimmt ein Anrecht darauf, gehört zu werden, nur erweiſt man mit der Vorführung ſo unbedeutender, ja unerfreulicher Muſik keinem der Betheiligten einen Gefallen. Das Publikum iſt enttäuſcht, welches Gefühl nur ſchlecht hinter gezwungenem Beifall verborgen werden kann, das Orcheſter hat ſeine Bravour und ſubtile Klangverfeinerung umſonſt verſchwendet, und dem Komponiſten erwächſt daraus nur Mißſtimmung, ſofern er ſich nicht ganz über die wahren Urſachen des geringen Erfolges täuſcht. Daß in dieſen vier Stimmungsbildern manches gut empfunden iſt, daß glänzende Anläufe vorliegen, kann uns über die nichtsſagende Erfindung und das leere Tonſpiel nicht hinwegführen.

Sieblius' „Finlandia“ mit ſeiner tief-traurig-melancholiſchen Stimmung gelangte durch Muck und ſein Orcheſter ergreifend zur Wiedergabe.

H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9 - 19

house applauded him without stint.

Dr. Karl Muck gave for the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon a programme that consisted of Brahm's second symphony, George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Jean Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia." There was a crowded house that enjoyed to the full the splendid exposition of each number.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BEETHOVEN

Dr. Carl Muck Gives Programme of Masters, but One Number Failed to Reach Standard.

BRILLIANT PLAYING OF STRAUSS

Hamish MacKay Is Heard at Aeolian Hall in Programme of British Music.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was the usual large audience, which, however, attentive it may be during the actual performance of the musical numbers, will not follow the excellent example of Boston and relapse into silence a minute or two before the music begins. Dr. Muck was compelled several times to rap sharply for order.

The symphony played was Beethoven's "Eroica." There was a singular lack of animation about the execution of the first movement as well as some inaccuracies. During the intermission an explanation, or what purported to be an explanation of this, flew from lip to lip among the conversationalists of the corridors. It ran to the effect that the musicians had been told that their reception would not be what it was in the past owing to the disturbed state of international politics and their German nationality. Some color was unfortunately given to this palpable and disgraceful nonsense by the fact that in an evening paper there had appeared a fantastic article scourging Dr. Muck for announcing a "German" programme and accusing him of German propaganda.

Dr. Muck's Programme.

He should have given neutral music, it was urged. I confess I do not know what neutral music means, unless it be the symphonic striving of Hottentots. I suppose it means music written by composers belonging to nations other than those now fighting. A concert of such works would indeed be a strange one.

The programme consisted of Beethoven, Brahms, Strauss and Weber. Three of these are dead and are numbered with the immortals. In any case, nothing could be more grossly inartistic than to import political rancor into the field of abstract art. One blushes at a state of affairs that compels a writer to mention these elementary considerations.

If Dr. Muck and his instrumentalists did, as was alleged, suffer from nervousness, it should have been dissipated very early in the concert, for conductor and orchestra were most heartily welcomed But whatever the season may be, the "Eroica" did not receive the clear, emphatic and highly poetic interpretation that Dr. Muck has given it so often.

Strauss's "Don Juan."

The playing of the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Strauss's was brilliant as ever, and there was power and solidity about the rendering of tue Brahms Variations. The un-neutral concert, which consisted of the works of four of the greatest masters the world has known, and the precious possessions of all men and all ages, closed with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV [illegible] - 1914

• • •

The new symphony by Ropartz, which was recently produced in Boston at a symphony concert, proved a disappointment, lacking in individuality and vitality. Mr. Parker in the Boston Transcript said of the symphony, after devoting some space to an analysis of it in comparison with the work of Cesar Franck and his influence on his pupils:

"From beginning to end, except in happy strokes of detail, it is imitative work and Ropartz in the 50th year of his age should have left such doing three decades behind. On the surface are the Franckian contours, skilfully modelled and the Franckian colors laid on with an adroit hand; superficially, the carver of the music has caught the Franckian feeling, yet within the symphony is empty of all the vitalizing emotions and the kindling personality that make Franck's music what it is. And in technical perfections, flawless jointure, the laying of paragraph and paragraph and almost phrase and phrase impeccably side by side, Ropartz's symphony is a carven music. Try as they might Dr. Muck and his men could not animate its delicate incisiveness, its meandering suavities, its gravely gentle clangors, its momentary explosions. There are moods in hearers that invite such music; there are quite as many in perverse human nature that almost resent it."

• • 67

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 4 1914

FINE CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra Greeted by Large Audience—Pasquale Amato, Soloist, Adds to Laurels.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were warmly greeted yesterday afternoon at the National Theater when they made their appearance at the first of the series of concerts for this season. Among several changes of interest in the personnel of the orchestra, a new cellist, Mr. Malkin, takes the vacancy left by Mr. Wrak, and Mr. E. Schmidt, violinist, a newcomer, fills the role of first violinist and assistant conductor.

Those who went yesterday to hear repeated the same Brahms symphony—the No. 2—given here last week by Damrosch, must have come away rejoicing at the opportunity of hearing, at close range of time, the readings of the two conductors. There is a subtlety of outline and shading, a fineness of balance, all combined with an architectural comprehension in Dr. Muck's work that comes out strongly in contrast with the work of other men. Much, of course, is due the orchestra in speaking of the work of any conductor of this great organization; but it would be interesting to know how much hard work the conductor puts into his scores. The subtlety of expression of which Dr. Muck is master, was finely shown yesterday in the allegretto movement, in which the fairy-like passages were etherealized against contrasting themes of vigor and energy.

One of the most interesting numbers was the "Swan of Tuonela," of Sibelius, in which the English horn takes the Swan theme over an accompaniment that suggests the flow of water quite as realistically as that of Wagner's Rhine maidens scene. The "Finlandia," also a composition of Sibelius, was in happy contrast, a work for the most part in the broad style, full of big masses of harmony, and distinguished by a strikingly lovely theme.

"The Euryanthe," of Weber, was never more beautifully played. The conductor's baton seemed a thing of magic.

Pasquale Amato, barytone, the soloist, sang Saint-Saens' aria "Fui donc Commande Quand il aime?" from Henry VIII, and the air from Handel's Xerxes that in the instrumental version is known as Handel's "Largo." Mr. Amato was born in Naples, educated musically, chiefly in Trieste, and many vicissitudes of fortune brought him, finally, five years ago, to the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

He has a voice of great beauty, he sang without flourish or affectation, but with great power and dramatic force, the aria of Saint-Saens, and the Handel number with appropriate simplicity. It will be the good fortune of Washington to hear him again—in concert—this year.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at the first concert of the season, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting the orchestra and Pasquale Amato, the Italian baritone, as soloist.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 2, in D major, with two Sibelius numbers, "The Swan of Towela" and the symphonic poem, "Finland," and the Weber overture, "Euryanthe," as supplemental contributions of the orchestra. Signor Amato was heard in a scene from Saint-Saens' "Henry VII" and the Handel "Largo."

The applause of the audience throughout was genuine in its sincerity of welcome and appreciation and fairly divided between the great singer and the equally splendid orchestra and its accomplished conductor.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The Boston Symphony Concert yesterday, the first of the season, attracted as always a brilliant audience. The German ambassador entertained a box party, having as his guests Prince and Princess von Hatzfeld Trachenberg, Baroness Zweidenek, Miss Harriet Southerland and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had with her in her box Mrs. Lindley M. Garrison, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. Frederick Dent Grant, Mrs. Edward B. McLean and Miss Virginia Mott. Mrs. James McMillan occupied a box and had a number of guests, including Mrs. Henry Corbin, Miss Margery Colton and Mrs. Preston Gibson. General and Mrs. Crozier had Gen. and Mrs. W. W. Wotherspoon with them, and with Mrs. Calderon Carlisle were Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Phillips. Mrs. A. Lisner was hostess for a party of guests, among them Mrs. Percy Hickling. Many prominent Washingtonians occupied seats in the body of the house.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 4 1914

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS FINISHED PRODUCT

Dr. Muck and Boston Orchestra Reveals Rare Poise and Fineness of Shading.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday at the National Theater under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Pasquale Amato, baritone of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony No. 2, in D major, which was presented last week by another symphony orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch, was the first number. The work of Dr. Muck is marked by a fineness of shading which reveals an endless amount of work on the part of both orchestra and director, yet there were no dramatics practiced by Dr. Muck. His leadership is all that is poised and finished, for his teaching is evidently done at rehearsals, and only the perfect product is given to his audiences.

Two numbers by Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela," from the Finnish folk epic, "Kavela" and "Finlandia," a symphonic poem arranged for orchestral work, aside from being rarely beautiful are intensely interesting as typical of Finland. None of their weird beauty was lost through the interpretation of Dr. Muck.

Amato, the great baritone, while duly appreciated and pleasantly received by the audience, was somewhat of a disappointment, due entirely to his choice of numbers. He was heard in Saint-Saen's aria, "Qui donc commande quand it aime?" from Henry VIll, and the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse" of Handel, familiarly known, as the program stated, "through the preposterous arrangement known as Handel's Largo."

While his first number gave promise of his glorious voice, and the broad Handel showed the placid richness of a perfect organ, at no time did the audience receive the full benefit of his complete range. As long as his selections were two in number and could have been chosen with more of an eye for graciously satisfying an audience hungry and eager to hear the great baritone, his choice is regrettable. He merely whetted the appetite. In view of the fact that we have no grand opera here, and that there is but one other opportunity for hearing him in Washing, he was, to say the least, "close."

F. E. YODER.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 4 - 1914

THE opening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Lyric will attract a large and fashionable audience. While these concerts have always been well patronized by society, this year they will probably be more brilliant than ever, as, owing to the absence of any opera performances, they will be the chief musical events.

A number of boxes have been engaged for the season, in addition to

---

From Telegram
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914

AT THE CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

For the second concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon there was again that distinctive audience which always gathers to listen to work of this remarkably unified body of musicians.

By the compositions selected for this second programme, Dr. Karl Muck has demonstrated that he is not "provincially nationalistic" in his musical tastes. Brahm's Second Symphony, Chadwick's symphonic sketches and Sibelius' "Finlandia," since it represented Dr. Muck's own country in the first, this country in the second and the Allies in the third, is indication of the real cosmopolitan spirit becoming in a musician of Dr. Muck's superior training.

There is nothing new to be said about the Boston Symphony, and "the high gift of praising" must again be employed for the beautiful balance of tone, the unanimity of the players and the superb leadership of Dr. Muck.

Not many soloists could adequately follow the great band from Boston and give a recital in the same hall a few hours after those players had departed. Yet Harold Bauer did that last night, and to do him justice it should be said that never for a moment did his work at the piano seem like an anti-climax to the concert of the afternoon.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 9 -

HOUSANDS STEN TO MUSIC OF WEEK END

Two orchestral concerts, with a young violinist making his first New York appearance at one of them; a recital by Harold Bauer, the annual baton luxuriance of John Philip Sousa and the usual Sunday evening potpourri of the Century Opera Company made up the musical activities of a busy week-end and thousands were found to listen to all of these diversified outpourings.

Let us, therefore, condense our impressions and comment of and upon these things. Of chief significance, it need hardly be said, was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck was less profuse in his offering than on the previous Thursday evening and presented the Brahms D major symphony, the Symphonic Sketches of George W. Chadwick, American, New Englander and Bostonian and the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," of Jan Sibelius.

It has become almost customary to denominate the playing of any of the standard symphonic repertoire by Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra as "memorable." There is no question as to the appositeness of the adjective. There is merely the cogitation as to why the adjective is reserved only for the visits of the men from Boston. The adjective is kept in camphor, as it were, from month to month, because it is rather fairly certain that it will not be needed orchestrally during any of the intervening weeks—the moral of which is, perhaps, that endowments do not necessarily make an orchestra.

Dr. Muck's performance of the second Brahms symphony was quite as much entitled to the decamphoration of the adjective as was that of the "Eroica" symphony on the previous Thursday. It was unmistakably and thrillingly not a matter of orchestral repertoire routine. It had been studied in variety of detail and it was revealed in a consequent variety of expressiveness, whose eloquence consisted in this variety's illustration of a general idea of comprehending insight. The "Finlandia," a stirring piece of orchestral music, which proclaims folk character, without a slavish adhesion to folk childishness, was played with superb spirit.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
New York City
NOV [illegible]

oſtoner Symphonie=Konzert.

Muck machte im Samſtags=Kon= ait ſeiner mänlich ſtarken und far= ächtigen Wiedergabe von Brahm's ter Symphonie einen tiefen Ein= k, der mit der nächſtfolgenden Num= c, Chadwick „Symhonic Sketches" ſtark herabgeſtimmt wurde. Ich bin gewiß dafür, daß amerikaniſche Komponiſten zu Wort gelangen ſollen, und namentlich Chadwick, für den ich ſehr viel übrig habe, hat beſtimmt ein Anrecht darauf, gehört zu werden, nur erweiſt man mit der Vorführung ſo unbedeutender, ja unerfreulicher Muſik keinem der Betheiligten einen Gefallen. Das Publikum iſt enttäuſcht, welches Gefühl nur ſchlecht hinter gezwungenem Beifall verborgen werden kann, das Orcheſter hat ſeine Bravour und ſubtile Klangverfeinerung umſonſt verſchwendet, und dem Komponiſten erwächſt daraus nur Mißſtimmung, ſofern er ſich nicht ganz über die wahren Urſachen des geringen Erfolges täuſcht. Daß in dieſen vier Stimmungsbildern manches gut empfunden iſt, daß glänzende Anläufe vorliegen, kann uns über die nichtsſagende Erfindung und das leere Tonſpiel nicht hinwegführen.

Siebliusʼ „Finlandia" mit ſeiner tieftraurig=melancholiſchen Stimmung gelangte durch Muck und ſein Orcheſter ergreifend zur Wiedergabe.

H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9 - 1914

house applauded him without stint.

Dr. Karl Muck gave for the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon a programme that consisted of Brahm's second symphony, George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Jean Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia." There was a crowded house that enjoyed to the full the splendid exposition of each number.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914

SYMPHONIC SKETCHES BY CHADWICK WELL LIKED.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in as excellent playing form at its first New York matinee yesterday afternoon as on Thursday night, when the series commenced. The clear, crisp weather was ideal for stringed instruments, and the result gave the violins a brilliance decidedly helpful to much of the music that was performed.

Carnegie Hall was filled with an audience thoroughly distinctive and discriminating in its bestowal of approbation. The second symphony of Brahms, which opened the programme, has all the seriousness and dignity appealing to so scholastic a conductor as Dr. Karl Muck. He brought to his interpretation just the qualities it demands and the musicians did their share no less creditably.

Considerable interest was shown in the performance of George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," a suite for orchestra made up of four movements originally composed to be performed separately, but which may be united as they were yesterday with musical propriety and effect. The titles of the movements, in the order of their presentation, are "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad."

As a whole, the suite, which is descriptive, has originality and charm. The various portions were given with abundance of contrast and were well liked by the audience. The concluding work was the Sibelius symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1914
Est 1884

FIRST VISIT OF THE BOSTONIANS

A Note on Musical Politics—No Chauvinism in Our Concert Rooms.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Had it not been for the circumstance that on his arrival from Europe Dr. Muck dropped the remark that he could not comprehend how a people as intelligent as the American could think Germany responsible for the war, it would probably not have occurred to anybody that there was any special significance in the fact that only German music—or, rather, music composed by men born within the borders of what is now the German Empire—had a place on the programme of the first concert of the Boston Orchestra this season. Beethoven and Brahms are surely representatives of the art universal. The tendencies of modern German thought, with its contempt for moral and æsthetic decencies, have some illustration in the music of Richard Strauss, but that music is necessary occasionally to satisfy the popular craving for things hot in the mouth. As for Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, that is all romantic idealism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry. Besides, the political reflections to which the names might have given rise ought not to have contained a tinge of German chauvinism. Beethoven, of Belgian extraction, writing music to glorify a heroic conception of Bonaparte as the champion of liberty; Brahms, the child of commercial Hamburg, whose mind was wholly engrossed with his art, and Weber, whose patriotism and love of liberty flamed up with Körner's so fiercely in "Lyre and Sword" that their passionate warmth is still felt by every republican soul. Moreover, the music was so superbly played that the mental reservations of even the most suspicious listener must have been dissipated like smoke in a gale.

In the second concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall there was not even the semblance of national prejudice. The German Brahms contributed his idyllic symphony in D, the American Chadwick his "Symphonic Sketches," with their Scotch-Irish melodic blood and characteristically American humor; the Finn Sibelius his overture, "Finlandia," brimming over with love for the valor and the gentle loveliness of Suomi. If there was any occasion for regret it was only in the minds of those patrons of the Boston concerts, who are also patrons of our local orchestras, who again had to deplore, as they did on Thursday and as they have done for years, that the visitors should have repeated compositions which were still ringing in the memory. The season is only a fortnight old, yet we had heard the Brahms symphony played by the Symphony Society's orchestra and Strauss's "Don Juan" played by the Philharmonic. There is no reason why our visitors should either challenge or invite comparisons between them and local players. They have a truer mission in extending our knowledge of the orchestral literature. There were none of the thrilling moments in yesterday's concert such as marked the performance of the "Heroic" symphony on Thursday, and even the stirring climax of Sibelius's overture was not without its fellow in local memories.

Beauty brooded on every measure of the symphony, and Mr. Chadwick's music (first brought forward here six years ago) was heard with interest and pleasure.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 7 1914
Estab 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON IS OPENED

Brahms' Second and Sibelius' "Finlandia" Splendidly Played at Academy.

NEUTRALITY IS PRESERVED.

Amato Twice Appears and Big Audience Enthuses.

Safe back in their adopted country after months of close contact with war's alarms, Boston's most famous band of musicians celebrated their complete attachment to ideals of peace by appearing last night in Brooklyn. For a scant two hours or less they played as only artists can play who offer up fervent thanks for deliverance from duty where the bullets fly. The occasion meant for Brooklyn the most substantial and showy audience of the season at the Academy of Music.

But one interpretation may be placed on the programme presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It surely must have been an attempt to emphasize neutrality. The German Brahms and Weber were balanced against the Frenchman Saint-Saens and the Finn Sibelius, and the balance was maintained by the inclusion of Handel, the German-born composer who loved England and lived there, and still further emphasized by the choice of soloist, the robust Italian Amato.

No other meaning could possibly have been intended to be conveyed. The programme progresed consistently to an anti-climax, and the evening of incomparable melodic tones was twice ruptured by the interpolation of Amato's booming baritone. The operatic star was in magnificent voice and his Saint-Saens aria aroused a riot of applause—but squarely on top of the Brahms symphony it came without sufficient preparation. On his second appearance the "big fellow" sang the familiar—even hackneyed—"Largo" from Handel's "Xerxes." His essay into the bel canto, while less inspiring of applause, was more musical than the "Henry VIII" racconto.

High spots of excellence there were—three that stood out even above the standard set and maintaiened by the Bostonians. The first of these was the scherzo of the Brahms Second Symphony. Its tripping measures were performed with grace, with delicacy—it was quite "allegretto grazioso," as the programme specified. Another moment of inspiration was the climax of the finale, gloriously done with a wealth of tone and volume. The third was the playing of the patriotic "Finlandia" of Sibelius. The Finnish composer was given generous recognition on last evening's programme, and the verdict was emphatic in his favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe," theatrical though always pleasant, made a tame finale after Brahms and Sibelius. Dr Kark Muck, seemingly as impassive and aloof as ever, led unobtrusively yet with every sign of absolute authority. He remained in the background while the Amato applause lasted, and strangely enough the audience was not particularly enthusiastic in the clapping it directed his way. The Bostonians, despite the few changes made in their ranks by the necessities of Mars, play with the same characteristics that won them fame of old—their chief excellence stilll lying in the one point that really counts the most—smoothness and purity of tone.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8
Est

Modern Music by Boston Symph

Dr. Muck presented a prog of modern music at yesterday [illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was variety in the character of the music, for Brahm's Second Symphony was the opening number, which was followed by Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches and Sibelins's "Findlandic"—harmony from Austria, America and Finland.

The orchestra played with that splendid balance of tone and homogeniety that characterizes Dr. Muck's musicians. The men seemed to be inspired by the eloquence of the score. Each of the many beauties of the work was disclosed in a manner that illustrated symmetry and proportion of each phrase and of the superb climaxes. It was a performance of wonderful achievement and merit.

Chadwick's Four Sketches were pleasingly tuneful and cleverly harmonious, but their proportion sound- [illegible] diminutive between [illegible] the Scandinavian

---

STAR
s: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 5 - 1914
884

OSTON ORCHESTRA IN SPLENDID FORM

Beethoven's Third Symphony Feature of First Concert at Lyric.

Once called dangerously immoral, and since then heroic, Beethoven's third symphony, as well as two works by other composers, was played unusually well by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Lyric Theater last night. Pasquale Amato, barytone, of the Metropolitan Opera House, was the special soloist. The audience was large and apparently in receptive mood.

So receptive, indeed, had it been made by the truly great performance of the great symphony, such anticipation had been made the state of mind, that the vocal selections of Mr. Amato caused involuntary disappointment, which could not be disguised. The musical contrast was like going from electric to candle light. The audience recovered itself sufficiently to give him a measure of applause, however, which obviously was heartier in Mr. Amato's more familiar second—the Handel—number.

Magnificent, indeed, was the performance of the orchestra. The impression created was that the instrumental balance, spirit, interpretation and general technique formed a whole which it would be difficult to imagine could be improved materially in this world. It was not necessary to perception of this that the predominant mood of the concert should have been of the present historical period. Even with Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss and Jean Sibelius represented on the program, the supremacy of the Beethoven mood could not be dispelled.

Instrumental attacks, changed colorings, alternating lights and shades—all were done like magic, as if each one of the players was moved by an identical and infallible impulse. The playing was a musician's dream realized. So accurately had the orchestra absorbed its training that Dr. Muck used a minimum amount of baton conducting, ceasing physical gestures almost entirely in the third movement of the symphony.

Those who feel that Beethoven could do no wrong—there are some such—probably are shocked when they think that there was a time when the master's third symphony was held up as an awful example of "dangerous immorality." Evidently, this proves conclusively that "there were giants in those days"—giants of distorted intellect. Probably the last movement offended. It does foreshadow the essential musical spirit of today, it is true, in the orchestration and harmonies of certain passages. The chief general impression today, however, is of its length; and it is more than probable that it would have deeper and more general appreciation heard singly than in immediate connection with other works.

Strauss' highly-colored tone-poem, Don Juan, and Sibelius' passionately direct symphonic poem, Finlandia, were the other instrumental pieces played by the orchestra. It is to be hoped the day is not far off when an essentially American work will be as intensely "national" as the Sibelius' composition is said to be.

Amato would undoubtedly have been received with far greater enthusiasm had he chosen compositions more of a general display character. He showed good tone and control for the most part.

J. N. H.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914
Esta 884

DR. MUCK'S MEN TRIUMPH AGAIN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Another Delightful Concert.

There was no soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinée concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but the hall was crowded and the applause of the audience was without bounds after each orchestral number.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, did not confine his programme to German music, as he had done at Thursday's concert, but he divided it between German, American and Finnish composers. He began with Brahms' Second Symphony and aroused the admiration of his audience by the amazingly beautiful interpretation and faultless playing of the great symphony.

At its [illegible] the orchestra to rise, while the audience thundered applause. It was a performance to remember.

Mr George Whitfield Chadwick, American composer, contributed an orchestral suite called "Symphonic Sketches," beginning with surging brilliancy and appropriately called "Jubilee." Then came the plaintive and lovely "Noel," followed by the merry and capricious scherzo, "Hobgoblin." It ended with "A Vagrom Ballad," the motto of which begins:—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum."

It has a sinister and dramatic ending, but is brilliantly scored.

Finally there was heard Mr. Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia." The familia rtone picture of Finnish national life and spirit was admirably played.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 7 1914
Estab 34

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Its Concert in Brooklyn a Pronounced Success.

BRILLIANT AUDIENCE AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

A Programme of Great Interest—Brahm's Symphony in D Major Delightfully Rendered—Pasquale Amato Heard in Two Arias.

While ther have already been two or three musical events of first-class importance this season at the Academy of Music, it remained for the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make Brooklynites realize that the musical season had really begun. Five philharmonic concerts will be given by this matchless organization in Brooklyn this season, yesday vening's being the first.

Music lovers are particularly gratified at the fact that the war in Europe has not interfered with the concerts here of the Boston Orchestra, as there were grave doubts during the summer whether the musicians could be assembled. Thirty of them were in Europe on the Continent and part of them were of military age, and it was considered doubtful if they could be released from their obligations in order to return to America. Fortunately, however, only two of them are absent, Messrs. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Fisse Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are in the French army. Their places were filled satisfoctorily by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Stanislaus, first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queens Hall Orchestra, London.

The programme last night consisted of Brahms' delightful symphony in D Major, two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the "Swan of Tuonela" and the stirring "Finlandia;" and for the final number, Weber's "Euyanthe" Overture.

Pasquale Amato, who was the assisting artist, sang twice, his first number being an aria from Saint-Saen's opera, "Henry VIII., and his second number an air from the opera "Serse," by Handel.

The orchestra was in its finest form, and no one would have known that there were two new musicians in it unless they had been informed. In spite of the fact that it had been only recently assembled it never played with more beauty and balance of tone, more fire and finish. The symphony, the opening number, was superbly rendered, and was received with rapturous and long-continued applause. The charm of the two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer was well brought out, and admirable qualities were shown in the final number, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, with its jubilant beginning and its rushing coda, which stirred the audience to renewed applause. The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was marked by its dignity, technical perfection and beauty of utterance, and demonstrated that the great organization is even better before, and that its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, has it under the most perfect control.

The two arias which were sung by Pasquale Amato were splendidly given, and the artist was recalled again and again to bow his thanks to the delighted audience.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914

SYMPHONIC SKETCHES BY CHADWICK WELL LIKED.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in as excellent playing form at its first New York matinee yesterday afternoon as on Thursday night, when the series commenced. The clear, crisp weather was ideal for stringed instruments, and the result gave the violins a brilliance decidedly helpful to much of the music that was performed.

Carnegie Hall was filled with an audience thoroughly distinctive and discriminating in its bestowal of approbation. The second symphony of Brahms, which opened the programme, has all the seriousness and dignity appealing to so scholastic a conductor as Dr. Karl Muck. He brought to his interpretation just the qualities it demands and the musicians did their share no less creditably.

Considerable interest was shown in the performance of George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," a suite for orchestra made up of four movements originally composed to be performed separately, but which may be united as they were yesterday with musical propriety and effect. The titles of the movements, in the order of their presentation, are "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad."

As a whole, the suite, which is descriptive, has originality and charm. The various portions were given with abundance of contrast and were well liked by the audience. The concluding work was the Sibelius symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1914

FIRST VISIT OF THE BOSTONIANS

Est 1884

A Note on Musical Politics—No Chauvinism in Our Concert Rooms.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Had it not been for the circumstance that on his arrival from Europe Dr. Muck dropped the remark that he could not comprehend how a people as intelligent as the American could think Germany responsible for the war, it would probably not have occurred to anybody that there was any special significance in the fact that only German music—or, rather, music composed by men born within the borders of what is now the German Empire—had a place on the programme of the first concert of the Boston Orchestra this season. Beethoven and Brahms are surely representatives of the art universal. The tendencies of modern German thought, with its contempt for moral and æsthetic decencies, have some illustration in the music of Richard Strauss, but that music is necessary occasionally to satisfy the popular craving for things hot in the mouth. As for Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, that is all romantic idealism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry. Besides, the political reflections to which the names might have given rise ought not to have contained a tinge of German chauvinism. Beethoven, of Belgian extraction, writing music to glorify a heroic conception of Bonaparte as the champion of liberty; Brahms, the child of commercial Hamburg, whose mind was wholly engrossed with his art, and Weber, whose patriotism and love of liberty flamed up with Körner's so fiercely in "Lyre and Sword" that their passionate warmth is still felt by every republican soul. Moreover, the music was so superbly played that the mental reservations of even the most suspicious listener must have been dissipated like smoke in a gale.

In the second concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall there was not even the semblance of national prejudice. The German Brahms contributed his idyllic symphony in D, the American Chadwick his "Symphonic Sketches," with their Scotch-Irish melodic blood and characteristically American humor; the Finn Sibelius his overture, "Finlandia," brimming over with love for the valor and the gentle loveliness of Suomi. If there was any occasion for regret it was only in the minds of those patrons of the Boston concerts, who are also patrons of our local orchestras, who again had to deplore, as they did on Thursday and as they have done for years, that the visitors should have repeated compositions which were still ringing in the memory. The season is only a fortnight old, yet we had heard the Brahms symphony played by the Symphony Society's orchestra and Strauss's "Don Juan" played by the Philharmonic. There is no reason why our visitors should either challenge or invite comparisons between them and local players. They have a truer mission in extending our knowledge of the orchestral literature. There were none of the thrilling moments in yesterday's concert such as marked the performance of the "Heroic" symphony on Thursday, and even the stirring climax of Sibelius's overture was not without its fellow in local memories.

Beauty brooded on every measure of the symphony, and Mr. Chadwick's music (first brought forward here six years ago) was heard with interest and pleasure.

From STANDARD U
Address: Brooklyn,
Date

BOSTON SYM SEASON IS

Estab

Brahms' Second and Sibel "Finlandia" Splendidly Played at Academy.

NEUTRALITY IS PRESERVED.

Amato Twice Appears and Big Audience Enthuses.

Safe back in their adopted country after months of close contact with war's alarms, Boston's most famous band of musicians celebrated their complete attachment to ideals of peace by appearing last night in Brooklyn. For a scant two hours or less they played as only artists can play who offer up fervent thanks for deliverance from duty where the bullets fly. The occasion meant for Brooklyn the most substantial and showy audience of the season at the Academy of Music.

But one interpretation may be placed on the programme presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It surely must have been an attempt to emphasize neutrality. The German Brahms and Weber were balanced against the Frenchman Saint-Saens and the Finn Sibelius, and the balance was maintained by the inclusion of Handel, the German-born composer who loved England and lived there, and still further emphasized by the choice of soloist, the robust Italian Amato.

No other meaning could possibly have been intended to be conveyed. The programme progresed consistently to an anti-climax, and the evening of incomparable melodic tones was twice ruptured by the interpolation of Amato's booming baritone. The operatic star was in magnificent voice and his Saint-Saens aria aroused a riot of applause—but squarely on top of the Brahms symphony it came without sufficient preparation. On his second appearance the "big fellow" sang the familiar—even hackneyed—"Largo" from Handel's "Xerxes." His essay into the bel canto, while less inspiring of applause, was more musical than the "Henry VIII" racconto.

High spots of excellence there were—three that stood out even above the standard set and maintaiened by the Bostonians. The first of these was the scherzo of the Brahms Second Symphony. Its tripping measures were performed with grace, with delicacy—it was quite "allegretto grazioso," as the programme specified. Another moment of inspiration was the climax of the finale, gloriously done with a wealth of tone and volume. The third was the playing of the patriotic "Finlandia" of Sibelius. The Finnish composer was given generous recognition on last evening's programme, and the verdict was emphatic in his favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe," theatrical though always pleasant, made a tame finale after Brahms and Sibelius. Dr Kark Muck, seemingly as impassive and aloof as ever, led unobtrusively yet with every sign of absolute authority. He remained in the background while the Amato applause lasted, and strangely enough the audience was not particularly enthusiastic in the clapping it directed his way. The Bostonians, despite the few changes made in their ranks by the necessities of Mars, play with the same characteristics that won them fame of old—their chief excellence still lying in the one point that really counts the most—smoothness and purity of tone.

---

n AMERICAN ress: New York City
te NOV 8 - 19

Modern Music by Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck presented a programme of modern music at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was variety in the character of the music, for Brahm's Second Symphony was the opening number, which was followed by Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches and Sibelins's "Findlandic"—harmony from Austria, America and Finland.

The orchestra played with that splendid balance of tone and homogeniety that characterizes Dr. Muck's musicians. The men seemed to be inspired by the eloquence of the score. Each of the many beauties of the work was disclosed in a manner that illustrated symmetry and proportion of each phrase and of the superb climaxes. It was a performance of wonderful achievement and merit.

Chadwick's Four Sketches were pleasingly tuneful and cleverly harmonious, but their proportion sounded diminutive between [illegible] the Scandinavian

---

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 5 - 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SPLENDID FORM

Est

Beethoven's Third Symphony Feature of First Concert at Lyric.

Once called dangerously immoral, and since then heroic, Beethoven's third symphony, as well as two works by other composers, was played unusually well by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Lyric Theater last night. Pasquale Amato, barytone, of the Metropolitan Opera House, was the special soloist. The audience was large and apparently in receptive mood.

So receptive, indeed, had it been made by the truly great performance of the great symphony, such anticipation had been made the state of mind, that the vocal selections of Mr. Amato caused involuntary disappointment, which could not be disguised. The musical contrast was like going from electric to candle light. The audience recovered itself sufficiently to give him a measure of applause, however, which obviously was heartier in Mr. Amato's more familiar second—the Handel—number.

Magnificent, indeed, was the performance of the orchestra. The impression created was that the instrumental balance, spirit, interpretation and general technique formed a whole which it would be difficult to imagine could be improved materially in this world. It was not necessary to perception of this that the predominant mood of the concert should have been of the present historical period. Even with Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss and Jean Sibelius represented on the program, the supremacy of the Beethoven mood could not be dispelled.

Instrumental attacks, changed colorings, alternating lights and shades—all were done like magic, as if each one of the players was moved by an identical and infallible impulse. The playing was a musician's dream realized. So accurately had the orchestra absorbed its training that Dr. Muck used a minimum amount of baton conducting, ceasing physical gestures almost entirely in the third movement of the symphony.

Those who feel that Beethoven could do no wrong—there are some such—probably are shocked when they think that there was a time when the master's third symphony was held up as an awful example of "dangerous immorality." Evidently, this proves conclusively that "there were giants in those days"—giants of distorted intellect. Probably the last movement offended. It does foreshadow the essential musical spirit of today, it is true, in the orchestration and harmonies of certain passages. The chief general impression today, however, is of its length; and it is more than probable that it would have deeper and more general appreciation heard singly than in immediate connection with other works.

Strauss' highly-colored tone-poem, Don Juan, and Sibelius' passionately direct symphonic poem, Finlandia, were the other instrumental pieces played by the orchestra. It is to be hoped the day is not far off when an essentially American work will be as intensely "national" as the Sibelius' composition is said to be.

Amato would undoubtedly have been received with far greater enthusiasm had he chosen compositions more of a general display character. He showed good tone and control for the most part.

J. N. H.

IERALD
New York City
NOV 8 1914

MUCK'S MEN TRIUMPH AGAIN

884

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Another Delightful Concert.

There was no soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinée concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but the hall was crowded and the applause of the audience was without bounds after each orchestral number.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, did not confine his programme to German music, as he had done at Thursday's concert, but he divided it between German, American and Finnish composers. He began with Brahms' Second Symphony and aroused the admiration of his audience by the amazingly beautiful interpretation and faultless playing of the great symphony

---

At its [illegible] asked the orchestra to rise, while the audience thundered applause. It was a performance to remember.

Mr George Whitfield Chadwick, American composer, contributed an orchestral suite called "Symphonic Sketches," beginning with surging brilliancy and appropriately called "Jubilee." Then came the plaintive and lovely "Noel," followed by the merry and capricious scherzo, "Hobgoblin." It ended with "A Vagrom Ballad," the motto of which begins:—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum."

It has a sinister and dramatic ending, but is brilliantly scored.

Finally there was heard Mr. Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia." The familia rtone picture of Finnish national life and spirit was admirably played.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 7 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Estab

Its Concert in Brooklyn a Pronounced Success.

BRILLIANT AUDIENCE AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

A Programme of Great Interest—Brahm's Symphony in D Major Delightfully Rendered—Pasquale Amato Heard in Two Arias.

While ther have already been two or three musical events of first-class importance this season at the Academy of Music, it remained for the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make Brooklynites realize that the musical season had really begun. Five philharmonic concerts will be given by this matchless organization in Brooklyn this season, yesday vening's being the first.

Music lovers are particularly gratified at the fact that the war in Europe has not interfered with the concerts here of the Boston Orchestra, as there were grave doubts during the summer whether the musicians could be assembled. Thirty of them were in Europe on the Continent and part of them were of military age, and it was considered doubtful if they could be released from their obligations in order to return to America. Fortunately, however, only two of them are absent, Messrs. Grisez, the first clarinet, and Fisse Fosse, the third oboe, both of whom are in the French army. Their places were filled satisfoctorily by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin, and Mr. Stanislaus, first oboe of Sir Henry Wood's Queens Hall Orchestra, London.

The programme last night consisted of Brahms' delightful symphony in D Major, two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the "Swan of Tuonela" and the stirring "Finlandia;" and for the final number, Weber's "Euyanthe" Overture.

Pasquale Amato, who was the assisting artist, sang twice, his first number being an aria from Saint-Saen's opera, "Henry VIII., and his second number an air from the opera "Serse," by Handel.

The orchestra was in its finest form, and no one would have known that there were two new musicians in it unless they had been informed. In spite of the fact that it had been only recently assembled it never played with more beauty and balance of tone, more fire and finish. The symphony, the opening number, was superbly rendered, and was received with rapturous and long-continued applause. The charm of the two characteristic pieces by the Finnish composer was well brought out, and admirable qualities were shown in the final number, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, with its jubilant beginning and its rushing coda, which stirred the audience to renewed applause. The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was marked by its dignity, technical perfection and beauty of utterance, and demonstrated that the great organization is even better before, and that its conductor/ Dr. Karl Muck, has it under the most perfect control.

The two arias which were sung by Pasquale Amato were splendidly given, and the artist was recalled again and again to bow his thanks to the delighted audience.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1914

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fine Opening Programme Led by Karl Muck With Amato as Soloist.

It was a typical Boston Symphony audience which filled every seat of the concert hall of the Academy last night to welcome the return of this loved organisation, and it expressed its pleasure in characteristic Brooklyn fashion, without any special demonstration, but that it was highly pleased no one accustomed to these concerts could doubt.

The programme was as well arranged as any which Dr. Muck has given us, and it had more variety than this conductor commonly finds it necessary to employ. The opening was a Brahms Symphony, but the easiest and pleasantest to listen to of any in the list, the Second to wit, of which the third movement has much beauty, while the fourth makes a spirited and stirring climax. These merits were enhanced by a superb performance, which was not perhaps exceptional for the Boston Symphony, but would have been extraordinary from any other band. We have become so accustomed to the most delicate finish from our best orchestras in this country that we do not sufficiently realize how fortunate we are nor how high our standard is. There has just come expert testimony on this point from no less a musician than Lilli Lehmann, who writes of the period twenty-five years ago when Theodore Thomas had but recently set a standard of perfection here unknown elsewhere. Mme. Lehman says in her autobiography just issued:

> I noticed something in the tone of the orchestra that had never struck me elsewhere. What might it be? I gave myself up to the enchantment of it over and over again, until after much speculating I was able to explain the wonder to myself. The violins used their bows in unison, so that the eye and ear were soothed; the woodwinds, who suited their tone and sound color exactly on their entrance to the instruments that had preceded them, were not shrill or inharmonious as we are accustomed to hear them, but mingled with soft unobtrusiveness and melodiously in the volume of tone, without one preceiving where they or the other instruments came in or dropped out. That was the solution of the riddle and the spell which had charmed me. Why do nearly all instrumentalists suffer such an effect to escape them, and why are not the conductors alive to it?

The answer, so far as the Boston Symphony is concerned, is that its conductors have been growing more and more "alive" to this delicacy of effect ever since Thomas showed the world how it was to be attained, and that the good work he began has gone on until it can make even a Brahms symphony "melodious to the ear." But it is to be noted that, although Lehmann was writing in Berlin last year, she used the present tense in referring to the failure of such perfection.

But if the triumph of the orchestra last night lay in its fine treatment of the Symphony, the triumph of Dr. Muck lay in introducing an almost unknown composer, in two selections of such exquisite beauty that they are bound to hold a prominent place in orchestral programmes of the future. The composer is Sibelius, the Finn, who is perhaps best known here by his extremely difficult "Concerto" for violin, a work whose very intricacy distracts attention from its musical quality. No such charge lies against "The Swan of Tuonela," a section of one of his symphonic poems, or his "Finlandia," a complete symphonic poem after the Liszt model, which were played last night. The "Tuonela" has a heavenly air, played by the English horn, with a background sometimes on the kettle drum, sometimes in the strings and sometimes in the wood winds. It clothes itself in poetry and romance like a garment as it flows serenely on, an interlude of ideal beauty. The "Finlandia" is longer and more varied, but it is filled with melodies which have been so widely mistaken for Finnish folk songs that the composer has distinctly disclaimed borrowing any of the themes. They are at least good enough to be folksongs, than which there is no higher praise, and they are developed by a skillful use of all the resources of the modern orchestra.

If there was a mistake in the programme it was in closing with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," after this suberb Sibelius music. Good as the overture is in itself, it sounded thin after this more modern work.

The soloist of the evening was Amato, he of the red-blooded voice, who makes the opera house ring with applause by his singing of the explosive music of the modern Italian school. It was a chastened and highly polished, almost a classic, Amato who sang last night, with all the explosiveness left behind, with a lovely legato and sustained tones as firm as the towers of Brooklyn Bridge. His first selection was an aria from Saint Saens' "Henry VIII," in which the singer skillfully combined passion with elegance. For his last number he did a service by reminding the audience that the air familiarly known as "Handel's Largo," and played by strings both solo and ensemble, was originally written for the voice in his opera, "Xerxes." Amato's singing of it was all that the flowing melody called for. The singer who can jump from Puccini to Handel and sing one of the latter's arias without a flaw is indeed distinguished.

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

NO PREJUDICE AGAINST MUSIC.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city Thursday evening proved conclusively that German music will not suffer through any feeling there may be in this cosmopolitan country against Germany. Probably there is no such feeling so far as any of the products of German art are concerned, and the matter would scarcely justify comment if so many poets and artists of the nations at war had not been loudly proclaiming their renunciation of the art of their enemies. Their mood will not last. Empires are temporary, art is permanent.

The militarism of BEETHOVEN'S Eroica symphony may have been inspired by the victories of NAPOLEON, though the composer's admiration for the Corsican vanished after he made himself Emperor. But BEETHOVEN'S music is German music, one of Germany's greatest glories, and the tribute to the military spirit in this composition is far beyond the powers of expression of a BERNHARDI. Performed under the leadership of a German musician by an orchestra of diverse nationalities this noble work had its usual effect upon an audience of typical Americans, descended from the various peoples of Europe. The same is true of the works of HAYDN and WEBER, RICHARD STRAUSS and BRAHMS. The aesthetic did not come in conflict with the political. Dr. MUCK made no error in arranging his programme.

From PRESS
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST MATINEE

Mighty Gathering of Admirers Greets Muck's Orchestra.

At its first matinee of the season yesterday, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave another inspiring exhibition of its powers before a mighty gathering of admirers, who showed quite as much enthusiasm as those who attended the first concert, last Thursday.

The programme chosen for the occasion was distinctly inferior, it is true, to the one offered to the evening subscribers. Whether with good reason or not, the opinion still prevails that Saturday afternoon listeners must be regaled with less substantial fare than the men and women who attend concerts at night.

But Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, which opened the performance, made an impression that the following selections could not brush away.

Despite the sudden swoop from so noble and beautiful a work to the pretty trivialities of Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, made so apparent, alas, by proximity; despite the fact that Sibelius's patriotic symphonic poem "Finlandia," which brought the afternoon to a close, did not re-establish the high standard set at the beginning, the auditor went home thankful to Dr. Muck and his musicians for their message of one great composer's genius.

A performance of Brahms's second symphony that brought out so movingly the refreshing melody of the first movement, the tender meditativeness of the adagio, the grace and charm of the allegretto and the contagious joy of the final allegro it is hard to recall.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City NOV 5 1914

Date

Coincident with the news that the war will not interfere with the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra comes the information that Mr. M. A. DeWolfe Howe has completed his historical sketch of the orchestra. It will be published in November. Among the illustrations will be a portrait of Col. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, who will celebrate his eightieth birthday about the time that the book is published.

York, 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Afternoon Concert Devoted to Three Composers.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to three composers—Brahms, George W. Chadwick, and Jean Sibelius. Brahms's Second Symphony was given for the second time here in a fortnight. Dr. Muck's performance of it showed all the sympathy with the music that he has so often shown before. It was most minutely studied, and the performance a complete setting forth of Dr. Muck's conception of it. Again there was to be observed the exquisite tonal balance and the careful consideration of values that are needed to show the reserved beauty of Brahms's orchestration, and especially to show its exact fitness for the expression of his ideas. How strong and potent the appeal now made by the adagio, that once seemed crabbed and dry, or by the fiery finale, that also had its inscrutable passages! The audience was enraptured with the music and its performance, and recalled Dr. Muck until he made the players rise to bow with him.

Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" have been heard in New York before. They are of unequal value, but at their best they show the American composer in music that may well be considered to have an American character, robustness and vigor, humor, gayety. Few native composers have had so great a technical ability in orchestral writing as Mr. Chadwick, and it enables him to be effective in simplicity; to deal in straightforward melodic ideas without fear or shame. There is no striving after profundity in these sketches, and the music is to be appreciated in the vein in which it is written, in which sometimes a rollicking gayety appears, as in the first movement, "Jubilee," and the last, "A Vagrant Ballad," with its burlesque suggestion, conveyed in its thoroughly disreputable motto. There is a quotation here, played on the xylophone, of the subject of Bach's G minor organ fugue; whether or not it has ever been authoritatively explained, the allusion is a little elliptical to the uninformed listener.

The second theme of the "Jubilee" movement suggests Dvorak's treatment of the negro music. The composer has a little difficulty in "letting go" in this movement, which is continued unduly after all is said that the composer had to say. The "Noel" is written in a sonorous and effective orchestral diction, but its substance has somewhat less of distinction than the other movements. The work is one that eminently deserved a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Jean Sibelius was represented on the programme by his symphonic poem, "Finlandia," which was heard in New York as long ago as 1905.

From GLOBE
Address: New York City

Date NOV 6 - 1914

Music.

Dr. Muck Leads Belgian and German Music.

1884

The world may give thanks unto God that the grandfather of Ludwig van Beethoven left the neighborhood of Louvain before the German army got there. As a result of that ancestral precaution the greatest of Belgian composers was born in the security that German soil gives from German invasion, at Bonn. His "Eroica" symphony, written some insist to pay homage to Napoleon Bonaparte, headed the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening, which consisted otherwise of music by German composers—Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

In view of the plain facts, it is unfair to accuse Dr. Muck, as some were heard doing, of arrogantly opening the New York season of the Boston band with a Pan-German programme. To lead off with the greatest Belgian composer's tribute to the greatest genius France has given the world is not an act of overt Prussian partisanship. Moreover, the performance of the "Eroica" symphony was simply superb. After an interval no longer than a few brief months the return of the Boston orchestra infallibly repeats its shock of vitalized perfection. A few years ago Dr. Muck once let his men play through at Carnegie Hall the scherzo of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony while he stood before them motionless, his right hand at his side. Yesterday he did the same thing in the "Eroica" scherzo, save for the ticklish pages of the trio. The orchestra repaid his confidence by a performance of unwavering precision.

No less admirable was the playing in the rest of the concert. The Brahms variations were done magnificently, with a wealth of shading that ranged from the lightest orchestral whisper to a resounding fortissimo, and revelled in voluptuous matings of the several choirs. Strauss's "Don Juan" went a rake-helly pace to damnation along a path even Andalusia never [illegible] that had preceded, the Weber overture—where would conductors be without a Weber overture?—was not an anticlimax. It is approaching its hundredth anniversary, but it was made to sound as fresh as if it had been written yesterday. The audience, which filled the hall, gave the applause that it was not in human fibre to withhold.

---

PITTS SANBORN.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: NOV 6 New York City 1914

Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When Dr. Muck opened the orchestral concert season in Boston a few weeks ago, there was a good deal of comment on the fact that he aggressively presented an all-German programme. Last night, in Carnegie Hall, he conducted the same programme. The objection to it was, however, not that it was all-German, but that not all of it was good German music. Brahms's "Variations on a Haydn Theme" are about as dull and uninspired a specimen of hackwork as could be found, and the fine performance given of it could not redeem it. It was amusing to observe that nearly every one in the audience, during the performance of this piece, took to reading Philip Hale's articles in the programme book, which certainly were far more interesting than the Variations.

There was another piece on the programme which did not represent German music, or its composer, at their best—Strauss's "Don Juan." It is needless to say that Dr. Muck and his men played it with wonderful virtuosity; but even in the second largest city in the world three performances within one week of such a "Machwerk" are more than it deserves.

A timely addition to the programme was the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, a piece in which the spirit of German romanticism in music achieves one of its most enrapturing triumphs. Those who heard it last night will look forward the more eagerly to the promised revival at the Metropolitan of this Weber opera, in which are to be found the very roots of Wagnerism.

The symphony of the occasion was Beethoven's "Eroica," which opened the concert. Dr. Muck, who, when he first appeared, was received with the most enthusiastic applause, made his men play it with so much technical finish, precision, and delicate shading that at the end the applause persisted till all the players had risen to bow their acknowledgements. It cannot be said, however, that the emotional contents of this work were fully revealed, especially in the funeral march, the poignant dissonances of which were not sufficiently accented, while the overwhelming climax which Mahler, in particular, knew how to build up, was missed. The other movements were more satisfactory; in the scherzo Dr. Muck had so much confidence in the technique of his players that he allowed them to do it without any guidance from his bâton. To-night the Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn and to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where the programme will include the second Brahms symphony, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and the "Finlandia" tone-poem of Sibelius.

It is probably owing to the sublime funeral march in the "Eroica" that nearly all the orchestras of Germany seem to have opened their season with it, as Dr. Muck did that of the Boston Orchestra in two cities. It is well known that Beethoven had dedicated this work to Napoleon, but revoked this homage angrily when he discovered his ambitions. "Now he'll trample on all the rights of men to serve his own ambition!" he exclaimed. Would he have dedicated this work to any ruler of our day?

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1914

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fine Opening Programme Led by Karl Muck With Amato as Soloist.

It was a typical Boston Symphony audience which filled every seat of the concert hall of the Academy last night to welcome the return of this loved organization, and it expressed its pleasure in characteristic Brooklyn fashion, without any special demonstration, but that it was highly pleased no one accustomed to these concerts could doubt.

The programme was as well arranged as any which Dr. Muck has given us, and it had more variety than this conductor commonly finds it necessary to employ. The opening was a Brahms Symphony, but the easiest and pleasantest to listen to of any in the list, the Second to wit, of which the third movement has much beauty, while the fourth makes a spirited and stirring climax. These merits were enhanced by a superb performance, which was not perhaps exceptional for the Boston Symphony, but would have been extraordinary from any other band. We have become so accustomed to the most delicate finish from our best orchestras in this country that we do not sufficiently realize how fortunate we are nor how high our standard is. There has just come expert testimony on this point from no less a musician than Lilli Lehmann, who writes of the period twenty-five years ago when Theodore Thomas had but recently set a standard of perfection here unknown elsewhere. Mme. Lehman says in her autobiography just issued:

> I noticed something in the tone of the orchestra that had never struck me elsewhere. What might it be? I gave myself up to the enchantment of it over and over again, until after much speculating I was able to explain the wonder to myself. The violins used their bows in unison, so that the eye and ear were soothed; the woodwinds, who suited their tone and sound color exactly on their entrance to the instruments that had preceded them, were not shrill or inharmonious as we are accustomed to hear them, but mingled with soft unobtrusiveness and melodiously in the volume of tone, without one preceiving where they or the other instruments came in or dropped out. That was the solution of the riddle and the spell which had charmed me. Why do nearly all instrumentalists suffer such an effect to escape them, and why are not the conductors alive to it?

The answer, so far as the Boston Symphony is concerned, is that its conductors have been growing more and more "alive" to this delicacy of effect ever since Thomas showed the world how it was to be attained, and that the good work he began has gone on until it can make even a Brahms symphony "melodious to the ear." But it is to be noted that, although Lehmann was writing in Berlin last year, she used the present tense in referring to the failure of such perfection.

But if the triumph of the orchestra last night lay in its fine treatment of the Symphony, the triumph of Dr. Muck lay in introducing an almost unknown composer, in two selections of such exquisite beauty that they are bound to hold a prominent place in orchestral programmes of the future. The composer is Sibelius, the Finn, who is perhaps best known here by his extremely difficult "Concerto" for violin, a work whose very intricacy distracts attention from its musical quality. No such charge lies against "The Swan of Tuonela," a section of one of his symphonic poems, or his "Finlandia," a complete symphonic poem after the Liszt model, which were played last night. The "Tuonela" has a heavenly air, played by the English horn, with a background sometimes on the kettle drum, sometimes in the strings and sometimes in the wood winds. It clothes itself in poetry and romance like a garment as it flows serenely on, an interlude of ideal beauty. The "Finlandia" is longer and more varied, but it is filled with melodies which have been so widely mistaken for Finnish folk songs that the composer has distinctly disclaimed borrowing any of the themes. They are at least good enough to be folksongs, than which there is no higher praise, and they are developed by a skillful use of all the resources of the modern orchestra.

If there was a mistake in the programme it was in closing with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," after this suberb Sibelius music. Good as the overture is in itself, it sounded thin after this more modern work.

The soloist of the evening was Amato, he of the red-blooded voice, who makes the opera house ring with applause by his singing of the explosive music of the modern Italian school. It was a chastened and highly polished, almost a classic, Amato who sang last night, with all the explosiveness left behind, with a lovely legato and sustained tones as firm as the towers of Brooklyn Bridge. His first selection was an aria from Saint Saens' "Henry VIII," in which the singer skillfully combined passion with elegance. For his last number he did a service by reminding the audience that the air familiarly known as "Handel's Largo," and played by strings both solo and ensemble, was originally written for the voice in his opera, "Xerxes." Amato's singing of it was all that the flowing melody called for. The singer who can jump from Puccini to Handel and sing one of the latter's arias without a flaw is indeed distinguished.

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

NO PREJUDICE AGAINST MUSIC.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city Thursday evening proved conclusively that German music will not suffer through any feeling there may be in this cosmopolitan country against Germany. Probably there is no such feeling so far as any of the products of German art are concerned, and the matter would scarcely justify comment if so many poets and artists of the nations at war had not been loudly proclaiming their renunciation of the art of their enemies. Their mood will not last. Empires are temporary, art is permanent.

The militarism of BEETHOVEN'S Eroica symphony may have been inspired by the victories of NAPOLEON, though the composer's admiration for the Corsican vanished after he made himself Emperor. But BEETHOVEN'S music is German music, one of Germany's greatest glories, and the tribute to the military spirit in this composition is far beyond the powers of expression of a BERNHARDI. Performed under the leadership of a German musician by an orchestra of diverse nationalities this noble work had its usual effect upon an audience of typical Americans, descended from the various peoples of Europe. The same is true of the works of HAYDN and WEBER, RICHARD STRAUSS and BRAHMS. The aesthetic did not come in conflict with the political. DR. MUCK made no error in arranging his programme.

From PRESS
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST MATINEE

Mighty Gathering of Admirers Greets Muck's Orchestra.

At its first matinee of the season yesterday, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave another inspiring exhibition of its powers before a mighty gathering of admirers, who showed quite as much enthusiasm as those who attended the first concert, last Thursday.

The programme chosen for the occasion was distinctly inferior, it is true, to the one offered to the evening subscribers. Whether with good reason or not, the opinion still prevails that Saturday afternoon listeners must be regaled with less substantial fare than the men and women who attend concerts at night.

But Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, which opened the performance, made an impression that the following selections could not brush away.

Despite the sudden swoop from so noble and beautiful a work to the pretty trivialities of Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches, made so apparent, alas, by proximity; despite the fact that Sibelius's patriotic symphonic poem "Finlandia," which brought the afternoon to a close, did not re-establish the high standard set at the beginning, the auditor went home thankful to Dr. Muck and his musicians for their message of one great composer's genius.

A performance of Brahms's second symphony that brought out so movingly the refreshing melody of the first movement, the tender meditativeness of the adagio, the grace and charm of the allegretto and the contagious joy of the final allegro it is hard to recall.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City NOV 5 1914

Date

Coincident with the news that the war will not interfere with the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra comes the information that Mr. M. A. DeWolfe Howe has completed his historical sketch orchestra. It will be published in er. Among the illustrations will rait of Col. Henry Lee Higgin- er of the orchestra, who will eightieth birthday about the he book is published.

York, 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Afternoon Concert Devoted to Three Composers.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to three composers—Brahms, George W. Chadwick, and Jean Sibelius. Brahms's Second Symphony was given for the second time here in a fortnight. Dr. Muck's performance of it showed all the sympathy with the music that he has so often shown before. It was most minutely studied, and the performance a complete setting forth of Dr. Muck's conception of it. Again there was to be observed the exquisite tonal balance and the careful consideration of values that are needed to show the reserved beauty of Brahms's orchestration, and especially to show its exact fitness for the expression of his ideas. How strong and potent the appeal now made by the adagio, that once seemed crabbed and dry, or by the fiery finale, that also had its inscrutable passages! The audience was enraptured with the music and its performance, and recalled Dr. Muck until he made the players rise to bow with him.

Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" have been heard in New York before. They are of unequal value, but at their best they show the American composer in music that may well be considered to have an American character, robustness and vigor, humor, gayety. Few native composers have had so great a technical ability in orchestral writing as Mr. Chadwick, and it enables him to be effective in simplicity; to deal in straightforward melodic ideas without fear or shame. There is no striving after profundity in these sketches, and the music is to be appreciated in the vein in which it is written, in which sometimes a rollicking gayety appears, as in the first movement, "Jubilee," and the last, "A Vagrant Ballad," with its burlesque suggestion, conveyed in its thoroughly disreputable motto. There is a quotation here, played on the xylophone, of the subject of Bach's G minor organ fugue; whether or not it has ever been authoritatively explained, the allusion is a little elliptical to the uninformed listener.

The second theme of the "Jubilee" movement suggests Dvorak's treatment of the negro music. The composer has a little difficulty in "letting go" in this movement, which is continued unduly after all is said that the composer had to say. The "Noel" is written in a sonorous and effective orchestral diction, but its substance has somewhat less of distinction than the other movements. The work is one that eminently deserved a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Jean Sibelius was represented on the programme by his symphonic poem, "Finlandia," which was heard in New York as long ago as 1905.

GLOBE
ss: New York City

Date NOV 6 - 1914

Music.

Dr. Muck Leads Belgian and German Music.

The world may give thanks unto God that the grandfather of Ludwig van Beethoven left the neighborhood of Louvain before the German army got there. As a result of that ancestral precaution the greatest of Belgian composers was born in the security that German soil gives from German invasion, at Bonn. His "Eroica" symphony, written some in sist to pay homage to Napoleon Bonaparte, headed the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening, which consisted otherwise of music by German composers—Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

In view of the plain facts, it is unfair to accuse Dr. Muck, as some were heard doing, of arrogantly opening the New York season of the Boston band with a Pan-German programme. To lead off with the greatest Belgian composer's tribute to the greatest genius France has given the world is not an act of overt Prussian partisanship. Moreover, the performance of the "Eroica" symphony was simply superb. After an interval no longer than a few brief months the return of the Boston orchestra infallibly repeats its shock of vitalized perfection. A few years ago Dr. Muck once let his men play through at Carnegie Hall the scherzo of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony while he stood before them motionless, his right hand at his side. Yesterday he did the same thing in the "Eroica" scherzo, save for the ticklish pages of the trio. The orchestra repaid his confidence by a performance of unwavering precision.

No less admirable was the playing in the rest of the concert. The Brahms variations were done magnificently, with a wealth of shading that ranged from the lightest orchestral whisper to a resounding fortissimo, and revelled in voluptuous matings of the several choirs. Strauss's "Don Juan" went a rakehelly pace to damnation along a path even Andalusia never [illegible] that had preceded, the Weber overture—where would conductors be without a Weber overture?—was not an anticlimax. It is approaching its hundredth anniversary, but it was made to sound as fresh as if it had been written yesterday. The audience, which filled the hall, gave the applause that it was not in human fibre to withhold.

---

PITTS SANBORN.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVENING POST s: NOV New York City

Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When Dr. Muck opened the orchestral concert season in Boston a few weeks ago, there was a good deal of comment on the fact that he aggressively presented an all-German programme. Last night, in Carnegie Hall, he conducted the same programme. The objection to it was, however, not that it was all-German, but that not all of it was good German music. Brahms's "Variations on a Haydn Theme" are about as dull and uninspired a specimen of hackwork as could be found, and the fine performance given of it could not redeem it. It was amusing to observe that nearly every one in the audience, during the performance of this piece, took to reading Philip Hale's articles in the programme book, which certainly were far more interesting than the Variations.

There was another piece on the programme which did not represent German music, or its composer, at their best—Strauss's "Don Juan." It is needless to say that Dr. Muck and his men played it with wonderful virtuosity; but even in the second largest city in the world three performances within one week of such a "Machwerk" are more than it deserves.

A timely addition to the programme was the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, a piece in which the spirit of German romanticism in music achieves one of its most enrapturing triumphs. Those who heard it last night will look forward the more eagerly to the promised revival at the Metropolitan of this Weber opera, in which are to be found the very roots of Wagnerism.

The symphony of the occasion was Beethoven's "Eroica," which opened th concert. Dr. Muck, who, when he fir appeared, was received with the most e thusiastic applause, made his men play with so much technical finish, precisi and delicate shading that at the end applause persisted till all the players risen to bow their acknowledgements. cannot be said, however, that the e tional contents of this work were f revealed, especially in the funeral mar the poignant dissonances of which w not sufficiently accented, while the ov whelming climax which Mahler, in p ticular, knew how to build up, was miss The other movements were more sat factory; in the scherzo Dr. Muck had much confidence in the technique of h players that he allowed them to do it without any guidance from his bâton. To-night the Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn and to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where the programme will include the second Brahms symphony, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and the "Finlandia" tone-poem of Sibelius.

It is probably owing to the sublime funeral march in the "Eroica" that nearly all the orchestras of Germany seem to have opened their season with it, as Dr. Muck did that of the Boston Orchestra in two cities. It is well known that Beethoven had dedicated this work to Napoleon, but revoked this homage angrily when he discovered his ambitions. "Now he'll trample on all the rights of men to serve his own ambition!" he exclaimed. Would he have dedicated this work to any ruler of our day?

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 6 - 1914
Date

Estab 84

ELSON'S LECTURE RECITAL.

Boston Orchestra's Programme for Philosophical Concert Explained.

With an interesting analysis of each number, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening in the first Philharmonic concert of the season, was explained in a lecture recital last evening by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, assisted by Alfred De Voto at the piano.

The major part of the programme was of course devoted to the symphony, Brahms' second symphony in D major. Mr. Elson explained the themes threading each movement, playing portions himself on the piano, and these themes were later elaborated by Mr. De Voto. Especially fine was his playing of the second, the adagio movement, which Mr. Elson described as a notable example of the tender serenity of Brahms, a quality that helps to make him one of the great composers of the world. This was followed by the scherzo movement, decidedly Hungarian in character, bright and piquant, the lecturer called it, a rondo on two themes. Mr. Elson discussed particularly the second theme as being full of bold syncopations, and this lead him to define syncopation, which, "if pushed too far, becomes rag-time." "I can't say I am entirely opposed to rag-time," he remarked, humorously, "and I could even point out to you a few specimens of rag-time in Beethoven." A certain form of syncopation, known as the "Scotch Snap," is to be found in the finale. "This symphony is logical music," said Mr. Elson. "It grows from a fe melodic thoughts to a perfect harvest musical ideas."

The two arias which are to be su this evening by Pasquale Amato we then touched upon. In referring to first, the Henry VIII. love song Saint-Saens, Mr. Elson defined recitati in music as "declamation in tone." stead of being regarded as rather t some, its ingenious modulations worth following. The second aria the programme, the "Ombra Mai-f from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," gi the familiar "Largo" melody, which Elson said is a splendid test of a sing voice, all pure bell' canto, as the Itali call it.

The third number was the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber, whom the turer described as the most theatrica of all composers, since he was brought up by the footlights. The plot of the opera was briefly told and the various themes, taken from the melodies in the opera were illustrated, ending in the triumphant coda which pictures the reuniting of the lovers.

In conclusion Mr. Elson discussed two tone pictures by Sibelius, the foremost of Finnish composers. The first, "The Swan of Tuonela," a legend from the Finnish Folp-epic, "Kalevala," was played in its entirety by Mr. De Voto. and "Finlandia," a symphonic poem for orchestra, was illustrated in its various themes which have the spirit of the national folk songs and are full of a sad nobility.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
NOV 6 - 1914
Date

Establis 84

Boston Orchestra Warmly Greeted At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was warmly greeted by a crowded house of music lovers, in which people of fashion were a large part. Twice before the programme was finished he called upon his players to rise in acknowledgment of the applause. At the end there was another tribute to himself that was worth while for him to receive: The Boston Orchestra had proved again its right to a high place under the sun.

An "inspired" anonymous writer recently protested that the New York music critics, of whom he held me to be the chief offender, had unduly exalted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the detriment of our own symphony organizations, and to the discouragement of local musical endeavor. Strange combination of ignorance and maliciousness! New York always has insisted upon getting the best that it knew in music, and when, through the fostering care and munificence of Major Higginson, Boston was able to maintain the best orchestra in America—perhaps the best in the world—it was the duty of New York writers about music to call the attention of New York music lovers to the fact. If our efforts have reinto houses with the "Standing Room Only" sign confronting would-be purchasers of tickets, I for one am not ashamed.

That conditions have improved in New York is true. Thanks to the bequest of $1,000,000 from Mr. Pulitzer and to the genius and training capacity of Mr. Stransky. The Philharmonic Society's orchestra is become one to challenge comparison with the best. Thanks, too, to the financial support of Mr. Harry Harkness Flagler, and the indefatiguable industry of Walter Damrosch the Symphony Society's orchestra is one of which New York well may be proud. But it is no discredit to either of these organizations that some of us continue to take off our hats to the Boston Orchestra. Beside the orchestra from the Hub is become part of us. Few of its New York patrons stop to think that its base is at the foot of Bunker Hill instead of in Carnegie Hall. If annual concerts in New York should be abandoned it would be a calamity for our local music world.

Dr. Muck's programme last night consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's "Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn," Richard Strauss's war poem "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The presentation of it was masterful. The delivery of the symphony was incisive to the verge of irritation. One almost longed for something disturbing to happen. The Strauss work became imbued with new beauty by reason of the perfection of its exposition. It was a relief to have Weber's ingratiating overture for the finish.

Newspap

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date NOV 6 1914

Established

ARTISTIC CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Famous Orchestra on First Visit of Season Presents All-German Programme — Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Originally Dedicated to Napoleon, the Climax.

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid us their first visit of the season last evening, presenting an all-German programme at Carnegie Hall.

Many puerilities have recently been spoken and written concerning neutrality and partisanship in the field of music. The English gained some notoriety by boycotting German music in their concert halls. The Germans, never having paid any serious attention to English music, had no means of direct vengeance. In France even the good old Camille Saint-Saens is reported to have said some foolish things about German composers.

In this supposedly neutral country it is ridiculous to accuse a conductor of Dr. Muck's standing of prejudice in the selection of a programme. Since the Germans hold undisputed supremacy in orchestral music, there is no reason why an entire programme should not be made up of their compositions. Certainly the names of Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms, Strauss and Weber are of more than local significance.

Beethoven's Eroica symphony was Dr. Muck's big number last evening. The great German erased the name of Napoleon from the title-page of his score after the great Frenchman had lost his halo by accepting the emperor's crown.

Marvelous Effects Produced.

Those who insist upon dragging the martial spirit into all the events of their daily life may apply yesterday's presentation of the symphony to any up-to-date hero of the European disgrace whose character has been sufficiently disappointing.

When an orchestra plays as we are accustomed to hear the Bostonians play, critical comment runs too easily into superlatives to be of much interest or value. Dr. Muck still has under his baton what is probably the most highly trained company of musicians in the world. And the leader himself still retains his marvelous ability to bring out the minutest details of structure as well as of expression in an orchestral composition.

Admiration of his results almost gives way to astonishment at the simplicit of his methods. Dr. Muck unquestionably gets along with fewer and smalle gestures than any other conductor nov before the public. At one time last evening he worked up a climax with bot hands at his sides, merely indicatin the rhythm with an occasional nod o the head.

Aside from the Beethoven symphony the programme included the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, always a effective medium for the display of orchestral virtuosity; Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a, and Weber's Euryanthe Overture.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 5 - 1914
Date

Established:

THRONG FILLS LYRIC TO GREET BOSTON ORCHEST

Standing-room-only conditions prevailed at the Lyric last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pasquale Amato, the celebrated Italian barytone, as soloist, gave its first Baltimore concert of the season.

The audience was the largest that has assembled for a musical event this year, and, as always happens when the Boston orchestra is here, it was exceedingly fashionable. There was not a seat left in either auditorium or boxes, and the house, with its handsomely gowned and bejeweled women, presented a beautiful and inspiring sight.

Dr. Karl Muck, who succeeded in getting back to America from Europe only a short time ago, was given a rousing reception when he stepped to the director's stand to commence the opening number. The prolonged applause seemed like an attempt to show Baltimore's appreciation of the fact that the orchestra had surmounted the many difficulties produced by the European war, difficulties so portentous that for a time the welfare of the organization was at least apparently in jeopardy.

Amato Talks Of War.

"I do not believe that Italy is going to get into the war," Mr. Amato said in his dressing-room after his first number. "When I left there a few weeks ago I had seen nothing to indicate that my countrymen were anxious to rush into the conflict. Conditions are serious enough for them now, and they will be wise to keep out of the carnage.

"Never before has America loomed so great, so big, in the eyes of the world as at present. It stands like a gigantic sheltering refuge for the people of all countries.

"What is being done now in Europe cannot be undone in centuries. It is shocking to think of every phase of it. Particularly is it difficult to reconcile one's thoughts to the terrible slaughter of young men. Who knows how much genius that might have enlightened the world has already been lost?"

Mr. Amato spoke in a pleasantly reminiscent way of his appearances at the Lyric with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company five years ago, especially of the night when he sang "Giaconda," with Caruso and Destinn, when President Taft and his party occupied a box.

To Leave Operatic Stage.

Although Amato's fame rests chiefly upon his work in grand opera, he said that he is very anxious to get into the lieder singer's field, and that he intends eventually to break away from the operatic stage.

In speaking of the musical artists engaged in active warfare, he declared that it was his opinion the Governments they represent will not permit them to be exposed to undue danger. "The report that Vanni Marcoux had been killed," he added, "was erroneous. Madame Marcoux has officially denied it."

omposer himself, which the as fortunate enough to ha ummer in London.

This composition is thorough esentative of Strauss' most nd best-balanced period, midw ween a certain vagueness in work and an elaborate dege o frequently in evidence latte

The soloist of the evening famous barytone Pasquale His two numbers—an aria from Saens' "Henry VIII" and the ai ra Mai Fie," from Handel's "Serse," now too familiarly kn Handel's "Largo"—are both in character and not difficult ution, but Signor Amato cou be said to have made a great sion in either of these numbe undoubtedly has a virile and tive personality, but such qu when not enhanced by stage ries, do not make the same app in opera. Candidly speaking, hi per se did not last night strike at all phenomenal in its quali much of his success must be uted to his personality and dr sympathy.

The concert closed with Si "Finlandia," a symphonic poe orchestra, a short compositi broad and easily intelligible line charming through its peculiarly vidual coloring.

H.

CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

Dr. Muck In Splendid Form And Gives An Ideal Rendition Of Beethoven's Symphony.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, proved to be one of an unusually high order, even for this eclectic organization.

Dr. Muck himself was in splendid form, and gave the most ideal reading of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" we can ever recall having heard, such a contrast in every respect to the peculiarly unsympathetic way in which he treated the same composer's C minor symphony last year.

In the "Eroica Symphony" Beethoven undoubtedly broke more new ground in a single work than has ever been done before or since in orchestral literature. Its first movement is still the most stupendous, both in form and material, in existence, while the "Funeral March," by which it is followed, is the first great emotional and poetic expression of musical thought to be found in the slow movement of a symphony.

It was here, above all, that Dr. Muck so particularly distinguished himself, revealing in every detail its most subtle pathos. Not even Dr. Muck, however, at his best, can reconcile us to the finale of this work, so unheroic in character, and destroying, as it does, any unified idea of this as an essentially "program" symphony, which its title suggests.

Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," was another great attraction in the program, and it was very interesting to compare Dr. Muck's conception of the work with that of the

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
6 1914
Date

Estab 34

ELSON'S LECTURE RECITAL.

Boston Orchestra's Programme for Philosophical Concert Explained.

With an interesting analysis of each number, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening in the first Philharmonic concert of the season, was explained in a lecture recital last evening, by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, assisted by Alfred De Voto at the piano.

The major part of the programme was of course devoted to the symphony, Brahms' second symphony in D major. Mr. Elson explained the themes threading each movement, playing portions himself on the piano, and these themes were later elaborated by Mr. De Voto. Especially fine was his playing of the second, the adagio movement, which Mr. Elson described as a notable example of the tender serenity of Brahms, a quality that helps to make him one of the great composers of the world. This was followed by the scherzo movement, decidedly Hungarian in character, bright and piquant, the lecturer called it, a rondo on two themes. Mr. Elson discussed particularly the second theme as being full of bold syncopations, and this lead him to define syncopation, which, "if pushed too far, becomes rag-time." "I can't say I am entirely opposed to rag-time," he remarked, humorously, "and I could even point out to you a few specimens of rag-time in Beethoven." A certain form of syncopation, known as the "Scotch Snap," is to be found in the finale. "This symphony is logical music," said Mr. Elson. "It grows from a few melodic thoughts to a perfect harvest of musical ideas."

The two arias which are to be sung this evening by Pasquale Amato were then touched upon. In referring to the first, the Henry VIII. love song by Saint-Saens, Mr. Elson defined recitative in music as "declamation in tone." Instead of being regarded as rather tiresome, its ingenious modulations are worth following. The second aria on the programme, the "Ombra Mai-fu" from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," gives the familiar "Largo" melody, which Mr. Elson said is a splendid test of a singer's voice, all pure bell' canto, as the Italians call it.

The third number was the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, whom the lecturer described as the most theatrical of all composers, since he was brought up by the footlights. The plot of the opera was briefly told and the various themes, taken from the melodies in the opera were illustrated, ending in the triumphant coda which pictures the reuniting of the lovers.

In conclusion Mr. Elson discussed two tone pictures by Sibelius, the foremost of Finnish composers. The first, "The Swan of Tuonela," a legend from the Finnish Folp-epic, "Kalevala," was played in its entirety by Mr. De Voto, and "Finlandia," a symphonic poem for orchestra, was illustrated in its various themes which have the spirit of the national folk songs and are full of a sad nobility.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
NOV 6 - 1914
Date

Establi 34

Boston Orchestra Warmly Greeted At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was warmly greeted by a crowded house of music lovers, in which people of fashion were a large part. Twice before the programme was finished he called upon his players to rise in acknowledgment of the applause. At the end there was another tribute to himself that was worth while for him to receive: The Boston Orchestra had proved again its right to a high place under the sun.

An "inspired" anonymous writer recently protested that the New York music critics, of whom he held me to be the chief offender, had unduly exalted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the detriment of our own symphony organizations, and to the discouragement of local musical endeavor. Strange combination of ignorance and maliciousness! New York always has insisted upon getting the best that it knew in music, and when, through the fostering care and munificence of Major Higginson, Boston was able to maintain the best orchestra in America—perhaps the best in the world—it was the duty of New York writers about music to call the attention of New York music lovers to the fact. If our efforts have reinto houses with the "Standing Room Only" sign confronting would-be purchasers of tickets, I for one am not ashamed.

That conditions have improved in New York is true. Thanks to the bequest of $1,000,000 from Mr. Pulitzer and to the genius and training capacity of Mr. Stransky. The Philharmonic Society's orchestra is become one to challenge comparison with the best. Thanks, too, to the financial support of Mr. Harry Harkness Flagler, and the indefatiguable industry of Walter Damrosch the Symphony Society's orchestra is one of which New York well may be proud. But it is no discredit to either of these organizations that some of us continue to take off our hats to the Boston Orchestra. Beside the orchestra from the Hub is become part of us. Few of its New York patrons stop to think that its base is at the foot of Bunker Hill instead of in Carnegie Hall. If annual concerts in New York should be abandoned it would be a calamity for our local music world.

Dr. Muck's programme last night consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's "Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn," Richard Strauss's war poem "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The presentation of it was masterful. The delivery of the symphony was incisive to the verge of irritation. One almost longed for something disturbing to happen. The Strauss work became imbued with new beauty by reason of the perfection of its exposition. It was a relief to have Weber's ingratiating overture for the finish.

EVENING MAIL
New York
NOV 6 1914

lished

ARTISTIC CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Famous Orchestra on First Visit of Season Presents All-German Programme—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Originally Dedicated to Napoleon, the Climax.

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid us their first visit of the season last evening, presenting an all-German programme at Carnegie Hall.

Many puerilities have recently been spoken and written concerning neutrality and partisanship in the field of music. The English gained some notoriety by boycotting German music in their concert halls. The Germans, never having paid any serious attention to English music, had no means of direct vengeance. In France even the good old Camille Saint-Saens is reported to have said some foolish things about German composers.

In this supposedly neutral country it is ridiculous to accuse a conductor of Dr. Muck's standing of prejudice in the selection of a programme. Since the Germans hold undisputed supremacy in orchestral music, there is no reason why an entire programme should not be made up of their compositions. Certainly the names of Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms, Strauss and Weber are of more than local significance.

Beethoven's Eroica symphony was Dr. Muck's big number last evening. The great German erased the name of Napoleon from the title-page of his score after the great Frenchman had lost his halo by accepting the emperor's crown.

Marvelous Effects Produced.

Those who insist upon dragging the martial spirit into all the events of their daily life may apply yesterday's presentation of the symphony to any up-to-date hero of the European disgrace whose character has been sufficiently disappointing.

When an orchestra plays as we are accustomed to hear the Bostonians play, critical comment runs too easily into superlatives to be of much interest or value. Dr. Muck still has under his baton what is probably the most highly trained company of musicians in the world. And the leader himself still retains his marvelous ability to bring out the minutest details of structure as well as of expression in an orchestral composition.

Admiration of his results almost gives way to astonishment at the simplicit of his methods. Dr. Muck unquestionably gets along with fewer and smalle gestures than any other conductor nov before the public. At one time last evening he worked up a climax with bot hands at his sides, merely indicatin the rhythm with an occasional nod o the head.

Aside from the Beethoven symphony the programme included the "Do Juan" of Richard Strauss, always a effective medium for the display of orchestral virtuosity; Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a, an Weber's Eurvanthe Overture.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 5 - 1914
Date

Established:

THRONG FILL LYRIC TO GREET BOSTO ORCHEST

Standing-room-only conditions prevailed at the Lyric last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pasquale Amato, the celebrated Italian barytone, as soloist, gave its first Baltimore concert of the season.

The audience was the largest that has assembled for a musical event this year, and, as always happens when the Boston orchestra is here, it was exceedingly fashionable. There was not a seat left in either auditorium or boxes, and the house, with its handsomely gowned and bejeweled women, presented a beautiful and inspiring sight.

Dr. Karl Muck, who succeeded in getting back to America from Europe only a short time ago, was given a rousing reception when he stepped to the director's stand to commence the opening number. The prolonged applause seemed like an attempt to show Baltimore's appreciation of the fact that the orchestra had surmounted the many difficulties produced by the European war, difficulties so portentous that for a time the welfare of the organization was at least apparently in jeopardy.

Amato Talks Of War.

"I do not believe that Italy is going to get into the war," Mr. Amato said in his dressing-room after his first number. "When I left there a few weeks ago I had seen nothing to indicate that my countrymen were anxious to rush into the conflict. Conditions are serious enough for them now, and they will be wise to keep out of the carnage.

"Never before has America loomed so great, so big, in the eyes of the world as at present. It stands like a gigantic sheltering refuge for the people of all countries.

"What is being done now in Europe cannot be undone in centuries. It is shocking to think of every phase of it. Particularly is it difficult to reconcile one's thoughts to the terrible slaughter of young men. Who knows how much genius that might have enlightened the world has already been lost?"

Mr. Amato spoke in a pleasantly reminiscent way of his appearances at the Lyric with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company five years ago, especially of the night when he sang "Giaconda," with Caruso and Destinn, when President Taft and his party occupied a box.

To Leave Operatic Stage.

Although Amato's fame rests chiefly upon his work in grand opera, he said that he is very anxious to get into the lieder singer's field, and that he intends eventually to break away from the operatic stage.

In speaking of the musical artists engaged in active warfare, he declared that it was his opinion the Governments they represent will not permit them to be exposed to undue danger. "The report that Vanni Marcoux had been killed," he added, "was erroneous. Madame Marcoux has officially denied it."

omposer himself, which the ras fortunate enough to he ummer in London.

This composition is thorough esentative of Strauss' most nd best-balanced period, midw ween a certain vagueness in work and an elaborate dege o frequently in evidence latte

The soloist of the evening famous barytone Pasquale His two numbers—an aria from Saens' "Henry VIII" and the air ora Mai Fie," from Handel's "Serse," now too familiarly kn Handel's "Largo"—are both n character and not difficult ution, but Signor Amato cou be said to have made a great sion in either of these numbe undoubtedly has a virile and tive personality, but such q when not enhanced by stage a ries, do not make the same app in opera. Candidly speaking, h per se did not last night strike at all phenomenal in its qualit much of his success must be uted to his personality and dr sympathy.

The concert closed with Si "Finlandia," a symphonic poe orchestra, a short compositi broad and easily intelligible line charming through its peculiarly vidual coloring.

H.

CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

Dr. Muck In Splendid Form And Gives An Ideal Rendition Of Beethoven's Symphony.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, proved to be one of an unusually high order, even for this eclectic organization.

Dr. Muck himself was in splendid form, and gave the most ideal reading of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" we can ever recall having heard, such a contrast in every respect to the peculiarly unsympathetic way in which he treated the same composer's C minor symphony last year.

In the "Eroica Symphony" Beethoven undoubtedly broke more new ground in a single work than has ever been done before or since in orchestral literature. Its first movement is still the most stupendous, both in form and material, in existence, while the "Funeral March," by which it is followed, is the first great emotional and poetic expression of musical thought to be found in the slow movement of a symphony.

It was here, above all, that Dr. Muck so particularly distinguished himself, revealing in every detail its most subtle pathos. Not even Dr. Muck, however, at his best, can reconcile us to the finale of this work, so unheroic in character, and destroying, as it does, any unified idea of this as an essentially "program" symphony, which its title suggests.

Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," was another great attraction in the program, and it was very interesting to compare Dr. Muck's conception of the work with that of the

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1914

CRITICS, MUSIC AND POLITICS

How Doctor Muck Was Badgered for Playing Brahms, Beethoven and Weber.

YESTERDAY'S BOSTON CONCERT

Brahms Played Again Despite Noise of Those Who Confuse Him With Von Kluck.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its Saturday concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

There was the customary large audience, and many had perforce to be turned away.

This orchestra spends three days in New York during the five months of the Winter season. Two concerts are given in Manhattan and one in Brooklyn. It is suggested that the Friday night concert which takes place across the bridges should be given here seeing that the subway has brought Brooklyn as near to Carnegie Hall as many parts of Manhattan. The really musical people of Manhattan would value the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little more than present conditions permit.

Before reviewing the performance of the Boston symphonists I will take it upon myself to apologize to Dr. Muck on behalf of the more educated and intelligent of the New York reviewers of music for the unworthy attacks made on him for playing German music at his opening concert.

Stupid and Detestable Outcry.

The outcry has been a detestable piece of stupidity, and has been or ought to be repudiated by the more honest and the more courageous of our writers. In more than one journal Dr. Muck was actually accused of "German propaganda" in playing the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and compositions by other men of genius who happened to be born in Germany. One reviewer writing for a morning paper made no less than three political insinuations in one paragraph. In the race of Asses to Nowhere this person felt determined to be the first.

I venture to suggest that if the bitterness of certain critics against the German nation is so great, they should go into the trenches on the Aisne, and fight the German soldiers. They will find the German soldiers there quite ready to receive them. I admit that to do this is much harder than to fight conductors and trouble the sensitive spirits of first trombones.

The present writer holds no brief for the Germans in the present war; but he does, as a student, for the great German spirits and intellects who have stimulated humanity and made it think more highly of itself.

Pitiable Incident.

The whole incident is pitiable and ignoble and calculated to destroy any confidence that cultivated Europe may ever have placed in the sense and judgment of the New York music critics. It tempts me to amplify a celebrated dictum of Disraeli and say that a critic is often one who having done nothing in art or literature himself, uses his stupid glibness to embitter the existence and hinder the progress of men of interpretative or constructive genius. And it is monstrous also that men who are unable to distinguish between the abstract and impersonal beauties of the most idealistic of arts, and the concrete issues of war and politics, should be sitting in judgment on artistic matters.

Brahms Second Symphony.

The chief number in yesterday's programme was the Second Symphony of Brahms, written by that master in one of his noblest and serenest moods.

I trust there is no treason in quoting for the occasion a celebrated German historian, but as there is no Hottentot Herodotus that serves my purpose, I shall venture to do so. Mommsen tells us that the character of Julius Caesar was perfect. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Brahms Symphony was normal.

The programme concluded with an amiable suite by Chadwick and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

Mr. Harold Bauer gave a recital at Aeolian Hall. His programme was derived from the works of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

Mr. Bauer is a pianist who regards the emotional content of a composer's work of more importance than a personal display of pianistic sophistry and [illegible]. Therefore he is the more welcome as an artist.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date Nov 9' 1914

Est 1884

ON MUSICAL APPRECIATION.

That the music lovers and concert-goers realize the benefits to be derived from the weekly musical appreciation talks of Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, was shown by the large attendance at the opening meeting last Monday when Mr. Randolph discussed the Boston Symphony Orchestra program. The talks are designed to create a better understanding of the general principles of music and in this way insure greater enjoyment of musical concerts. Appreciation is familiarity, and the director will endeavor to create the former by explanation and illustration.

The talks will take place in the lecture hall of the institute on Monday afternoons at 5 o'clock and continue until March 15. During the course Mr. Randolph will be assisted by other artists, both instrumental and vocal. A knowledge of music is not required and the plan of the lectures will be popular enough to be readily enjoyed by the uninitiated. At the talk this afternoon Mr. Randolph will take up the subject of melodies and explain their formation and how to recognize them. He will also explain other fundamental principles and close the meeting with a short piano program illustrating the different points under discussion. It is expected that these talks will meet a long-felt want in the music life of the city, and that the average musical listener will find them of inestimable value.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 -

Dr. Muck's Men Play Finely at Opening Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its New York Season with All German Programme.

War and its sentiments played no part in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the beginning of its twenty-ninth season in this city, save that there were several new members among the players. Anti-Germans and pro-Germans united in welcoming Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, with enthusiasm apparently born of profound admiration, and although each number was the composition of a German, it was received with lasting applause. The German Ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, heard the concert from a box.

Several times were the members of the orchestra compelled to rise and bow their acknowledgments of the applause. And on two occasions Dr. Muck allowed the musicians to play whole sections without even raising his baton to lead them, only nodding his head now and again.

The playing of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, which began the concert, was a combination of dignity, technical perfection and beauty of utterance. Then came the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Anthony Chorale, followed by Dr. Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Don Juan," which the orchestra performed with a show of virtuosity seldom equalled by the organization. And for a conclusion there was Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," with its jubilant beginning and its rushing coda, which stirred the audience to applause that brought Dr. Muck back several times.

The conductor again directed his men with great authority and the orchestra responded with the esprit which has marked its playing so often in the past. The audience taxed the capacity of the hall and some went away from the box office empty handed. Their enthusiasm was equal to their numbers, which tells the whole story.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 - 1914

Boston Orchestra Warmly Greeted At First Concert

1884

By Sylvester Rawling.

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was warmly greeted by a crowded house of music lovers, in which people of fashion were a large part. Twice before the programme was finished he called upon his players to rise acknowledgment of the applause. the end there was another tribute himself that was worth while for hi to receive: The Boston Orchestr had proved again its right to a hig place under the sun.

An "inspired" anonymous write recently protested that the New Yor music critics, of whom he held m to be the chief offender, had undul exalted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the detriment of our own symphony organizations, and to the discouragement of local musical endeavor. Strange combination of ignorance and maliciousness! New York always has insisted upon getting the best that it knew in music, and when, through the fostering care and munificence of Major Higginson, Boston was able to maintain the best orchestra in America—perhaps the best in the world—it was the duty of New York writers about music to call the attention of New York music lovers to the fact. If our efforts have resulted in changing houses half filled into houses with the "Standing Room Only" sign confronting would-be purchasers of tickets, I for one am not ashamed.

That conditions have improved in New York is true. Thanks to the bequest of $1,000,000 from Mr. Pulitzer and to the genius and training capacity of Mr. Stransky. The Philharmonic Society's orchestra is become one to challenge comparison with the best. Thanks, too, to the financial support of Mr. Harry Harkness Flagler, and the indefatiguable industry of Walter Damrosch the Symphony Society's orchestra is one of which New York well may be proud. But it is no discredit to either of these organizations that some of us continue to take off our hats to the Boston Orchestra. Beside the orchestra from the Hub is become part of us. Few of its New York patrons stop to think that its base is at the foot of Bunker Hill instead of in Carnegie Hall. If annual concerts in New York should be abandoned it would be a calamity for our local music world.

Dr. Muck's programme last night consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's "Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn," Richard Strauss's war poem "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The presentation of it was masterful. The delivery of the symphony was incisive to the verge of irritation. One almost longed for something disturbing to happen. The Strauss work became imbued with new beauty by reason of the perfection of its exposition. It was a relief to have Weber's ingratiating overture for the finish.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Est 1884

Orchestral Friends from "Hub" Opening Series of Concerts.

In the progress of the score of years during which the Boston Symphony has bestowed its benisons on New York the vocabulary of praise has been thoroughly exhausted; so has that of description and critical analysis.

It is only when the splendid body of musicians introduces a new work, or its conductor discloses a different conception of a familiar work from that held by his colleagues at the head of local organizations that the reviewer can get away from a simple record or a revamping of old utterances. It has become impossible even to chronicle growth in local appreciation of the visitors, for, so far as it can be measured by the attendance, that reached its limit some time ago.

When all the seats in a vast room like Carnegie Hall are subscribed for a year in advance the tale does not admit of many sequels. Nor is it necessary to popular knowledge that reiterations be made of the circumstances that the audiences have come to represent the fine flavor of New York's music lovers.

What, then, needs be said, or shall be said, of the first concert of the Bostonians, which took place last night? Not much. The men were gladly seen, were gladly heard, and Dr. Muck was enthusiastically greeted when he came upon the stage, but more enthusiastically when he turned to bow his acknowledgments for the expressions of delight which followed the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which opened the programme. Thereafter the general happiness grew with what it fed on—Brahms's variations as a theme by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," that truly German opera which Signor Toscanini selected for this season's Metropolitan list to bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner. All the old opulence of tone, all the old technical precision, all the old harmonic brilliancy and clarity with which the public is familiar, was again in evidence, and the concert was a period of æsthetic refreshment and mental uplift.

H. E. K.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 - 1914

Estab 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Concert of German Music at the Opening of Its Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last evening with the heartiest enthusiasm at its first appearance this season in New York at Carnegie Hall. The audience, as it has been for so many years, was as large as the hall could hold. Mr. Witek, the concert master, received a round of applause when he came upon the platform, apparently a little to his surprise, and when Dr. Muck appeared he was made to bow again and again by applause given in glad recognition of his return from troublous scenes, and of his re-entrance upon a task that has given, and will continue to give, so much and so rare pleasure to New York lovers of orchestral music.

It was possibly not wholly an accident that Dr. Muck's first programme put before his listeners only German music by some of its most distinguished representatives, Beethoven and Weber, Brahms and Strauss; that the symphony was the "Eroica," concerning which M. d'Indy, as Mr. Hale points out in his programme notes—M. d'Indy, the French composer and writer—"in discussing the patriotism of Beethoven as shown in his music, calls attention to the 'militarisme,' the adaptation of a warlike rhythm to melody, that characterizes the funeral march;" or even that Count von Bernstorff and Dr. Dernburg, who naturally have a deep interest in German music, occupied a box.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's variations and theme of Haydn, Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." This music, as it has so often and most of it for so many years, ("Don Juan" as lately as last Friday,) profoundly moved, delighted, and edified the audience, who found so much and such varied pleasure in its content and in the wonderfully fine performance that they had no need and no desire to think of anything but the merits of both and least of all of any possible ulterior suggestion in the occasion.

The orchestra seemed in its finest form; and though only recently reassembled after more or less strenuous effort, has never played with more beauty and exquisite balance of tone, more finish and more fire, nor has Dr. Muck ever swayed it more perfectly to his wishes. His interpretation of the symphony was an exposition of the composer's thought, untouched by a conductor's desire to establish a "reading" or to find what none had been able to find in it before. It was superbly vigorous and elastic, marked by modifications of tempo so subtle that they never obtruded themselves as such or impeded the fundamental rhythm of the music. Notable were the depth and shadowy richness of orchestral color in Brahms's variations, only to be presented by such an expert setting of the palette as was bestowed upon it: and strongly contrasting with them the easier brilliancy of Strauss's tone poem, played with marvelous élan and clarity. It was not surprising that there was tempestuous applause, or that Dr. Muck found occasion to make his men rise to share it with him after the symphony.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony concert of Saturday afternoon opened with the best of Brahms's symphonies, the second—in D major. Dr. Muck's scholarly interpretations of Brahms are so well known that comment seems superfluous. The "Symphonic Sketches," a suite for orchestra, of George W. Chadwick, was the other principal number. This suite consists of four movements—"Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad." These are full of good, wholesome melody, and orchestrated with plenty of color. The "Noël" is a Christmas song for orchestra of unusual beauty. It is not like a Christmas carol, and yet it has the Christmas spirit—perhaps it is the finest of the four.

The third number is a rollicking scherzo, while the last is a tramp's ditty which borders on the comic—with its quotation from Bach's great G minor fugue played on the xylophone. The "Finlandia" of Sibelius ended the programme. No doubt this was better to end a programme with, but it has been heard frequently, while "The Swan of Tuonela," which figured on the Brooklyn programme of the Boston Orchestra, would have been more welcome. It was conducted by the composer at the Norfolk festival last June and produced a profound impression on all who heard it. There are other interesting works of the early Sibelius besides the "Finlandia" and "Valse triste." Why are they not heard?

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1914

1884

CRITICS, MUSIC AND POLITICS

How Doctor Muck Was Badgered for Playing Brahms, Beethoven and Weber.

YESTERDAY'S BOSTON CONCERT

Brahms Played Again Despite Noise of Those Who Confuse Him With Von Kluck.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its Saturday concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

There was the customary large audience, and many had perforce to be turned away.

This orchestra spends three days in New York during the five months of the Winter season. Two concerts are given in Manhattan and one in Brooklyn. It is suggested that the Friday night concert which takes place across the bridges should be given here seeing that the subway has brought Brooklyn as near to Carnegie Hall as many parts of Manhattan. The really musical people of Manhattan would value the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little more than present conditions permit.

Before reviewing the performance of the Boston symphonists I will take it upon myself to apologize to Dr. Muck on behalf of the more educated and intelligent of the New York reviewers of music for the unworthy attacks made on him for playing German music at his opening concert.

Stupid and Detestable Outcry.

The outcry has been a detestable piece of stupid: ·, and has been or ought to be repudiated by the more honest and the more courageous of our writers. In more than one journal Dr. Muck was actually accused of "German propaganda" in playing the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and compositions by other men of genius who happened to be born in Germany. One reviewer writing for a morning paper made no less than three political insinuations in one paragraph. In the race of Asses to Nowhere this person felt determined to be the first.

I venture to suggest that if the bitterness of certain critics against the German nation is so great, they should go into the trenches on the Aisne, and fight the German soldiers. They will find the German soldiers there quite ready to receive them. I admit that to do this is much harder than to fight conductors and trouble the sensitive spirits of first trombones.

The present writer holds no brief for the Germans in the present war; but he does, as a student, for the great German spirits and intellects who have stimulated humanity and made it think more highly of itself.

Pitiable Incident.

The whole incident is pitiable and ignoble and calculated to destroy any confidence that cultivated Europe may ever have placed in the sense and judgment of the New York music critics. It tempts me to amplify a celebrated dictum of Disraeli and say that a critic is often one who having done nothing in art or literature himself, uses his stupid glibness to embitter the existence and hinder the progress of men of interpretative or constructive genius. And it is monstrous also that men who are unable to distinguish between the abstract and impersonal beauties of the most idealistic of arts, and the concrete issues of war and politics, should be sitting in judgment on artistic matters.

Brahms Second Symphony.

The chief number in yesterday's programme was the Second Symphony of Brahms, written by that master in one of his noblest and serenest moods.

I trust there is no treason in quoting for the occasion a celebrated German historian, but as there is no Hottentot Herodotus that serves my purpose, I shall venture to do so. Mommsen tells us that the character of Julius Caesar was perfect. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Brahms Symphony was normal.

The programme concluded with an amiable suite by Chadwick and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

Mr. Harold Bauer gave a recital at Aeolian Hall. His programme was derived from the works of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

Mr. Bauer is a pianist who regards the emotional content of a composer's work of more importance than a personal display of pianistic sophistry and brilliance. Therefore he is the more welcome as an artist.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date Nov 9 1914

Est 1884

ON MUSICAL APPRECIATION.

That the music lovers and concertgoers realize the benefits to be derived from the weekly musical appreciation talks of Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, was shown by the large attendance at the opening meeting last Monday when Mr. Randolph discussed the Boston Symphony Orchestra program. The talks are designed to create a better understanding of the general principles of music and in this way insure greater enjoyment of musical concerts. Appreciation is familiarity, and the director will endeavor to create the former by explanation and illustration.

The talks will take place in the lecture hall of the institute on Monday afternoons at 5 o'clock and continue until March 15. During the course Mr. Randolph will be assisted by other artists, both instrumental and vocal. A knowledge of music is not required and the plan of the lectures will be popular enough to be readily enjoyed by the uninitiated. At the talk this afternoon Mr. Randolph will take up the subject of melodies and explain their formation and how to recognize them. He will also explain other fundamental principles and close the meeting with a short piano program illustrating the different points under discussion. It is expected that these talks will meet a long-felt want in the music life of the city, and that the average musical listener will find them of inestimable value.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date NOV 6 -

Esta 34

Dr. Muck's Men Play Finely at Opening Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its New York Season with All German Programme.

War and its sentiments played no part in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the beginning of its twenty-ninth season in this city, save that there were several new members among the players. Anti-Germans and pro-Germans united in welcoming Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, with enthusiasm apparently born of profound admiration, and although each number was the composition of a German, it was received with lasting applause. The German Ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, heard the concert from a box.

Several times were the members of the orchestra compelled to rise and bow their acknowledgments of the applause. And on two occasions Dr. Muck allowed the musicians to play whole sections without even raising his baton to lead them, only nodding his head now and again.

The playing of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, which began the concert, was a combination of dignity, technical perfection and beauty of utterance. Then came the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Anthony Chorale, followed by Dr. Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Don Juan," which the orchestra performed with a show of virtuosity seldom equalled by the organization. And for a conclusion there was Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," with its jubilant beginning and its rushing coda, which stirred the audience to applause that brought Dr. Muck back several times.

The conductor again directed his men with great authority and the orchestra responded with the esprit which has marked its playing so often in the past. The audience taxed the capacity of the hall and some went away from the box office empty handed. Their enthusiasm was equal to their numbers, which tells the whole story.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City

Date NOV 6 - 1914

Es 1884

Boston Orchestra Warmly Greeted At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was warmly greeted by a crowded house of music lovers, in which people of fashion were a large part. Twice before the programme was finished he called upon his players to rise in acknowledgment of the applause. At the end there was another tribute to himself that was worth while for him to receive: The Boston Orchestra had proved again its right to a high place under the sun.

An "inspired" anonymous writer recently protested that the New York music critics, of whom he held me to be the chief offender, had unduly exalted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the detriment of our own symphony organizations, and to the discouragement of local musical endeavor. Strange combination of ignorance and maliciousness! New York always has insisted upon getting the best that it knew in music, and when, through the fostering care and munificence of Major Higginson, Boston was able to maintain the best orchestra in America—perhaps the best in the world—it was the duty of New York writers about music to call the attention of New York music lovers to the fact. If our efforts have resulted in changing houses half filled into houses with the "Standing Room Only" sign confronting would-be purchasers of tickets, I for one am not ashamed.

That conditions have improved in New York is true. Thanks to the bequest of $1,000,000 from Mr. Pulitzer and to the genius and training capacity of Mr. Stransky. The Philharmonic Society's orchestra is become one to challenge comparison with the best. Thanks, too, to the financial support of Mr. Harry Harkness Flagler, and the indefatiguable industry of Walter Damrosch the Symphony Society's orchestra is one of which New York well may be proud. But it is no discredit to either of these organizations that some of us continue to take off our hats to the Boston Orchestra. Beside the orchestra from the Hub is become part of us. Few of its New York patrons stop to think that its base is at the foot of Bunker Hill instead of in Carnegie Hall. If annual concerts in New York should be abandoned it would be a calamity for our local music world.

Dr. Muck's programme last night consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's "Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn," Richard Strauss's war poem "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The presentation of it was masterful. The delivery of the symphony was incisive to the verge of irritation. One almost longed for something disturbing to happen. The Strauss work became imbued with new beauty by reason of the perfection of its exposition. It was a relief to have Weber's ingratiating overture for the finish.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Orchestral Friends from "Hub" Opening Series of Concerts.

In the progress of the score of years during which the Boston Symphony has bestowed its benisons on New York the vocabulary of praise has been thoroughly exhausted; so has that of description and critical analysis.

It is only when the splendid body of musicians introduces a new work, or its conductor discloses a different conception of a familiar work from that held by his colleagues at the head of local organizations that the reviewer can get away from a simple record or a revamping of old utterances. It has become impossible even to chronicle growth in local appreciation of the visitors, for, so far as it can be measured by the attendance, that reached its limit some time ago.

When all the seats in a vast room like Carnegie Hall are subscribed for a year in advance the tale does not admit of many sequels. Nor is it necessary to popular knowledge that reiterations be made of the circumstances that the audiences have come to represent the fine flavor of New York's music lovers.

What, then, needs be said, or shall be said, of the first concert of the Bostonians, which took place last night? Not much. The men were gladly seen, were gladly heard, and Dr. Muck was enthusiastically greeted when he came upon the stage, but more enthusiastically when he turned to bow his acknowledgments for the expressions of delight which followed the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which opened the programme. Thereafter the general happiness grew with what it fed on—Brahms's variations as a theme by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," that truly German opera which Signor Toscanini selected for this season's Metropolitan list to bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner. All the old opulence of tone, all the old technical precision, all the old harmonic brilliancy and clarity with which the public is familiar, was again in evidence, and the concert was a period of æsthetic refreshment and mental uplift.

H. E. K.

TIMES
ress: New York City

te NOV 6 1914

tab 884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Concert of German Music at the Opening of Its Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last evening with the heartiest enthusiasm at its first appearance this season in New York at Carnegie Hall. The audience, as it has been for so many years, was as large as the hall could hold. Mr. Witek, the concert master, received a round of applause when he came upon the platform, apparently a little to his surprise, and when Dr. Muck appeared he was made to bow again and again by applause given in glad recognition of his return from troublous scenes, and of his re-entrance upon a task that has given, and will continue to give, so much and so rare pleasure to New York lovers of orchestral music.

It was possibly not wholly an accident that Dr. Muck's first programme put before his listeners only German music by some of its most distinguished representatives, Beethoven and Weber, Brahms and Strauss; that the symphony was the "Eroica," concerning which M. d'Indy, as Mr. Hale points out in his programme notes — M. d'Indy, the French composer and writer—"in discussing the patriotism of Beethoven as shown in his music, calls attention to the 'militarisme,' the adaptation of a warlike rhythm to melody, that characterizes the funeral march;" or even that Count von Bernstorff and Dr. Dernburg, who naturally have a deep interest in German music, occupied a box.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's variations and theme of Haydn, Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." This music, as it has so often and most of it for so many years, ("Don Juan" as lately as last Friday,) profoundly moved, delighted, and edified the audience, who found so much and such varied pleasure in its content and in the wonderfully fine performance that they had no need and no desire to think of anything but the merits of both and least of all of any possible ulterior suggestion in the occasion.

The orchestra seemed in its finest form; and though only recently reassembled after more or less strenuous effort, has never played with more beauty and exquisite balance of tone, more finish and more fire, nor has Dr. Muck ever swayed it more perfectly to his wishes. His interpretation of the symphony was an exposition of the composer's thought, untouched by a conductor's desire to establish a "reading" or to find what none had been able to find in it before. It was superbly vigorous and elastic, marked by modifications of tempo so subtle that they never obtruded themselves as such or impeded the fundamental rhythm of the music. Notable were the depth and shadowy richness of orchestral color in Brahms's variations, only to be presented by such an expert setting of the palette as was bestowed upon it: and strongly contrasting with them the easier brilliancy of Strauss's tone poem, played with marvelous elan and clarity. It was not surprising that there was tempestuous applause, or that Dr. Muck found occasion to make his men rise to share it with him after the symphony.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date NOV 9 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony concert of Saturday afternoon opened with the best of Brahms's symphonies, the second—in D major. Dr. Muck's scholarly interpretations of Brahms are so well known that comment seems superfluous. The "Symphonic Sketches," a suite for orchestra, of George W. Chadwick, was the other principal number. This suite consists of four movements—"Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad." These are full of good, wholesome melody, and orchestrated with plenty of color. The "Noël" is a Christmas song for orchestra of unusual beauty. It is not like a Christmas carol, and yet it has the Christmas spirit—perhaps it is the finest of the four.

The third number is a rollicking scherzo, while the last is a tramp's ditty which borders on the comic—with its quotation from Bach's great G minor fugue played on the xylophone. The "Finlandia" of Sibelius ended the programme. No doubt this was better to end a programme with, but it has been heard frequently, while "The Swan of Tuonela," which figured on the Brooklyn programme of the Boston Orchestra, would have been more welcome. It was conducted by the composer at the Norfolk festival last June and produced a profound impression on all who heard it. There are other interesting works of the early Sibelius besides the "Finlandia" and "Valse triste." Why are they not heard?

SUN

From
Address: New York City

NOV 6 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FIRST CONCERT

k, 1884

Programme of Standard Works Played With Much Brilliancy and Skill.

DR. MUCK'S CONDUCTING

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that the European war disarranged some of the best laid plans of Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and of Dr. Karl Muck, its distinguished conductor, the body of players was almost the same as that which visited us last season. The few changes were not of a kind to alter the constitution of the organization, and the first number on the programme served to prove that the best traditions of this national institution were to be preserved.

Dr. Muck was very warmly welcomed. He is a bad programme maker and he was in his worst form with this opening concert. There was one number too many on the list and it was not at all difficult to discern which one it was. The entertainment began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This was followed by the Brahms variations on Haydn's theme, the "Chorale St. Anthoni," Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

The Brahms variations are admirable and when properly placed always make an effect with an audience. But after such a delivery of Beethoven's "Eroica" as that heard last evening these fine and reflective developments of the solemn chorale seemed have been left too long in the sun and to have dried out entirely.

A far better contrast would have been made by omitting this number and going directly to the materialistic promulgation of Mr. Strauss. Beethoven's time honored symphony is still too much alive, its blood is too warm and its pulse too strong to permit of a successful challenge from a set of variations, even those made by a master.

The performance of the symphony was something to be remembered for the rest of the season. The nobility of the orchestral tone, the exquisite finish of the nuancing, the perfection of the precision and unanimity, the eloquence of the reading of the conductor; all these were memorable matters. And how young, how strong, how vigorous the symphony sounded in these days of sea green meditations, of preachments of philosophy, theosophy and even atrophy.

Let us be glad that this music remains to remind us that it is not essential to our spiritual uplift that we should be introduced to strange scales, to unheard of instruments and to counterpoint of different tonalities. The music of 110 years ago puts most of the futurist product to shame. It has a message and it publishes it in no uncertain manner. But when the work is to be played it ought always to be played as it was last evening, with enthusiasm, with full faith in its vitality and with loving care in the treatment of its details.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY

188

"Eroica" Symphony Played in Stirring Fashion and Pasquale Amato Sings Airs of Saint-Saens and Haendel.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven	Third ("Eroica") Symphony
Saint-Saens..Aria,	"Qui donc Commande" From "Henry VIII"
Richard Strauss	Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Haendel..Aria,	"Ombra mai fu," from "Serse"
Sametana	Overture, "The Bartered Bride"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, opened its local season at the Academy last evening. Though 30 members, including the conductor, were abroad this summer, but two changes have been made in the personnel that faced a crowded auditorium. Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinet is taken by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, and Mr. Fosse's post among the oboes is filled by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

It is hard to imagine how the great "Eroica" could have been better played. ~~The interpretation quite effaced the memory of the barbarous manhandling the work received from the New York Symphony the other evening.~~ This reading pulsated with vitality, was pointed with sudden stress and accent, each instrument on the alert for its own share in fashioning the contrasts of light and shade and rythmic subtleties. The first violins with their blended golden tone, their shimmering touch-and-go as delicate as frostwork in the Scherzo, the plaint of the oboe in the funeral march, split and scatter the tone ... shrapnel), the passionate whir of the flute like the wings of a white bird—these distinctive elements were not more admirable than the concept of the work in its entirety which Doctor Muck and the players divined and enforced.

Like pastmasters in any other profession, they made all they did seem easy. This was true as well of the tremendous, tearing trumpets in Don Juan's erotic delirium, with the lovely interlude of flue, oboe and clarinet amid the melee, the catlike pounces of the kettledrum, and finally that marvelous fugue of the strings keeping the dizzying pace of the Smetana overture.

This was the Boston Orchestra at its best, in execution that was the last word of technical virtuosity, in absolute oneness of purpose, informed and inspired by authentic genius on the part of director and directed.

With reciprocal pleasure in the reappearance, Pasquale Amato, the Metropolitan baritone, gave his hearers two operatic airs that contrasted modern ingenuity with classic simplicity. The Saint-Saens air—especially at the words "Empire reste"—was scarcely within the reach of the easy flexibility of the singer's voice. It was instructive to hear our old friend "Handel's Largo" restored to its original setting and the grateful shade of the apostrophized plane-tree. Admirable as the singing was, with many recalls attesting the vocalist's popularity, one felt that his contribution was perceptibly below the level of the rest of the performance. He seemed more bent on achieving a personal success than his associates in the program, who exalted their message and their mission rather than themselves.

GLOBE'S CHINESE ACT

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY, LED BY KARL MUCK, HEARD

Esta 1884

Capacity House Greets Famous Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is still the distinguished leader, gave their first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall before a capacity audience. The famous conductor was greeted enthusiastically on his first entrance and had to bow repeatedly to the plaudits of his admirers. At the end of the first offering, Beethoven's immortal "Eroica" symphony, there was another prolonged demonstration, the noise redoubling when the whole orchestra rose to acknowledge the applause.

Evidently Dr. Muck has lost none of his popularity in this city. Evidently, too, Charles Ellis, despite the difficulties he encountered in Germany, has managed to bring together most of the musicians who made up the organization last year.

They played under their leader's baton as only the Boston Orchestra plays. In all of the "Eroica" scherzo, except the trio, they even played unaided by the rhythmical oscillations of his stick, with only an occasional movement of his hand, nod of his head or glance of his eyes to carry them smoothly along.

But if the great symphony in which Beethoven is supposed to have glorified the heroic figure of Napoleon showed plainly the Boston Symphony Orchestra had lost nothing in quality and efficiency, the Brahms Variations on a theme by Haydn, given with exquisite precision and clearness, and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," in which the euphony and transparency of the instrument Dr. Muck had at his command were brought into striking evidence, carried an even more convincing message.

So nicely balanced, perspicuous, plastic and sweepingly melodious a performance of "Don Juan" it is hard to recall. Here the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck were at their best. It seemed, indeed, as if every man was inspired by something more than the desire to do full justice to Strauss's beautiful score.

There the concert might have stopped. Already the hour was late. But few persons left before the programme had come to a close with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, played with stirring rhythmical verve and power. It was a concert not soon to be forgotten.

MAX SMITH.

From GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9 1914

Music.

Concert Chronicles of Two Days —Some Gossip.

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second local concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The audience was as large as usual, which is to say as large as the hall can hold, though it was somewhat less given to applause than usual. The latter phenomenon could hardly put out of countenance a body men

[44]

---

Hall, Boston.

Brahms's second symphony headed the programme, and the performance accorded it under the leadership of Dr. Muck was one to be received with deep gratitude. The clearness of Dr. Muck's reading, its continuous flow, its feeling for the essential beauty of the music of Brahms made it truly satisfying. The rest of the programme was the kind of thing that it is quite unnecessary for an orchestra to travel from Boston to play in New York. George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" are not without cleverness, especially in the matter of orchestration, but they are at this date of too little importance from any point of view to make it incumbent on the band from Boston to play them on its too rare visits to New York.

In Boston recently Dr. Muck put three pieces by the Finn Sibelius on one programme. Among them was "The Swan of Tuonela." Would that he had put on his programme of Saturday "The Swan of Tuonela," which is almost, if not entirely, unknown in New York, instead of the "Finlandia," which is altogether too well known—brass band music appropriate to beer gardens in summer time.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRAHMS MUSIC

1884

First Matinee Concert Opens With Great Performance of Second Symphony.

SUITE BY MR. CHADWICK

It must have escaped the notice of some of the local commentators on musical matters that on October 23 Dr. Karl Muck conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city in the first performance there of the fourth symphony of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in 1864 in Guingamp, France, and by the latest accounts a resident of the troubled city of Nancy. Possibly the same recorders forget that on the programme of yesterday's matinee was the symphonic poem "Finlandia," by Jan Sibelius, born in Finland and living in Helsingfors, a city in the domains of his Imperial Majesty of Russia.

If these facts had not been overlooked there might have been less said about the exclusively German character of the music at the first concert of the Bostonians on Thursday evening. Dr. Muck is a musician and a great master, as well as a Prussian, and he has under his baton an orchestra in which Germans, Bohemians, Russians, French, Belgians, Italians and Americans are seated together. The beneficent shield of art will protect them all, and therefore it will probably not be necessary again to touch upon the subject of neutrality.

Yesterday afternoon's programme was not one to tax the mind of the listener. It has always been Dr. Muck's plan to make the matinee concerts somewhat simpler in constitution than the evening ones. Whether this is because he has no belief in the theatrical manager's bogey, the "tired business man," or because he is no advocate of the equality of the sexes he has not made known. The plan has certain merits at any rate.

The concert began with the great D major symphony of Brahms, which was sung by the instrumental body in such a manner as to move the really sensitive listener to emotion. Tone of the most luscious quality, perfect balance, exquisite adjustment of the dynamics and the modification of tempi in the nuancing and a masterly arrangement of the details of the performance in their relations to a noble general conception were the salient features of this unique performance.

The symphony was followed by George Whitfield Chadwick's suite for orchestra entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The work has four movements with the names "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." They were composed at different times and were first played all together by the Boston Orchestra in Boston on February 7, 1908, Dr. Muck conducting.

A melodious suite is this, sometimes richly and sometimes ineffectively orchestrated, but always bearing the marks of a musician's hand. The preachments of Dr. Dvorak as to American thematic materials were not lost on Mr. Chadwick, who has heard the tune of the Afro-American folk song and found it to his liking. Some of the best thought in his sketches is that which imitates plantation melody.

The first movement is perhaps the most firmly knit of the four, though the slow one has some value. But this suite is not one of the best creations of the distinguished head of the New England Conservatory of Music. It was admirably played, of course, and a similar statement can be made in regard to Sibelius's tuneful song of Finland which brought the concert to a pleasant end.

In the last two weeks Philadelphia has had the chance to hear the very best music that human talent, polished by time and backed by money, can produce. The Boston Symphony, led by Muck, was the ne plus ultra of harmonious ensemble. Long training has brought it down as near to perfection as human art is likely to get. It seems as though further practice can only maintain it at the highest pinnacle it has reached. One can hardly conceive of its rising higher.

Three Great Orchestras Here

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under its young leader, Leopold Stokowski, is following closely in the track of the senior organization. The concerts already given this season have been wonderfully good, and nothing could bring out its excellence better than a comparison with the New York Orchestra last week under Damrosch.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1914

Es 1884

Man muß es Dr. Karl Muck von der Boſtoner Symphonie laſſen: Er hat den Muth ſeiner Ueberzeugung! Beweis: Sein vorgeſtriges Programm, beſtehend aus Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms, Strauß und Weber. Dr. Muck hat es nicht nöthig, Neutralitätserklärungen abzugeben, wie manche andere Dirigenten hieſiger Muſik-Geſellſchaften.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 8 - 1914

188

The second of the Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening, Nov. 17. The soloist will be that most admirable pianist, Harold Bauer, and the programme will be devoted to two of the three great "Bs," Beethoven and Brahms. The symphony will be Brahms's delightfully melodious second in D-major with which the orchestra under Dr. Muck has this year had such extraordinary success. Mr. Bauer will play Beethoven's great "Concerto in G-Major, No. 4," and the final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

HAROLD BAUER,
Pianist Who is to Be the Soloist at the Next Symphony Concert at Infantry Hall Nov. 17.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914

Establish

PHILADELPHIA HAS FINE THEATRICALS

On Monday night, the first concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony in Philadelphia, was given at the Academy of Music. The orchestra was directed by Dr. Karl Muck, whose choice of symphonies was the Beethoven "Eroica." Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan"; and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" were other orchestral numbers.

SUN

From
Address: New York City

NOV 6 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FIRST CONCERT

k, 1884

Programme of Standard Works Played With Much Brilliancy and Skill.

DR. MUCK'S CONDUCTING

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that the European war disarranged some of the best laid plans of Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and of Dr. Karl Muck, its distinguished conductor, the body of players was almost the same as that which visited us last season. The few changes were not of a kind to alter the constitution of the organization, and the first number on the programme served to prove that the best traditions of this national institution were to be preserved.

Dr. Muck was very warmly welcomed. He is a bad programme maker and he was in his worst form with this opening concert. There was one number too many on the list and it was not at all difficult to discern which one it was. The entertainment began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This was followed by the Brahms variations on Haydn's theme, the "Chorale St. Anthoni," Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

The Brahms variations are admirable and when properly placed always make an effect with an audience. But after such a delivery of Beethoven's "Eroica" as that heard last evening these fine and reflective developments of the solemn chorale seemed have been left too long in the sun and to have dried out entirely.

A far better contrast would have been made by omitting this number and going directly to the materialistic promulgation of Mr. Strauss. Beethoven's time honored symphony is still too much alive, its blood is too warm and its pulse too strong to permit of a successful challenge from a set of variations, even those made by a master.

The performance of the symphony was something to be remembered for the rest of the season. The nobility of the orchestral tone, the exquisite finish of the nuancing, the perfection of the precision and unanimity, the eloquence of the reading of the conductor; all these were memorable matters. And how young, how strong, how vigorous the symphony sounded in these days of sea green meditations, of preachments of philosophy, theosophy and even atrophy.

Let us be glad that this music remains to remind us that it is not essential to our spiritual uplift that we should be introduced to strange scales, to unheard of instruments and to counterpoint of different tonalities. The music of 110 years ago puts most of the futurist product to shame. It has a message and it publishes it in no uncertain manner. But when the work is to be played it ought always to be played as it was last evening, with enthusiasm, with full faith in its vitality and with loving care in the treatment of its details.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY

, 188

"Eroica" Symphony Played in Stirring Fashion and Pasquale Amato Sings Airs of Saint-Saens and Haendel.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven.........Third ("Eroica") Symphony
Saint-Saens..Aria, "Qui donc Commande" From "Henry VIII"
Richard Strauss.....Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Haendel..Aria, "Ombra mai fu," from "Serse"
Sametana.....Overture, "The Bartered Bride"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, opened its local season at the Academy last evening. Though 30 members, including the conductor, were abroad this summer, but two changes have been made in the personnel that faced a crowded auditorium. Mr. Grisez's place as first clarinet is taken by Mr. Sand, first clarinet of the Charlottenburg Opera, and Mr. Fosse's post among the oboes is filled by Mr. Stanislaus, solo oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London.

It is hard to imagine how the great "Eroica" could have been better played. ~~The interpretation quite effaced the memory of the barbarous manhandling the work received from the New York Symphony the other evening.~~ This reading pulsated with vitality, was pointed with sudden stress and accent, each instrument on the alert for its own share in fashioning the contrasts of light and shade and rythmic subtleties. The first violins with their blended golden tone, their shimmering touch-and-go as delicate as frostwork in the Scherzo, the plaint of the oboe in the funeral march, the rich, [illegible] the acid split and scatter the tone [illegible] shrapnel) the passionate whir of the flute like the wings of a white bird—these distinctive elements were not more admirable than the concept of the work in its entirety which Doctor Muck and the players divined and enforced.

Like pastmasters in any other profession, they made all they did seem easy. This was true as well of the tremendous, tearing trumpets in Don Juan's erotic delirium, with the lovely interlude of flue, oboe and clarinet amid the melee, the catlike pounces of the kettledrum, and finally that marvelous fugue of the strings keeping the dizzying pace of the Smetana overture.

This was the Boston Orchestra at its best, in execution that was the last word of technical virtuosity, in absolute oneness of purpose, informed and inspired by authentic genius on the part of director and directed.

With reciprocal pleasure in the reappearance, Pasquale Amato, the Metropolitan baritone, gave his hearers two operatic airs that contrasted modern ingenuity with classic simplicity. The Saint-Saens air—especially at the words "Empire reste"—was scarcely within the reach of the easy flexibility of the singer's voice. It was instructive to hear our old friend "Handel's Largo" restored to its original setting and the grateful shade of the apostrophized plane-tree. Admirable as the singing was, with many recalls attesting the vocalist's popularity, one felt that his contribution was perceptibly below the level of the rest of the performance. He seemed more bent on achieving a personal success than his associates in the program, who exalted their message and their mission rather than themselves.

GLOBE'S CHINESE ACT

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 6 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY, LED BY KARL MUCK, HEARD

Esta 1884

Capacity House Greets Famous Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is still the distinguished leader, gave their first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall before a capacity audience. The famous conductor was greeted enthusiastically on his first entrance and had to bow repeatedly to the plaudits of his admirers. At the end of the first offering, Beethoven's immortal "Eroica" symphony, there was another prolonged demonstration, the noise redoubling when the whole orchestra rose to acknowledge the applause.

Evidently Dr. Muck has lost none of his popularity in this city. Evidently, too, Charles Ellis, despite the difficulties he encountered in Germany, has managed to bring together most of the musicians who made up the organization last year.

They played under their leader's baton as only the Boston Orchestra plays. In all of the "Eroica" scherzo, except the trio, they even played unaided by the rhythmical oscillations of his stick, with only an occasional movement of his hand, nod of his head or glance of his eyes to carry them smoothly along.

But if the great symphony in which Beethoven is supposed to have glorified the heroic figure of Napoleon showed plainly the Boston Symphony Orchestra had lost nothing in quality and efficiency, the Brahms Variations on a theme by Haydn, given with exquisite precision and clearness, and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," in which the euphony and transparency of the instrument Dr. Muck had at his command were brought into striking evidence, carried an even more convincing message.

So nicely balanced, perspicuous, plastic and sweepingly melodious a performance of "Don Juan" it is hard to recall. Here the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck were at their best. It seemed, indeed, as if every man was inspired by something more than the desire to do full justice to Strauss's beautiful score.

There the concert might have stopped. Already the hour was late. But few persons left before the programme had come to a close with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, played with stirring rhythmical verve and power. It was a concert not soon to be forgotten.

MAX SMITH.

Scottish Baritone Heard

From GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 9 - 1914

Music.

Concert Chronicles of Two Days —Some Gossip.

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second local concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The audience was as large as usual, which is to say as large as the hall can hold, though it was somewhat less given to applause than usual. The latter phenomenon could hardly put out of countenance a body men [illegible] Hall, Boston.

[44]

---

Brahms's second symphony headed the programme, and the performance accorded it under the leadership of Dr. Muck was one to be received with deep gratitude. The clearness of Dr. Muck's reading, its continuous flow, its feeling for the essential beauty of the music of Brahms made it truly satisfying. The rest of the programme was the kind of thing that it is quite unnecessary for an orchestra to travel from Boston to play in New York. George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" are not without cleverness, especially in the matter of orchestration, but they are at this date of too little importance from any point of view to make it incumbent on the band from Boston to play them on its too rare visits to New York.

In Boston recently Dr. Muck put three pieces by the Finn Sibelius on one programme. Among them was "The Swan of Tuonela." Would that he had put on his programme of Saturday "The Swan of Tuonela," which is almost, if not entirely, unknown in New York, instead of the "Finlandia," which is altogether too well known—brass band music appropriate to [illegible] gardens in summer time.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRAHMS MUSIC

1884

First Matinee Concert Opens With Great Performance of Second Symphony.

SUITE BY MR. CHADWICK

It must have escaped the notice of some of the local commentators on musical matters that on October 23 Dr. Karl Muck conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city in the first performance there of the fourth symphony of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in 1864 in Guingamp, France, and by the latest accounts a resident of the troubled city of Nancy. Possibly the same recorders forget that on the programme of yesterday's matinee was the symphonic poem "Finlandia," by Jan Sibelius, born in Finland and living in Helsingfors, a city in the domains of his Imperial Majesty of Russia.

If these facts had not been overlooked there might have been less said about the exclusively German character of the music at the first concert of the Bostonians on Thursday evening. Dr. Muck is a musician and a great master, as well as a Prussian, and he has under his baton an orchestra in which Germans, Bohemians, Russians, French, Belgians, Italians and Americans are seated together. The beneficent shield of art will protect them all, and therefore it will probably not be necessary again to touch upon the subject of neutrality.

Yesterday afternoon's programme was not one to tax the mind of the listener. It has always been Dr. Muck's plan to make the matinee concerts somewhat simpler in constitution than the evening ones. Whether this is because he has no belief in the theatrical manager's bogey, the "tired business man," or because he is no advocate of the equality of the sexes he has not made known. The plan has certain merits at any rate.

The concert began with the great D major symphony of Brahms, which was sung by the instrumental body in such a manner as to move the really sensitive listener to emotion. Tone of the most luscious quality, perfect balance, exquisite adjustment of the dynamics and the modification of tempi in the nuancing and a masterly arrangement of the details of the performance in their relations to a noble general conception were the salient features of this unique performance.

The symphony was followed by George Whitfield Chadwick's suite for orchestra entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The work has four movements with the names 'Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." They were composed at different times and were first played all together by the Boston Orchestra in Boston on February 7, 1908, Dr. Muck conducting.

A melodious suite is this, sometimes richly and sometimes ineffectively orchestrated, but always bearing the marks of a musician's hand. The preachments of Dr. Dvorak as to American thematic materials were not lost on Mr. Chadwick, who has heard the tune of the Afro-American folk song and found it to his liking. Some of the best thought in his sketches is that which imitates plantation melody.

The first movement is perhaps the most firmly knit of the four, though the slow one has some value. But this suite is not one of the best creations of the distinguished head of the New England Conservatory of Music. It was admirably played, of course, and a similar statement can be made in regard to Sibelius's tuneful song of Finland which brought the concert to a pleasant end.

In the last two weeks Philadelphia has had the chance to hear the very best music that human talent, polished by time and backed by money, can produce.

Three Great Orchestras Here

The Boston Symphony, led by Muck, was the ne plus ultra of harmonious ensemble. Long training has brought it down as near to perfection as human art is likely to get. It seems as though further practice can only maintain it at the highest pinnacle it has reached. One can hardly conceive of its rising higher.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under its young leader, Leopold Stokowski, is following closely in the track of the senior organization. The concerts already given this season have been wonderfully good, and nothing could bring out its excellence better than a comparison with the New York Orchestra last week under Damrosch.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1914

Man muß es Dr. Karl Muck von der Boſtoner Symphonie laſſen: Er hat den Muth ſeiner Ueberzeugung! Beweis: Sein vorgeſtriges Programm, beſtehend aus Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms, Strauß und Weber.

r. Muck hat es nicht nöthig, Neuralitätserklärungen abzugeben, wie manche andere Dirigenten hieſiger Muſik-Geſellſchaften.

1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 8 - 1914

The second of the Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening, Nov. 17. The soloist will be that most admirable pianist, Harold Bauer, and the programme will be devoted to two of the three great "Bs," Beethoven and Brahms. The symphony will be Brahms's delightfully melodious second in D-major with which the orchestra under Dr. Muck has this year had such extraordinary success. Mr. Bauer will play Beethoven's great "Concerto in G-Major, No. 4," and the final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

, 188

HAROLD BAUER,
Pianist Who is to Be the Soloist at the Next Symphony Concert at Infantry Hall Nov. 17.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 1914

Establish

PHILADELPHIA HAS FINE THEATRICALS

On Monday night, the first concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony in Philadelphia, was given at the Academy of Music. The orchestra was directed by Dr. Karl Muck, whose choice of symphonies was the Beethoven "Eroica." Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan"; and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" were other orchestral numbers.

SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 15.

MAJOR HIGGINSON AT 80

To the Young Man of Today the "First Citizen of Boston" Says, "The Only Lasting Satisfaction Any One Gets Out of Life Is What He Does for Other People—To Govern Ourselves a Job That Will Take All Our Energies."

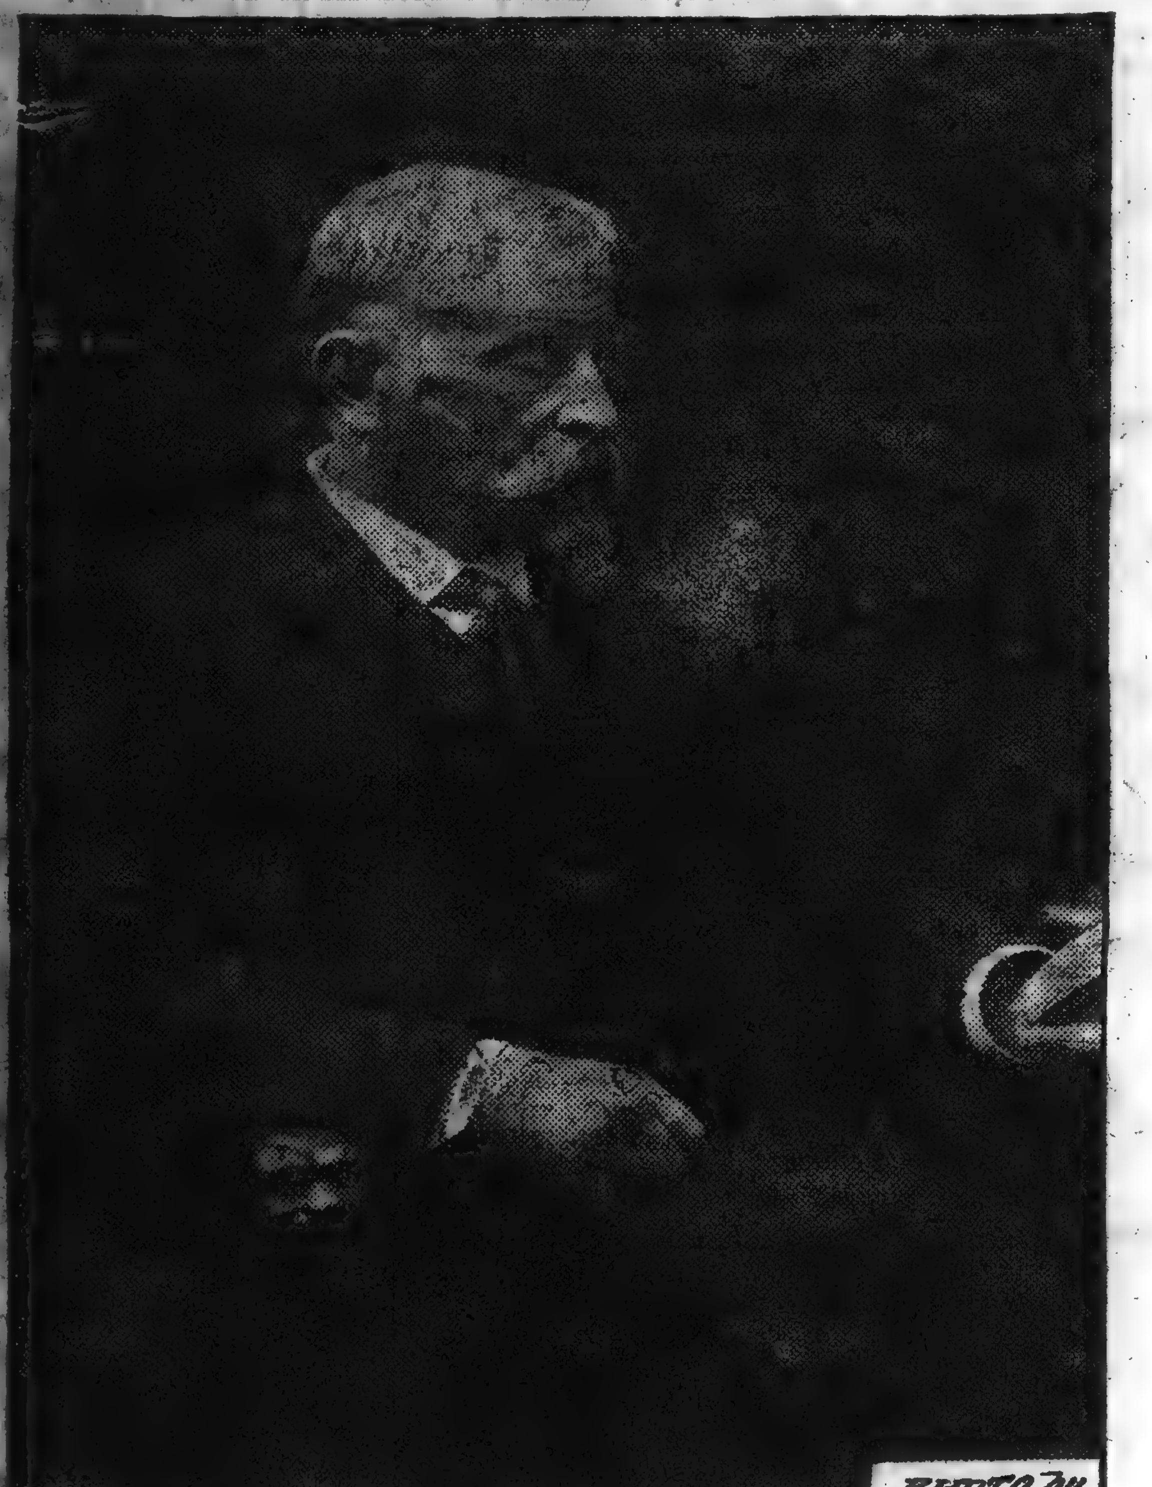

PHOTO. by NOTMAN

MAJ HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

MILESTONES IN MAJ HIGGINSON'S LIFE.

Born in New York, Nov 18, 1834.
Entered Harvard College in 1851.
Volunteered for service at the outbreak of the Civil War.
Wounded at Aldie, Va, in 1863.
Made major and brevet lieutenant of the 1st Massachusetts Cavalry.
Has made possible the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
To him Harvard owes its famous athletic ground, Soldiers Field, given in honor of his fallen comrades in the war, and the Harvard Union.
Is head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co, and trustee of numerous charitable and educational enterprises.

WISE AND PITHY SENTENCES OF MAJ HIGGINSON.

Think of your job and not of yourself.

The only asset anybody has is character.

No single person amounts to much: it is all together that we count.

The only lasting satisfaction any one gets out of life is what he does for other people.

We get things that we don't deserve; and we deserve things that we don't get.

The great thing about doing something well is that it gets you a chance to do something else — the same way.

What pays the highest return is the human dividend.

"Everywhere we see the signs of ferment, questions social, moral, mental, physical, economical. The pot is boiling hard, and you must tend it, or it will run over and scald the world."

"Do not hope that things will take care of themselves, or that the old state of affairs will come back. The world on all sides is moving fast, and you have only to accept this fact, making the best of everything, helping, sympathizing, and so guiding and restraining others who have less education, perhaps, than you. Do not hold off from them, but go straight on with them, side by side."

"Remember that the idle and indifferent are the dangerous classes of the community."

"Your success in life depends, not on talents, but on will."—From the speech at the dedication of Soldiers Field.

This week brings the 80th birthday of Maj Henry L. Higginson. Gallant fighter in the Civil War; benefactor of Harvard; founder of the Symphony Orchestra; builder of business; administrator of charitable funds; contributor to innumerable good causes which the world in general knows nothing of; and tireless server of his country and his community—such are the six decades which have been given to the service of his fellows by the "first citizen of Boston."

What word for the young men of today has this veteran who has been through it all; war and peace; good times and bad; public life and private life; business career and cultivation of the arts?

A bright fire is snapping on the hearth under the pink-marble chimney-piece in the private office on State st. The major sits (in the posture which the painter Sargent has made memorable in a famous portrait), one arm hooked over the chair back, head thrown back at a military tilt. He ruminates for a minute or two, then replies:

"My message to young men is this:

"First, think of your job and not of yourself, and, second, remember that the only lasting satisfaction anyone gets out of life is what he does for other people.

"It is a question, I know, whether young people ever learn these things except in the school of experience. They have their way to make and their livings to earn, and the years of getting started are not easy. But everything which young men have to go through today I think had to be gone through by the young men of any time.

Burns Taken to Slavery.

"The first incident I remember as consciously shaping my life was a remark made by my mother when I was a very little boy; she said that slavery was a crime. The words stuck and stung. She died when I was 15. But those words lived on.

"Then came the Fugitive Slave law and Daniel Webster's great speech. I had always venerated him and it made a most painful impression. It was almost as if he had been a renegade.

"I was down on Central Wharf the day they took away that poor negro, Burns. His main escort was about all the prize-fighters in town, assisted by a few soldiers.

"A small party of us young men looked on at what was happening and said to one another, 'We have got to square this thing somehow, some day.' We knew then that it meant war; and that was in the early '50s.

"But black slavery wasn't the only ferment at work then. We were asking ourselves why one man should have a good coat to his back and another man, just as good, should have none.

"Not one of this group I speak of, of which I alone am left, belonged to a church, but we thought a great deal about religious questions in their practical applications. I knew another young man and I talked of buying a farm and going to live on it in order to get away from the muddle and the compromises and the combinations of life, and 'earn,' as we said, 'an honest living.'

"I realize these things as showing that the things the young men of today are saying and thinking we were saying and thinking then, and I dare say young people always speak and think so. Challenge was in the air. We set little store by conventions—too little, probably. Conventions can be very useful; but we had little use for them.

During the War, and After.

"Then came the war, and hooked up all this odd lot of ideals; gave them something to do. To go was no sacrifice. It was a joy. Men couldn't help going. If they didn't the ground burned under their feet. We felt that this country was a tremendously fine thing and that we had got to see it through.

"I remember how thankful I was that there was nobody who would be particularly worse off if I got put out of the game. Well, there was my father; he would feel it; but no woman. No woman could have had me at that time; I belonged to a cause.

"I think my Army service was as happy a time as I ever spent in my life. Here we were, a party of friends, comrades, sleeping anywhere, mostly on the ground; getting enough to eat generally; with horses; and nothing in the world, nor sure of having anything, even our lives.

"And a merry crew we were. If we ran out of clothes, somebody would send us some more. . . . There was one time when I went for six weeks without having a chance to change my garments. Nobody cared. We were on a bigger errand. This feeling about our country amounted to a passion with us.

"Of that band, one other fellow and I survived, and I am sure I had, naturally, the least ability of any of them. That time I made the speech at the dedication of Soldiers Field I tried to tell what talents were in those brave fellows who died.

"When the questions of the Union and of slavery were settled, I went South and tried cotton growing with a few other men. We went down there with about $80,000 and came back with five.

"Later I came here. I wasn't wanted; times were bad. But I did my share; and by and by they improved. Then came two or three wonderfully good years and my peaceful business of life began.

Money Only for What It Can Do.

"I have never cared about accumulating money. I have cared about making it—because of what one can do with it.

"Suppose a man accumulates a fortune of $30,000,000. He dies. What good is it to him? If people would only realize that what pays the highest return is the human dividend!

"I think Mr Carnegie is getting something out of his money—some durable satisfactions.

"The notion of the Symphony Orchestra was with me vaguely in the 50's when I was in Europe, with no very clear idea of what I was going to do. I saw Europe enjoying all its art and music and felt my own country to be pretty poor in such things.

"And it was. It was pretty barren of enjoyments in those days; dull. Meeting Mrs Kemble in London one time she remarked to me, 'You have planted a flower in a cornfield,' which was about my intention.

"It was not until after those two good business years that I saw myself in a position to do the thing I had had in mind so long before.

"Since then, one thing has led to another. The great thing about doing one thing well is that it gets you a chance to do something else—the same way. Facts have come up which had to be faced, and I have been called to help face them. It is at such times that you learn the importance and the unimportance of money.

"I remember we had a particularly difficult situation to face here in the city a number of years ago, to relieve which involved spending a great deal of money. 'What shall we do?' they asked. 'Spend it,' said I, 'in Heaven's name, spend it. What is money for?'

"And thus, as the years go on, one feels that the time is growing short, and if he is going to get things done, he must be about it. Bad economy; but it does get things done.

"Was the country more democratic when I was a young man? I do not think it can be doubted that it was. Things were simpler then,—complicated as they looked to young eyes.

"I have spoken of how earnestly we thought and felt about the questions which were confronting the country then; there is just as much and more for us to think of today. We have said that we can get along without kings, and emperors and dukes to rule us; that we can govern ourselves. Well, let's do it.

"That is a job which is going to require enormous thought, and patience, and effort and even sacrifice. Democracy is anything but simple, and if you young men can see a way out of our labor difficulties you will be cleverer fellows than we have been.

"When I wrote that article which appeared in the Survey last Winter, to ask that people try to get the other fellow's point of view, it was misunderstood; not wilfully, I think, but misconstrued. What I said was that, in such a world as this at present, we could not expect justice.

"That remark was interpreted to mean that I did not want justice. Everybody wants justice, for others as well as for himself, unless he is a dunce. But I doubt if he invariably gets it.

"We get things that we don't deserve, and we deserve things that we don't get.

"What I said was that we cannot 'expect' justice; and what I meant to convey was that the most any of us can do is the best we can in those circumstances in which we find ourselves.

Character the Only Asset.

"For myself, I look for a way out of the difficulty by profit-sharing. What both sides, laborer and capitalist, need to remember is that we are all in this thing together, and that neither can get along without the other. We're all going in the same procession, and whether we go to Heaven or to smash, we'll all go together."

Maj Higginson is asked, in conclusion, what word he has for the plain, work-a-day young men who have their way to make and their livings to earn today—to the men who, in short, make up the Boston of which he is accounted the leading citizen.

"Just this," replies the major. "Let each make the best use of the chance he has, and do the best he can in the circumstances in which he is placed. Better them if he can; but remember that the only asset anybody has is character.

"No single person amounts to much. I don't amount to much, and you don't amount to much; we are only little pebbles on a great beach where there are plenty more. It is all together that we count."

BOSTON AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 14, 1914.

Witek, Soloist, of Much Power at the Symphony

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Anton Witek was soloist at the fourth Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon. He played the Beethoven Concerto in D major for violin. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius and the Beethoven Egmont Overture completed the program.

Sibelius' symphony is moodful, gusty, stormy and bleak. The Finnish composer has not lost his gift for original melody so remarkable in his earlier works, but he has progressed to the point where he doesn't care what key or how many he is writing in, what combination of notes he uses to produce a chord. It is the fashion to be careless in writing music, to rush on to your goal without regard for any rule that may impede your march, and Sibelius is keeping up with the procession. It is a big work, masterful and contains much peculiar color.

Anton Witek is developing into his full powers as a violinist. He played the concerto with a splendor, a grasp and an understanding that was very gratifying, while his technical brilliance was really astounding. The concerto, composed in 1806 by Beethoven for Clement, and has been a favorite with violinists because it is as beautiful as it is difficult, and a good performance is an achievement. Witek was very warmly applauded.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 14,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SIBELIUS'S STRANGE MUSIC HEARD AGAIN

A Performance of Remarkable Eloquence—The Theatre of the Composer's Imagination Behind His Tones—Their Power, Beauty, Magic and Suggestion—Beethoven, Twice Over, and New Distinctions for Mr. Witek

QUESTION the music of Sibelius's newest and much-debated symphony as the hearer might yesterday afternoon, there was no questioning the eloquence of the performance. Each time that Dr. Muck conducts in the piece, like the rest of us at each time in which we hear it, he has the pleasure of deeper penetration into its baffling content and of clearer and more significant expression of music and of mood. Not even a symphony by Mozart is a more transparent mirror than is this symphony of Sibelius—widely different as they are—of the orchestra that is playing it. The Finn is an economical composer. Spontaneous though his music almost always sounds, he seems to have considered every measure of it before he set it on paper, and not one—or so much as a note in it—is wasted. Every stroke tells; or, if it fails, the fault lies with orchestra or conductor. Scarcely a composer of our time excels Sibelius in the transparency of his instrumentation. Most of them thicken their tonal speech; he weaves each strand of it luminously. If the conductor's care relaxes for a moment, if the player makes the smallest slip, his shortcoming stands revealed.

As Sibelius seems to express his thought or feeling with exact completeness—in the inevitable tone as Stevenson sought the inevitable word—so must the player, under the conductor's guiding, make his animating utterance. Therein lies one of the unusual exactions of Sibelius's scores in the music of our time, and each and every player in the orchestra, under Dr. Muck's impulse, fulfilled it yesterday. However the symphony impressed its hearers, by every test that a listener may apply, it sounded with its true voice.

The second exaction that Sibelius lays upon the conductor and the orchestra in this fourth symphony is yet more difficult to meet. Unmistakably it is music of intense mood, vivid picture and fleeting and poignant suggestion. To impart all three the composer relies not only on the voice of his melodies and the tang of his progressions; but upon the color and the accent that conductor and players shall impart to both, upon their sensitiveness and imagination with the very timbres of their instruments. He uses not a strange harmony; he assembles not one piercing juxtaposition of the orchestral voices; he fashions no singular chord and he wanders not among unrelated keys without some purpose in mood or imagining suggested or conveyed. He would clearly have the conductor and the band apprehend this purpose and fulfil it from no more than his notes on the engraved page and their intuitions under them. He asks an orchestra of Sibeliuses in little, but none the less enkindled. Each hearing of the symphony stirs and strengthens the notion that there is a "programme" behind it—not a "programme" in the ordinary sense but a succession of mental pictures and even scenes to which Sibelius wrote his music that it might bear the larger moods and the changeful suggestions that they wakened tonally in him. He likes to write music of place, as many of his tone-poems witness; he likes to write music for stage-plays as he has done more than once; he has even composed a pantomime, long and elaborate, for Anna Pavlova. In the fourth symphony he may plausibly and in more than the usual sense have been writing music for the pictures, the scenes, the static rather than the dramatic suggestion of the richly filled and the vividly animate theatre of his own imagination.

Yet without a hint to either audience or orchestra beyond that of his music, Sibelius bids both imagine and feel these pictures and these static scenes in measure as he sees and experiences them. He would even have the orchestra utter them with the intensity of impression and suggestion that he has himself undergone and, undergoing, has wrought into his music. A superhuman task that does more credit to Sibelius's daring than to his wisdom. In common human infirmity every audience is bound to break under such a requirement. Tha of yesterday listened intently, but almos from end to end of the symphony withou any communicating emotional response tha such an assembly emanates when it is really stirred. Per contra, Dr. Muck and the orchestra came as near as mortals are likely to come to the working of Sibelius's miracle. They achieved his compact completeness of utterance. The music did sound like the inevitable tonal speech of sensations stirring and mounting behind it. The performance was as luminous as one of Sibelius's own northern lights on a still, clear day. No less, alike on the part of the conductor and the men, it teemed with imagination, emotion and suggestion.

Out of these, by every transmitting and enhancing resource that Dr. Muck and the individual players could call to their aid, the melodies of the first movement emerged struggling, from the grim and solitary and cavernous tonal blackness of the introduction, to run their broken, striving, sombre and mournful course. Out of them came the incessant instrumental and harmonic flicking—now light and again heavy—music of kaleidoscopic motion as in pale sunlight, music of nervous gayety that loses breath and spirit, almost before it has begun. Imagination, emotion and suggestion, in every choice of pace and emphasis and tonal color that the conductor must make, released the grim, grave and pondered song of the third movement, swelled it, impassioned it, idealized it, led it through its life and death; for if ever music sounded the tragedy of a melody, so does this largo of Sibelius.

Perhaps this imagination and suggestion in conductor and men had the climax of its play in the finale. Who may surmise or half-surmise from its purely musical content what is mirroring in that strange theatre of Sibelius's imagination? It begins in nervous excitement, whirr, rustle and beat, then it is as though a curtain lifted and masses of men heaved themselves across its stage reeling to strange rhythms, making barbaric gesture to strange progressions, shouting and calling in strange harmonies. Slithering trumpets dismiss them; the great gray curtain of desolation descends. The nervous excitement fades and dies. Surmise what the stirred and striving listener may—and until Sibelius gives the clew, there will be as many surmises as there are hearers—the orchestra quivered with the nervous frenzy of the begining, reeled with the Mongol rhythms and intervals and dropped the gray curtain upon it, as though it were equal master of the tonal murmurings before it and the tonal mass in which it seemed to fall, overspreading, upon all the world.

Until Sibelius gives a hint of play and picture within the theatre of his imagination—and he owes it to orchestras and audiences so to do—many a hearer must listen to this fourth symphony as to an "absolute" music, self-contained. Even so, it does not lack moments of sweeping power, of magical and penetrating beauty and of poignant suggestion. Often this power sweeps through measure after measure as in the long evocation of grim and cavernous blackness with which the symphony begins or in the sustained heights of the tragedy—the agony almost—in which the melody of the slow movement is born and lives and struggles and dies. Often this magic makes interval after interval and timbre upon timbre seem like some uncanny phantasmagoria moving in broken pace and rhythm yet with a strange, fascinating, momentary beauty that at length overcomes resisting sensation. It is so in the scherzo; it is so, with power to wing it, in the finale.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 14,

'SIBELIUS' AGAIN FAILS TO IMPRESS

Finnish Composer's Symphony Given for Second Time; Witek Charms as Soloist.

The second hearing of the Sibelius symphony No. 4, the first number on the program at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon, left the audience in much the same doubt as to what the composer had in mind as did the first hearing. It's certain he was not in his happiest mood at the time, for the work seems to speak only of the shadows of life, as though such a matter as sunshine did not exist. It was well to give the composition a second time, so that those puzzled by the first hearing could have another opportunity of trying to solve the puzzle. It is safe to say, however, that no third hearing is eagerly sought.

But if the Sibelius number, excellently played as it was, failed to afford any striking satisfaction, there was no doubt of the pleasure given by the playing of the Beethoven Concerto by Mr. Witek, concert master of the orchestra and yesterday afternoon's soloist. Never have his fine artistic abilities been better displayed. Fortunate, indeed, is Boston to have such a sterling artist in its orchestra. The third and closing number, the Beethoven Egmont overture, seemed a timely selection.

Next week Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, is to be the soloist.

EVENING RECORD.

NOVEMBER 14

SYMPHONY BY SIBELIUS HEARD FOR SECOND TIME

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius—Symphony in A minor, No. 4.
Beethoven—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.

A lofty programme, in which Sibelius' new symphony (heard here for the second time) did not gain by its companionship with two great Beethoven works. But it was well to hear this modern symphony again. It is in a wholly different vein from the folksong character which is in many of the compositions of Sibelius. One can scarcely imagine that the work is by the composer of "Finlandia," which we heard recently, says Louis C. Elson in his Symphony review in the Advertiser.

That the symphony is in large degree experimental is evident. The composer has entered into the ultra-modern school of weird progression and of restless rhythms One finds the whole-tone progressions of Debussy (and of Siamese music) copiously employed. But Sibelius has more to say than some of his contemporaries in this free vein, and he does not employ the extravagant scoring which is characteristic of some of the modern works. We were glad to hear the important work again, but we found no more in it than we could gather at a single hearing. It is a composition which the earnest music-lover will "first endure" and "then pity," but never "embrace." We do not think that Sibelius has any business in the pasture of Schoenberg.

Then Beethoven, like a poultice came, to heal the wounds of Sibelius. The Beethoven violin concerto is a monolith among concertos. When, years ago, the "America" won the great yachting-cup race, Queen Victoria asked (as the America was sighted): "Who is second?" The answer was: "Your Majesty, there is no second!" One may apply this to the D major violin concerto: there is no second to it; it stands alone. But very few can scale its Alpine heights, or conquer its massive breadth and its technical difficulties.

But to Mr. Witek there are no technical difficulties. He surmounts them all with an imperturbability that is sometimes exasperating. One would expect to see some show of effort, but in Mr. Witek's playing there seems the minimum of effort, and the auditor enjoys that sense of security which has a charm of its own. The first movement might have had more breadth, if it was to be quite upon the level of Kreisler or Ysaye, but the great figure of four repeated notes was given with much majesty, and the important orchestral part was united with the solo in a perfect ensemble.

MONITOR
Nov. 14, 1914

DR. MUCK OFFERS SIBELIUS FOURTH SYMPHONY AGAIN

Audience Not Yet Used to Style of Finnish Composer's Writing, Which Neglects Color to Pay Attention to Theme Weaving

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; fourth public rehearsal, Anton Witek, soloist. Sibelius, fourth symphony in A minor; Beethoven, concerto for violin in D major; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

It is a long time since the Friday afternoon audience had a problem in esthetics which it had no answer for. As a rule, when a work from one of the modern schools is offered, the rehearsal house is ready with approval or disapproval. If the conductor offers a symphony in four movements, with rests between, it registers its opinion decisively at the close of each division and it sums up its views at the close in handclapping that votes the composition either to a place in the repertory or else to an indefinite term on the library shelf.

The vote in the case of symphonies is more often than not unfavorable. For the modern listener does not much favor the idea of composers writing in the old four-movement form. He likes descriptive music. He wants the orchestra to represent something, whether it be a picture, a legend, a novel, a drama, or a career. Writers who have had symphonies more or less formal played for the first time in the last five seasons are Rachmaninoff, Elgar, Weingartner, Borodin, Lendvai, Clapp, Sibelius, Urack and Ropartz. The shortness of the list indicates a declining interest in the symphony as a means of musical expression. Of these nine composers, one only, the Russian Rachmaninoff, aroused enthusiasm. That may have been because he had appeared at the Boston [illegible] and piano soloist, and because a tone poem of his descriptive of a famous painting had brought him popularity. A second in the list, the Finnish Sibelius, awakened curiosity. His fourth symphony, played a year ago, succeeded in stirring up argument. Therefore the public was glad to have it repeated this year. For argument about music is supposed to mean that a new epoch is dawning, that perhaps a new Wagner is to start a revolution.

A public that has maintained an orchestra of the first acclaim through two or three musical revolutions will be fain to furnish comfort to one side or the other when the next one opens. So the fourth symphony of the Finnish tone-thinker is given a second hearing.

Why his philosophy strikes the ears of the rehearsal folk dubiously is not hard to explain. His method of approach is a complete reversal of that used by all other modern orchestral composers. His method, indeed, is so strange as to obscure his message. The Friday listeners have not yet heard this symphony. If they had, they would have recorded their valuation on it. They have so far only begun to get used to the writer's manner. They have not come to the point where they can listen to him without regard to what is accidental and unimportant.

The difference between Sibelius and other music makers of the day is that he suppresses tone color, while they all exploit it to the utmost. Now a public that is accustomed to taking in musical ideas through the medium of rich combinations of sound is not going to accept at once ideas presented through a thin and cold scheme. The whole purpose of orchestral writing since Wagner took a hand at it has been beautiful effect, dramatic effect or descriptive effect, through uniting the qualities of the instrumental groups. Color blend has gone through all possible developments from Wagnerian mellowness to Straussian harshness. Even in Debussy, who made the Frenchman's protest for artistic moderation, did not abandon the main

---

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,

NOVEMBER 14,

EVEN DR. MUCK IS FORCED TO SMILE

Symphony Orchestra Again Plays Symphonic Maze by Sibelius.

After the first quarter of the Sibelius symphony was over, at yesterday's Symphony concert, the audience seemed bewildered; after the second movement nearly everyone smiled, and the wonder is that some ultra-conservative did not let out a hoarse, derisive, motor-horn sort of laugh; after the third section came a little round of spontaneous applause, as if from people cheered by a few gleams of lights after being lost in the dark and subjected to stange and dismal noises; and when this anarchical work was brought to an end after a wild scramble through a conglomeration of keys the audience gave the heroic orchestra an ovation.

This same fourth symphony of the formerly restrained Scandinavian composer was first played here a little more than a year ago. It remains, too, for the most part, as cryptic and bizarre as it was then. The exception to the rule is the third movement, the largo, which might be described as a tone poem suggested by the chills and shadows of the long winter's nights in the northern world. Those who enjoy this Futurist music are to be envied, like those who can extract sweetness from the persimmon. Even Dr. Muck, who led the orchestra through a brilliant performance of disjointed themes and topsy-turvy progressions, could not suppress his smiles after the scherzo came floundering feebly to an end. No doubt new beauties will be discovered next year in the weird and wonderful work.

The soloist of this week's concerts is Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, whose performance of the Beethoven concerto in D minor was marked not only by technical strength, but by exquisite delicacy of tone and by pure artistic feeling. This number was thoroughly enjoyable. It did not muddle the heads of the people and grate on their sensibilities.

The program, which will be offered again tonight, ends with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

BOSTON GLOBE

NOVEMBER 14.

SIBELIUS' FOURTH SYMPHONY PLAYED

Original, Formidable Work Given Superbly.

Mr Witek Distinguishes Himself in the Beethoven Concerto.

The fourth Symphony rehearsal was given yesterday afternoon, Dr Muck conducting the following program with Mr Witek, concert master of the orchestra as soloist:

Sibelius..................Fourth Symphony
Beethoven............Concerto for Violin
Beethoven.........Overture to "Egmont"

When Sibelius visited this country last June, he was found by those who walked, had conversation and broke bread with him, to be a man apparently of normal physical functions, sound in body and mind, reticent as to his own accomplishments, but of a calm, courageous spirit, neither a neurotic nor a misanthrope. This was comforting to many. When this fourth symphony was played here last season, there were some who supposed the composer a hopeless hypochondriac, a morbid, melancholy fellow headed for the mad house.

The countenance of Nature smiling upon one may be frowns to another. Sibelius has confessed in a letter to a fellow Finn his love for "the mysterious sounds of fields, forests, water, mountains." Commentators upon Finnish music hasten to find all of these bleak, spare, sere, and of an otherwise forbidding Nature. Wordworth, when commemorating the haunts of his youth near Tintern Abbey—"the sounding cataract" which haunted him "like a passion, the tall rock, the mountain, the deep and glowing wood," found that such passion, "its aching joys and dizzy raptures" was no more, that "these wild ecstasies," were "matured into a sober pleasure." Would soberness have advanced into melancholy, could he have written a symphony?

What aspect of Nature or of National life is mirrored in this work is left for conjecture. Individual appreciation of it was perhaps more general than at its performance last year. Many doubtless counted it as 40 minutes to be sat through until Mr Witek could play the Beethoven concerto. Some came prepared to be deeply moved and were thrilled. No one could have been deaf to the amazing insight and sympathy of Dr Muck's interpretation. The composer has invited indifference, if not disdain. Such a score would be unfathomable to any but a great conductor and a company of virtuosi.

It is music of stupendous originality and daring; as though the composer's thought had burst the boundaries of established musical science. Tonalities are grouped as notes are grouped in chords. A key will shed its eight bars ahead of its rising into sight and sound. Recall the pungent, gripping advent of the horns early in the first movement. One dissonant note may be known as an appogiatura to a consonant one. Wagner treated one phrase in like manner as the approach to the tonality of another. Here the suspense, the nervous intensity is extended through long passages of anticipation.

Thematically the structure shows the economy of material, the significance, the organic relation of every figure. There are recurring motives used in the cyclic fashion, persisting through more than one movement, metamorphosed through a category of moods, lyric and dramatic. How curious the emotional phases of the bleak ascending skip of the diminished fifth, queried insistently near the close by the oboe. Dynamically, it is a work of suppressed, restive energy; never weakly querulous in its complaint, often fiercely, superbly rebellious; as in the sweeping, cumulative lines of protesting crescendoes of the brass, as in the upward flights of the strings, and the dramatic punctuation to a strong thought by the whole orchestra.

There are surprises, as in the abruptly ended scherzo, as a jest left lightly in air, to be taken by those who know, but it is not a work of mere startling tricks. Save for a few measures, as the 'cellos in the slow movement and the flute duet in the scherzo, there is an evasion, a disdain of sensuous beauty. The prevailing mood is of sepulchral gloom. If it be great music—and greatness of orchestral mind is here unquestioned—it is great despite its morbidity. The world has learned how to sigh and to weep sufficiently well.

Mr Witek displayed the noble art as an interpreter which he has taught this public to expect from him. There was the elevation of spirit, the quiet majesty, the tenderness, the humanity that is breathed forth in the musical soul of Beethoven. A brilliant technician in bravura and rhapsody, Mr Witek surpassed himself in the slow movement. It was a song of lofty beauty, at times, as the return of the theme after the cadenza, too intimate, too precious to be published broadcast, music too ethereal in spirit for other than the most discerning, the most cherishing ears. The Egmont overture, although at the close of a long concert, should have consoled those who grieve at the spectacle of Beethoven obliged to keep the company of futurists who feed on such irritating stimulants as minor seconds.

HERALD.
NOVEMBER 14. 1914

WITEK SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Concert Master Plays Beethoven Concerto—Sibelius's Symphony Performed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows: Sibelius, symphony in A minor, No. 4; Beethoven, concerto for violin; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

This symphony of Sibelius was played at a Symphony concert in October of last year. When Mr. Walter Damrosch brought it out in New York in the preceding March he made a few remarks before he gave the signal for beginning. He said that the music was of an anomalous character, and then wished the audience to know that the performance under his direction did not necessarily prove that he thought well or poorly of the work. He put it on the program only because he believed it his duty towards a distinguished composer. This was hardly fair to the hearers, for they were left to judge for themselves whether the music was good or bad. If Mr. Damrosch had only said the word! The reception of the symphony might have been different and the critics would have had their cue. We do not like to think of Mr. Walter Damrosch thus shirking a great responsibility.

Dr. Muck is not in the habit of addressing an audience concerning the merits or demerits of a composition about to be performed; nor does he favor the hearers with comments after the movements of a symphony. He is a conductor, not an exegete of the Athenian, Antiochian, Berlin, Boston, or even the Bayreuth school. He rehearses the work and he conducts it. He may like the music; he may dislike it. Raising his baton, he may say to himself, with Christopher Sly: "'Tis a very excellent piece of work; would 'twere done." But he keeps his opinions to himself, and regards it as his chief duty to do full justice to the composer.

Sibelius is thought, and not necessarily by disciples of Buckle alone, to be influenced by Finish scenery, climate, and diet. Hence there is talk about his being the painter in tones of his country; the bleakness, darkness, harshness of certain compositions are thus appropriate, inevitable; yet travellers assure us that Finland has sunny days and smiling landscapes; they go so far as to speak well of the cookery at a hotel in Helsingfors. Nor are the Fins at work in this country peculiarly and romantically lugubrious.

There is no doubt of the sincerity of Sibelius in this symphony. As he felt, as he thought, so he wrote. There is not a measure that is deliberately popular. There are many measures disdainful of the crowd. The meek lover of beauty, as beauty is generally understood, finds little in this music to please him. The lover of sensational effects is bitterly disappointed. Had the composer a program in mind? Or is the symphony a phantasmagoria of moods? There are suggestions of sleep-chasings, themes imagined but interrupted, reiterated figures that are now impressive, now grotesque, calls as of sea-birds, moanings of the wind, the sight of dismal moors, recollections of former gaiety, tasks to be accomplished but for some unknown reason put aside—all heard and experienced in sleep, as though the composer said to himself when half awake: "I'll make use of this in my next symphony," and then turned to dream again.

Impressionistic music, it leaves only impressions. Perhaps to Sibelius everything is clear. For he is no routine composer; no correct academician. In this symphony, as in his concerto for violin, he shows himself a seer; but the seer's vision is to the prosaic a stretch of mist and darkness, and the voices that speak to the seer are to those near him like a hollow murmur, confused mutterings, a Babel of sound.

Mr. Witek gave an unusually fine performance of Beethoven's concerto; fine in its thorough appreciation of the music's character, in nicety of nuances, in a display of technical proficiency which was subservient to purity and clarity of interpretation, to the setting forth the classically romantic spirit of the work.

The overture to "Egmont" is singularly appropriate in these troubled days: the lament of an oppressed people, the cruelty of Alva, and then the shouting of an aroused and angry poeple; at last the triumph and the rejoicing.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Strauss, Symphonic Fantasia "From Italy"; Ravel, Spanish Rhapsody; Dvorak, "Waldesruhe" and Rondo for 'cello (Mr. Warnke, 'cellist); Scheinpflug, Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare.

POST, SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 14.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY FEATURES

Beethoven Concerto and Overture in Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The most important, the most prophetic symphony which has appeared since the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck—that is to say, the fourth symphony of Jean Sibelius; the Beethoven violin concerto, with Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, for soloist, and the "Egmont" overture, made the substance of the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

A FORBIDDING WORK

Sibelius' symphony was heard for the first time in Boston on the 24th of last October. It is a grim and forbidding work. The composer is not amusing himself. He is not heedful of the wishes of his public, nor is his doctrine the alluring one of beauty for beauty's sake. It is true that the artistic significance of the music is exceptional, aside from its emotional force. There are daring innovations—a fact which seldom makes for popularity. Today one cannot imagine this symphony ever becoming a favorite composition with an audience.

Still, stranger things have happened. Yesterday the applause, although not the applause of the majority, was hearty and persistent, and a marked contrast to the reception of the work a year ago. Dr. Muck was recalled three times. The orchestra, at his bidding, rose from their seats in acknowledgement.

Disconcerting episodes of this kind are common in the history of music. Even we can remember the impression made by the beautiful and now popular symphony of Cesar Franck, when it was introduced here only a few years ago. Then there was d'Indy's austere and highly intellectual second symphony, abhorrent upon first acquaintance. It is now accepted by the majority. It is seen to be beautiful.

The symphony of Sibelius is not less original than that of D'Indy, or less commanding in its position in the world of art. One does not know which to admire the most, the unflinshing sincerity of a great man and an unquiet soul, in self-communion, so absorbed that even the hearer forgets the presence of an audience, or the exquisitely finished workmanship, the purely esthetic value of the composition. Every page is a model of artistic balance and completeness. No measure, no chord, could well be added or taken away. Fewer instruments are employed than in any other symphony of Sibelius, and with greater effect.

Bears Impress of Worth

Then there is the choice of musical material, and the originality, the unalterable logic of its development. No "precious," ultra-modern Frenchman ever steered more completely clear of the obvious or expected, and yet this symphony is as direct, as uncompromising, as inevitable as anyone of the representative works of a man whose creations have always been remarkable for their simplicity and primeval power. The distinction of the uncommon is here the result of ideas and convictions. It is farthest from the labored artificiality of much modern music. Sibelius has made new departures which leave a wide gap between this composition, and any work of his which preceded it, yet technic was never a more sensitive and faithful medium of expression, never more unconditionally the servant of inspiration.

The symphony is lonely and incomparable. It bears the impress of solitary northern nature, but in the midst of this nature is a man, despairing, accusing the sullen skies. The composer, like the Demon of Poe, curses with the curse of Silence. Feeling is so intense at moments that it threatens to become overmastering, yet there is not felt the relief that may follow an emotional expansion, for the music remains restless, unsatisfied, pent-up.

The originality of the score and its subtle, psychologic quality become appreciable only by degrees. With all its subjectivity, with all the boldness of the workmanship, and the singularly impressionistic quality of many pages, the work is structurally as solid as the rock of Gibraltar. One is constantly marvelling at the cunning and the resource with which the composer makes fresh employment of established principles of symphonic procedure. Even when he appears most wayward, as, for instance, in the "free fantasia" of the first movement, he is as precise in his intention and his execution, as sure of his position and his ultimate purpose, as was Franz Joseph Haydn when he composed a sonata for the clavichord. But there is here a modern intellectuality, an intense individualism, of which Haydn never dreamed.

Heavy With Prophecy

A great work! A work which reveals the composer [illegible] a far more significant aspect than that of any of his preceding compositions. At the beginning Sibelius had shown qualities which entitled him to a place at the head, let us say, of that group of "nationalists" who include such talents as Grieg, Dvorak, Smetana in their circle. But the fourth symphony is heavy with prophecy. It cannot fail to open new paths for the younger men. It must be accepted as the work of one of the great artists and seers of the age. So much is surely true, whatever may be one's personal attitude toward the music.

For some this introspective music, wrought by a Northern temperament, will be obnoxious. They will object that no man, whatever his gifts, has a right to the sentiments of the Misanthrope of Moliere, hugging his mood and his corner. But Sibelius' corner is not a small one, and the tragic is as important and as purifying an element in art today as it was 2000 years ago.

The fourth symphony has been discussed at such length because it is still only partly comprehensible, and it should be approached sympathetically. It must be added that other factors than this mountainous work and its superb interpretation by Dr. Muck and his players made the concert memorable. Great is Sibelius, but Beethoven is humanity's prophet, and time will see to it that few tower beside him. Mr. Witek gave a performance of Beethoven's concerto that will stand out in the memory after many concerts have been forgotten. We do not remember a finer performance of the work considered from any point of view, and Dr. Muck's reading of the Egmont overture was not a whit less impressive. No better illustration of the Titanic genius of Beethoven could have been furnished than by this concert. Even the most sincere, perhaps the most talented composer of today was small before him.

ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 14

THIS WEEK AT THE SYMPHONY

SIBELIUS' A-MINOR IS HEARD A SECOND TIME

Two Beethoven Works Complete the Programme, Mr. Witek Being Soloist in Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius—Symphony in A minor, No. 4.
Beethoven—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.

A lofty programme, in which Sibelius' new symphony (heard here for the second time) did not gain by its companionship with two great Beethoven works. But it was well to hear this modern symphony again. It is in a wholly different vein from the folksong character which is in many of the compositions of Sibelius. One can scarcely imagine that the work is by the composer of "Finlandia," which we heard recently.

That the symphony is in large degree experimental is evident. The composer has entered into the ultra-modern school of weird progression and of restless rhythms One finds the whole-tone progressions of Debussy (and of Siamese music) copiously employed. But Sibelius has more to say than some of his contemporaries in this free vein, and he does not employ the extravagant scoring which is characteristic of some of the modern works. We were glad to hear the important work again, but we found no more in it than we could gather at a single hearing. It is a composition which the earnest music-lover will "first endure" and "then pity," but never "embrace." We do not think that Sibelius has any business in the pasture of Schoenberg.

The symphony opens with an impressive passage which is almost a "motto" phrase because of its frequent recurrence. This opening is sombre and the orchestration is gloomy. That reiteration, which we have learned to expect in Norse music, is present and gives a picturesque monotony which has its peculiar charm. Evil is prognosticated, and that ugly tone-color which is orchestrally connected with balefulness, the muted horn, is much in evidence. The old-fashioned auditor who wants a tune will be decidedly disappointed in this first movement, for instead of melody there is dissonance, gloomy mutterings, and one seems to be wandering in a thunder-cloud occasionally illuminated with lightning flashes. Yet, if one will but yield to the mood, there is something that is great in this part of the work, in spite of its fragmentary vein.

But even the admirer of the work may find fault with its lack of contrast, for the second movement is also fragmentary even if less dark than its predecessor. Yet there was enough of dissonant trouble in this also, and there were also passages that were incomprehensible.

The movements do not follow the ordinary symphonic scheme, and Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, and Brahms would probably deny its right to the title of symphony, but we have wandered far from the la[illegible] leaders.

Nevertheless, this work had better be called a Rhapsody or a Threnody.

The third movement introduces a very long-continued organ-point. To the uninitiated we will explain that an organ-point is a bass-note sustained unchanged through many changing harmonies in the upper parts. Again one can complain of lack of contrast, for the same device is employed at great length in the finale, and in this last movement there are some of the most bitter harmonies and progressions that we have ever heard, a mixture of musical quassia and wormwood, which suggests that the composer is dissatisfied about something—and, so, probably, are the general public.

But we must not forget that Sibelius has shown his ability to compose in the clearest forms, and that he has created melodies that are as pure as folk-songs. If, therefore, he chooses to alter his vein of expression, we may dissent, we may heartily dislike, but we must still treat his work with respect, and examine it as the production of a master.

There were certain suspensions in the Finale which were very complex, yet could be reasoned out by the musician, but to the layman it must have seemed at times as if the whole orchestra had lost the key.

Yet at the end there was a small, but very active minority, who forced a recall, and even a double one, when the orchestra was made to stand up in acknowledgment. And then many auditors went into the corridor to get a little air, the first obtainable since the beginning of the programme.

Then Beethoven, like a poultice came, to heal the wounds of Sibelius. The Beethoven violin concerto is a monolith among concertos. When, years ago, the "America" won the great yachting-cup race, Queen Victoria asked (as the America was sighted): "Who is second?" The answer was: "Your Majesty, there is no second!" One may apply this to the D major violin concerto: there is no second to it; it stands alone. But very few can scale its Alpine heights, or conquer its massive breadth and its technical difficulties.

But to Mr. Witek there are no technical difficulties. He surmounts them all with an imperturbability that is sometimes exasperating. One would expect to see some show of effort, but in Mr. Witek's playing there seems the minimum of effort, and the auditor enjoys that sense of security which has a charm of its own. The first movement might have had more breadth, if it was to be quite upon the level of Kreisler or Ysaye, but the great figure of four repeated notes was given with much majesty, and the important orchestral part was united with the solo in a perfect ensemble.

The finale falls off somewhat in loftiness, although its technical path is as bristling as the other movements, and Mr. Witek gave this with appropriate dash and vigor. The first cadenza was rather long, but the broad strokes on the G string, the pure and brilliant double-stopping, the effective martellato touches, and the surety of the skips, made it interesting throughout. All in all it was a great performance, and Mr. Witek was recalled again and again with the most spontaneous enthusiasm imaginable.

The "Egmont" overture is also a work to conjure with. When Beethoven was composing anything about Liberty he worked himself up into a frenzy of triumph, as witness his Heroic symphony, or his finale in the Ninth. Even if Motley upsets the statue that Goethe set up and shows us Egmont as shallow, vacillating and vain, nevertheless we can take this musical picture as a sketch of what the hero ought to have been. No better contrast can be imagined than that of the stern hero and the gentle Claerchen, as here portrayed, and the fierce interruptions, the ponderous strokes of fate seem the more terrible when falling upon the gentle nature of the heroine.

That Dr. Muck drew this picture with great power may well be imagined. But it was in the coda that all the glory of the work shone forth. Here the piccolo was unchained and proceeded to shriek in a manner that showed Freedom on the wildest kind of a rampage, and with a burst of overwhelming triumph the concert ended. And, by the way, our orchestral students might notice with what a simple score Beethoven manages to attain his triumphant effect. The modern composer would probably require a quadrupled orchestra and a few of the Kaiser's big howitzers to make such a tumult of victory.

BOSTON HERALD.
NOVEMBER 14. 1914

WITEK SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Concert Master Plays Beethoven Concerto—Sibelius's Symphony Performed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows: Sibelius, symphony in A minor, No. 4; Beethoven, concerto for violin; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

This symphony of Sibelius was played at a Symphony concert in October of last year. When Mr. Walter Damrosch brought it out in New York in the preceding March he made a few remarks before he gave the signal for beginning. He said that the music was of an anomalous character, and then wished the audience to know that the performance under his direction did not necessarily prove that he thought well or poorly of the work. He put it on the program only because he believed it his duty towards a distinguished composer. This was hardly fair to the hearers, for they were left to judge for themselves whether the music was good or bad. If Mr. Damrosch had only said the word! The reception of the symphony might have been different and the critics would have had their cue. We do not like to think of Mr. Walter Damrosch thus shirking a great responsibility.

Dr. Muck is not in the habit of addressing an audience concerning the merits or demerits of a composition about to be performed; nor does he favor the hearers with comments after the movements of a symphony. He is a conductor, not an exegete of the Athenian, Antiochian, Berlin, Boston, or even the Bayreuth school. He rehearses the work and he conducts it. He may like the music; he may dislike it. Raising his baton, he may say to himself, with Christopher Sly: "'Tis a very excellent piece of work; would 'twere done." But he keeps his opinions to himself, and regards it as his chief duty to do full justice to the composer.

Sibelius is thought, and not necessarily by disciples of Buckle alone, to be influenced by Finish scenery, climate, and diet. Hence there is talk about his being the painter in tones of his country; the bleakness, darkness, harshness of certain compositions are thus appropriate, inevitable; yet travellers assure us that Finland has sunny days and smiling landscapes; they go so far as to speak well of the cookery at a hotel in Helsingfors. Nor are the Fins at work in this country peculiarly and romantically lugubrious.

There is no doubt of the sincerity of Sibelius in this symphony. As he felt, as he thought, so he wrote. There is not a measure that is deliberately popular. There are many measures disdainful of the crowd. The meek lover of beauty, as beauty is generally understood, finds little in this music to please him. The lover of sensational effects is bitterly disappointed. Had the composer a program in mind? Or is the symphony a phantasmagoria of moods? There are suggestions of sleep-chasings, themes imagined but interrupted, reiterated figures that are now impressive, now grotesque, calls as of sea-birds, meanings of the wind, the sight of dismal moors, recollections of former gaiety, tasks to be accomplished but for some unknown reason put aside—all heard and experienced in sleep, as though the composer said to himself when half awake: "I'll make use of this in my next symphony," and then turned to dream again.

Impressionistic music, it leaves only impressions. Perhaps to Sibelius everything is clear. For he is no routine composer; no correct academician. In this symphony, as in his concerto for violin, he shows himself a seer; but the seer's vision is to the prosaic a stretch of mist and darkness, and the voices that speak to the seer are to those near him only a hollow murmur, confused mutterings, a Babel of sound.

Mr. Witek gave an unusually fine performance of Beethoven's concerto; fine in its thorough appreciation of the music's character, in nicety of nuances, in a display of technical proficiency which was subservient to purity and clarity of interpretation, to the setting forth the classically romantic spirit of the work.

The overture to "Egmont" is singularly appropriate in these troubled days: The lament of an oppressed people, the cruelty of Alva, and then the shouting of an aroused and angry poeple; at last the triumph and the rejoicing.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Strauss, Symphonic Fantasia "From Italy"; Ravel, Spanish Rhapsody; Dvorak, "Waldesruhe" and Rondo for 'cello (Mr. Warnke, 'cellist); Scheinpflug, Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare.

POST, SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 14,

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY FEATURES

Beethoven Concerto and Overture in Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The most important, the most prophetic symphony which has appeared since the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck—that is to say, the fourth symphony of Jean Sibelius; the Beethoven violin concerto, with Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, for soloist, and the "Egmont" overture, made the substance of the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

A FORBIDDING WORK

Sibelius' symphony was heard for the first time in Boston on the 24th of last October. It is a grim and forbidding work. The composer is not amusing himself. He is not heedful of the wishes of his public, nor is his doctrine the alluring one of beauty for beauty's sake. It is true that the artistic significance of the music is exceptional, aside from its emotional force. There are daring innovations—a fact which seldom makes for popularity. Today one cannot imagine this symphony ever becoming a favorite composition with an audience.

Still, stranger things have happened. Yesterday the applause, although not the applause of the majority, was hearty and persistent, and a marked contrast to the reception of the work a year ago. Dr. Muck was recalled three times. The orchestra, at his bidding, rose from their seats in acknowledgement.

Disconcerting episodes of this kind are common in the history of music. Even we can remember the impression made by the beautiful and now popular symphony of Cesar Franck, when it was introduced here only a few years ago. Then there was d'Indy's austere and highly intellectual second symphony, abhorrent upon first acquaintance. It is now accepted by the majority. It is seen to be beautiful.

The symphony of Sibelius is not less original than that of D'Indy, or less commanding in its position in the world of art. One does not know which to admire the most, the unflinshing sincerity of a great man and an unquiet soul, in self-communion, so absorbed that even the hearer forgets the presence of an audience, or the exquisitely finished workmanship, the purely esthetic value of the composition. Every page is a model of artistic balance and completeness. No measure, no chord, could well be added or taken away. Fewer instruments are employed than in any other symphony of Sibelius, and with greater effect.

Bears Impress of Worth

Then there is the choice of musical material, and the originality, the unalterable logic of its development. No "precious," ultra-modern Frenchman ever steered more completely clear of the obvious or expected, and yet this symphony is as direct, as uncompromising, as inevitable as anyone of the representative works of a man whose creations have always been remarkable for their simplicity and primeval power. The distinction of the uncommon is here the result of ideas and convictions. It is farthest from the labored artificiality of much modern music. Sibelius has made new departures which leave a wide gap between this composition, and any work of his which preceded it, yet technic was never a more sensitive and faithful medium of expression, never more unconditionally the servant of inspiration.

The symphony is lonely and incomparable. It bears the impress of solitary northern nature, but in the midst of this nature is a man, despairing, accusing the sullen skies. The composer, like the Demon of Poe, curses with the curse of Silence. Feeling is so intense at moments that it threatens to become overmastering, yet there is not felt the relief that may follow an emotional expansion, for the music remains restless, unsatisfied, pent-up.

The originality of the score and its subtle, psychologic quality become appreciable only by degrees. With all its subjectivity, with all the boldness of the workmanship, and the singularly impressionistic quality of many pages, the work is structurally as solid as the rock of Gibraltar. One is constantly marvelling at the cunning and the resource with which the composer makes fresh employment of established principles of symphonic procedure. Even when he appears most wayward, as, for instance, in the "free fantasia" of the first movement, he is as precise in his intention and and his ultimate purpose, as was Franz Joseph Haydn when he composed a sonata for the clavichord. But there is here a modern intellectuality, an intense individualism, of which Haydn never dreamed.

his execution, as sure of his position

Heavy With Prophecy

A great work! A work which reveals the composer in a far more significant aspect than that of any of his preceding compositions. At the beginning Sibelius had shown qualities which entitled him to a place at the head, let us say, of that group of "nationalists" who include such talents as Grieg, Dvorak, Smetana in their circle. But the fourth symphony is heavy with prophecy. It cannot fail to open new paths for the younger men. It must be accepted as the work of one of the great artists and seers of the age. So much is surely true, whatever may be one's personal attitude toward the music.

For some this introspective music, wrought by a Northern temperament, will be obnoxious. They will object that no man, whatever his gifts, has a right to the sentiments of the Misanthrope of Moliere, hugging his mood and his corner. But Sibelius' corner is not a small one, and the tragic is as important and as purifying an element in art today as it was 2000 years ago.

The fourth symphony has been discussed at such length because it is still only partly comprehensible, and it should be approached sympathetically. It must be added that other factors than this mountainous work and its superb interpretation by Dr. Muck and his players made the concert memorable. Great is Sibelius, but Beethoven is humanity's prophet, and time will see to it that few tower beside him. Mr. Witek gave a performance of Beethoven's concerto that will stand out in the memory after many concerts have been forgotten. We do not remember a finer performance of the work considered from any point of view, and Dr. Muck's reading of the Egmont overture was not a whit less impressive. No better illustration of the Titanic genius of Beethoven could have been furnished than by this concert. Even the most sincere, perhaps the most talented composer of today was small before him.

ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 14

THIS WEEK AT THE SYMPHONY

SIBELIUS' A-MINOR IS HEARD A SECOND TIME

Two Beethoven Works Complete the Programme, Mr. Witek Being Soloist in Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius—Symphony in A minor, No. 4.
Beethoven—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.

A lofty programme, in which Sibelius' new symphony (heard here for the second time) did not gain by its companionship with two great Beethoven works. But it was well to hear this modern symphony again. It is in a wholly different vein from the folksong character which is in many of the compositions of Sibelius. One can scarcely imagine that the work is by the composer of "Finlandia," which we heard recently.

That the symphony is in large degree experimental is evident. The composer has entered into the ultra-modern school of weird progression and of restless rhythms One finds the whole-tone progressions of Debussy (and of Siamese music) copiously employed. But Sibelius has more to say than some of his contemporaries in this free vein, and he does not employ the extravagant scoring which is characteristic of some of the modern works. We were glad to hear the important work again, but we found no more in it than we could gather at a single hearing. It is a composition which the earnest music-lover will "first endure" and "then pity," but never "embrace." We do not think that Sibelius has any business in the pasture of Schoenberg.

The symphony opens with an impressive passage which is almost a "motto" phrase because of its frequent recurrence. This opening is sombre and the orchestration is gloomy. That reiteration, which we have learned to expect in Norse music, is present and gives a picturesque monotony which has its peculiar charm. Evil is prognosticated, and that ugly tone-color which is orchestrally connected with balefulness, the muted horn, is much in evidence. The old-fashioned auditor who wants a tune will be decidedly disappointed in this first movement, for instead of melody there is dissonance, gloomy mutterings, and one seems to be wandering in a thunder-cloud occasionally illuminated with lightning flashes. Yet, if one will but yield to the mood, there is something that is great in this part of the work, in spite of its fragmentary vein.

But even the admirer of the work may find fault with its lack of contrast, for the second movement is also fragmentary even if less dark than its predecessor. Yet there was enough of dissonant trouble in this also, and there were also passages that were incomprehensible.

The movements do not follow the ordinary symphonic scheme, and Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, and Brahms would probably deny its right to the title of symphony, but we have wandered far from the landmarks set by these leaders.

there seems the minimum of effort, and the auditor enjoys that sense of security which has a charm of its own. The first movement might have had more breadth, if it was to be quite upon the level of Kreisler or Ysaye, but the great figure of four repeated notes was given with much majesty, and the important orchestral part was united with the solo in a perfect ensemble.

The finale falls off somewhat in loftiness, although its technical path is as bristling as the other movements, and Mr. Witek gave this with appropriate dash and vigor. The first cadenza was rather long, but the broad strokes on the G string, the pure and brilliant double-stopping, the effective martellato touches, and the surety of the skips, made it interesting throughout. All in all it was a great performance, and Mr. Witek was recalled again and again with the most spontaneous enthusiasm imaginable.

The "Egmont" overture is also a work to conjure with. When Beethoven was composing anything about Liberty he worked himself up into a frenzy of triumph, as witness his Heroic symphony, or his finale in the Ninth. Even if Motley upsets the statue that Goethe set up and shows us Egmont as shallow, vacillating and vain, nevertheless we can take this musical picture as a sketch of what the hero ought to have been. No better contrast can be imagined than that of the stern hero and the gentle Claerchen, as here portrayed, and the fierce interruptions, the ponderous strokes of fate seem the more terrible when falling upon the gentle nature of the heroine.

That Dr. Muck drew this picture with great power may well be imagined. But it was in the coda that all the glory of the work shone forth. Here the piccolo was unchained and proceeded to shriek in a manner that showed Freedom on the wildest kind of a rampage, and with a burst of overwhelming triumph the concert ended. And, by the way, our orchestral students might notice with what a simple score Beethoven manages to attain his triumphant effect. The modern composer would probably require a quadrupled orchestra and a few of the Kaiser's big howitzers to make such a tumult of victory.

Nevertheless, this work had better be called a Rhapsody or a Threnody.

The third movement introduces a very long-continued organ-point. To the uninitiated we will explain that an organ-point is a bass-note sustained unchanged through many changing harmonies in the upper parts. Again one can complain of lack of contrast, for the same device is employed at great length in the finale, and in this last movement there are some of the most bitter harmonies and progressions that we have ever heard, a mixture of musical quassia and wormwood, which suggests that the composer is dissatisfied about something—and, so, probably, are the general public.

But we must not forget that Sibelius has shown his ability to compose in the clearest forms, and that he has created melodies that are as pure as folk-songs. If, therefore, he chooses to alter his vein of expression, we may dissent, we may heartily dislike, but we must still treat his work with respect, and examine it as the production of a master.

There were certain suspensions in the Finale which were very complex, yet could be reasoned out by the musician, but to the layman it must have seemed at times as if the whole orchestra had lost the key.

Yet at the end there was a small, but very active minority, who forced a recall, and even a double one, when the orchestra was made to stand up in acknowledgment. And then many auditors went into the corridor to get a little air, the first obtainable since the beginning of the programme.

Then Beethoven, like a poultice came, to heal the wounds of Sibelius. The Beethoven violin concerto is a monolith among concertos. When, years ago, the "America" won the great yachting-cup race, Queen Victoria asked (as the America was sighted): "Who is second?" The answer was: "Your Majesty, there is no second!" One may apply this to the D major violin concerto: there is no second to it; it stands alone. But very few can scale its Alpine heights, or conquer its massive breadth and its technical difficulties.

But to Mr. Witek there are no technical difficulties. He surmounts them all with an imperturbability that is sometimes exasperating. One would expect to see some show of effort, but in Mr. Witek's playing

SUNDAY POST,

NOVEMBER 22,

SYMPHONY SALUTES FOUNDER

Orchestra Honors Maj. Higginson With the "Tusch"

The highest honor a band of musicians can pay, the "tusch," was the tribute paid to Major Henry L. Higginson by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The "tusch" is a ceremony well known in Europe, where it is the salute accorded on very rare occasions, and only to the very greatest men. It consists of a fanfare of trumpets with rolling drums.

AUDIENCE JOINS SALUTE

The salute came as the aftermath of the dinner given Major Higginson last Wednesday on the occasion of his 80th birthday. Just before last night's concert began Frederick P. Cabot appeared at the front of the hall and spoke briefly to Major Higginson.

"In these concerts," said Mr. Cabot, "you have given to each of us a wonderful revelation of beauty, and we, the listeners, join with the orchestra in this greeting and expression of love and gratitude."

Thereupon Dr. Muck raised his baton and the orchestral salute was sounded, while the audience rose to its feet and applauded for minutes.

There were shouts of "Speech, speech," but the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though touched by the tribute, preferred to sit down with the rest of the audience and participate with them in the enjoyment of the orchestral performances that redound so greatly to his honor.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 21,

CATCHY NUMBERS AT THE SYMPHONY

First 'Cellist Charms as the Soloist in Dvorak Selections.

There was a friskiness about yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra that kept you alert whether you willed or no. Right from the first number the Strauss symphonic fantasia "From Italy," just how true the number is to real Italy doesn't particularly matter, there was a snap and go that appealed. Strauss even at this early date gave promise of his later greatness. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" and the Rondo for 'cello and orchestra afforded one of those eagerly awaited opportunities of hearing Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. The Dvorak numbers came pretty close to being the feature of the concert.

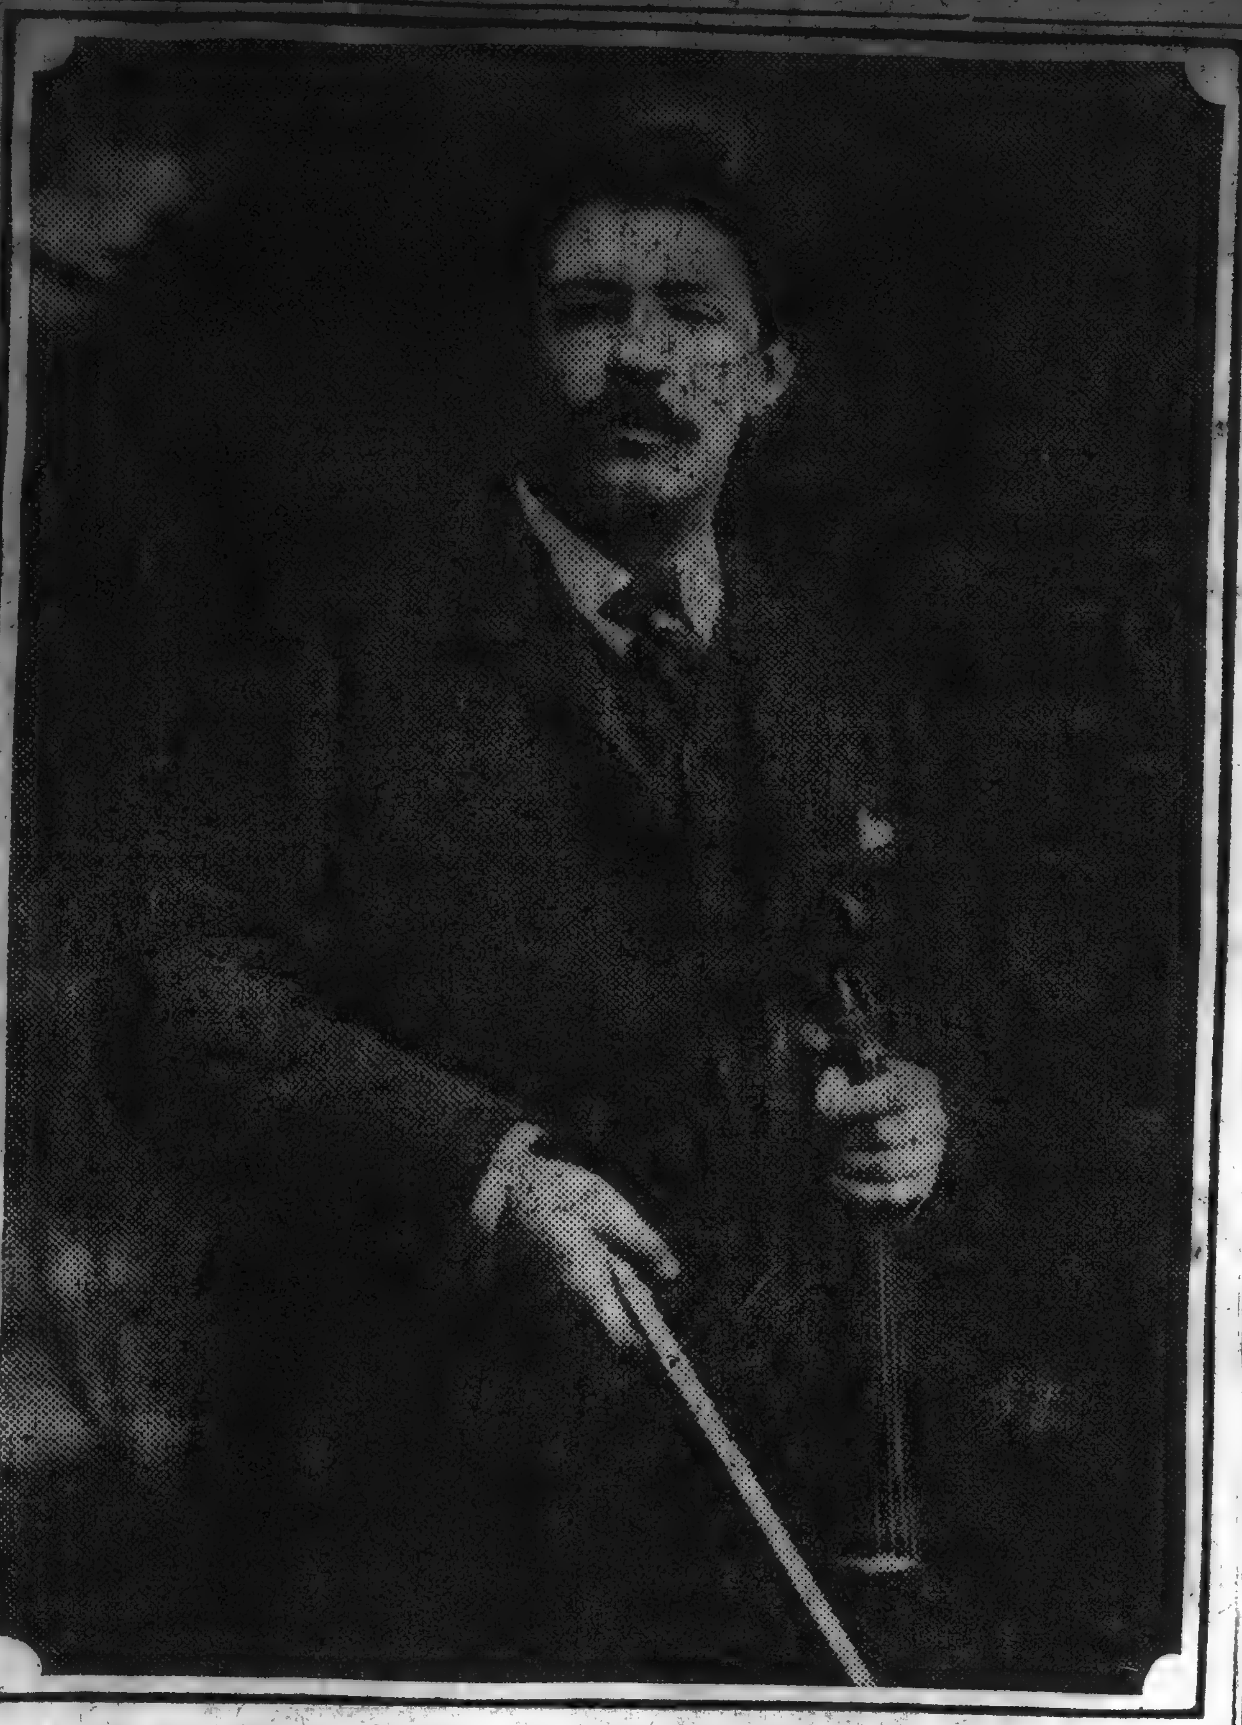
Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," played for the first time at these concerts, proved well worth the hearing. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," which particular comedy is left to the hearer's imagination, with which the concert closed, would doubtless had made a better impression had it not been overshadowed by the merit of the earlier numbers.

Tomorrow afternoon comes the first of the annual pension fund concerts, with Dr. Muck leading the orchestra in an all-Wagner program.

Next week's concerts will bring Harold Bauer as soloist in the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4. The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter" and Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," will round out the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

WOUNDED VIOLINIST IN U. S. FOR TOUR



(Photo copyrighted by Aime Dupont, N. Y.)

FRITZ KREISLER

◆

KREISLER SHOT COSSACK WHO WOUNDED HIM

Famed Austrian Violinist, in New York, Tells His War Experiences.

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist who took part in the fighting around Lemberg early in September and was wounded in the thigh by a Cossack lance thrust, returned today on the Holland-American liner Rotterdam.

As a result of his wound Mr. Kreisler was in a hospital near Vienna for several weeks and is not entirely recovered yet. He looked white and walked with the aid of a cane. Mrs. Kreisler, who accompanied him, was a Red Cross nurse in Austria until she broke down under the strain. She said today that she had nursed the wounded of "all nations."

After the mobilization Mr. Kreisler was made a lieutenant in the Third Jaeger Regiment at Gratz. This command was in training near Gratz for a month before being sent to the front to support Lemberg. Mr. Kreisler gave a description of his work in the trenches, where the fighting went on for four days before the attacks of the Cossacks began to close in on the Austrian lines.

Cossacks Irresistible

"The Cossacks came on in irresistible numbers and finally our defense was overcome," said he. "We had been shooting the men and horses for three days as they advanced in their whirling formation, but their attacks were spirited and they always gained in strength instead of losing.

"They would come at us at night, as well as during the day, so we had to be always watchful. On the afternoon of the fourth day they burst across an open space before the trenches, yelling like Indians, and coming in great volume. The cracking of our machine guns did not suffice to drown out their screaming, nor did it stop the rush.

Shot Down the Cossack

"It is no cinch, as you say, to stand and watch a Cossack charge, especially if they are riding right at you. But our men faced them very well, although we could not stem that horde—that is, not before they rode us down. They rode right across us, and the hoof of one of the foremost horses struck my shoulder, inflicting a painful bruise. Then another Cossack came thundering over me, and as the horse jumped the trench its rider's lance slashed me in the right thigh.

"He did not get away, though. As he jumped I emptied my revolver at him and he toppled over on the other side of the trench, dead.

Lay in Trench for Hours

"I lay in the trench in pretty bad shape for seven hours. Although the Cossacks took our position, they were driven back again, and finally my orderly found me. After seven hours without attention I was very weak and I did not care much whether they picked me up or not. If my orderly had not been faithful I should not have played the violin again, at any rate.

"Finally they found me and I was taken from one hospital to another. They were all so crowded that I was taken to Baden-bi-Wien before I found permanent quarters."

Mrs. Kreisler's Red Cross Work

At this point in the narrative Mrs. Kreisler broke in and told how she was doing Red Cross work in a hospital in Vienna and had not heard from her husband for six weeks. At last there was word of him from a brother officer, and she finally discovered that he was lying wounded in a hospital not so very far from that in which she was tending injured men. She immediately went to his side.

Mr. Kreisler's wound did not heal very quickly at first and the surgeons told him that he would be lame for at least a year. As long as he was incapacitated for military service he was allowed by the Austrian military authorities to come to this country for his tour.

The Kreislers will stop for a time at the Netherland.

Mrs. Kreisler said that the Emperor Franz Josef of Austria visited the army hospitals at Vienna every day and that she had many conversations with him. He seemed to be in good health, but was depressed.

SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 29, 1914

Boston Symphony Today

The Orchestra of 1881 and 1914—Fruits of the Labors of 34 Years—Men Who Made Possible the Fulfilment of Early Ideals—Concerts and Recitals

The Post publishes today, on Page 5 of the Second Feature Section, photographs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it appears today and as it appeared in 1881. At that time, although undoubtedly one of the best orchestras then in existence in this country, the band was, of course, inferior both in numbers and in the quality of its performances to the present organization. It may be said that the phenomenal development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its constantly increasing prestige, its incalculable force for musical righteousness in the United States, are the direct results of the character of Major Higginson's ideals, and the practical foresight shown by him in making his plans for the orchestra's future, back in 1880.

How clearly he foresaw the possibilities and the difficulties of his task is shown in early chapters of Mr. M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," which was issued from the presses of the Houghton Mifflin Company, on the 18th of this month, in commemoration of Major Higginson's 80th birthday. In quoting from the original plan drawn up by Major Higginson, Mr. Howe justly remarks that to those who read it at that time "it must have seemed a document of surprising promise. The surprise after an intervening third of a century must be that so many of its promises have been fulfilled."

Mr. Howe's book, which may be earnestly recommended to the many who feel an interest in the affairs and the accomplishments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an account of the circumstances which led to Mr. Higginson's decision to found an orchestra of the first importance in Boston, of the early years of struggle and development when the path of the new enterprise was not of the smoothest, of the successive conductors who came to Boston and the character of their work, of the comments of the music critics who were active in the course of the 30-odd years of the orchestra's development. The book is not merely a collection of data. It is a living picture of a most significant period in the musical history of this city. It includes the publication of letters of Major Higginson and others concerned with the orchestra, now appearing for the first time in print.

A fact which stands out in the history of this orchestra, and which is patent in the light of present activities at Symphony Hall, is the solidity with which the business affairs, as well as the artistic ambitions of the orchestra, have been undertaken. A symphony orchestra is not a money-making institution. Major Higginson has not only founded, but maintained the Symphony Orchestra of this city, by meeting, in nearly every year of its existence, a large deficit. No expense has been spared to gain any necessary artistic end, but the money that has been spent has been spent very wisely and well. Major Higginson's spirit has been emulated by his executives, and the traditions of Symphony Hall are such as promise to be handed down to future generations, after the years that have seen the orchestra's development to the position of one of the three or four greatest orchestras in the world have gone by. The history of this organization is not only the history of one man's achievement. It is testimony to the best elements of the New England character and New England ideals. To the thrice admirable management at Symphony Hall, to the men who have served Mr. Higginson with conspicuous fealty and enthusiasm, the public of the country owes also a very considerable debt. As for Major Higginson himself there is no need, at this time and in this place to speak of the public's gratitude and esteem.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET

NOVEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE CHARMED BY BAUE

Great Pianist Receives Ovation at Second Concert of Boston Orchestra.

Beethoven and Brahms—names power in the world of music—he a monopoly in the programme of th Boston Symphony Orchestra on the oc casion of the second concert of the sea son at Infantry Hall, last night. It wa an evening lacking in novelties, b abounding in the beauties of a pr gramme not too severe for the averag concert goer while eminently satisfyin to the classicist. It was, in short, typical Symphony concert, which aft all is a sufficiently descriptive term fo any who have in the past had the plea ure of listening to this truly great o chestra.

But in spite of the greatness of th orchestra and the power of its achieve ments there are times when it takes se ond place by the common consent of i own members and the choice of its a dience. Last evening, with Haro Bauer as the soloist, was manifestly o of these occasions. The eminent pianis recognized the world over as one of th greatest living masters of his instru ment, received an ovation at the clo of his marvellously played concer which is rarely accorded a pianist, a r cognition of achievement only to granted to positive genius.

The symphony was the second Brahms in D-major, a work which h grown rapidly and steadily in the est mation of audiences and has becom more popular with conductors in rece years. It abounds in the beauties man fested by Brahms in his kindliest moo it lacks neither the dreamy sweetne nor the rugged power of the master a his greatest, and it is undoubtedly o of the masterworks of music which a sure to live as long as organized orche tras command the attention of discrim nating audiences.

There is no need to affirm that it wa splendidly played. Dr. Muck's interpre tation of the works of Beethoven, Brahm and the other inspired symphonists, ha been too often heard by American aud ences to require any exposition of h methods. It is sufficient to say that th orchestra was completely responsive his most subtle mastery, completing performance of the highest class.

Mr. Bauer played Beethoven's fourt concerto, a work which has been playe by the world's pianists since the tim of the great composer. Strong and mas terly with a love for his instrumen which seems to dominate his entire pe sonality, Bauer is unquestionably to included in the small and select grou of great pianists. There is no manne ism no affection of any kind. A sim ple but powerful personality lends self to the interpretation of the maste work until the spirit of the compose fairly dominates the piece. In thes days when the horrors of war hav seized on the emotions of men in music home countries, when the master violi ist, Kreisler, has been transformed int a killing machine, it is especially grat fying to music lovers that the great Ger man pianist has not thought it necessa to join his Austrian brother virtuoso o the battle front.

At the close of the concerto he wa greeted by a torrent of applause, re called time and again to the front of th platform and compelled to bow his ac knowledgment of a stormy ovation.

The final number was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," whic was played by the orchestra with stri ing effect, and was a fitting close to splendid concert.

SUNDAY POST,

NOVEMBER 22,

SYMPHONY SALUTES FOUNDER

Orchestra Honors Maj. Higginson With the "Tusch"

The highest honor a band of musicians can pay, the "tusch," was the tribute paid to Major Henry L. Higginson by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The "tusch" is a ceremony well known in Europe, where it is the salute accorded on very rare occasions, and only to the very greatest men. It consists of a fanfare of trumpets with rolling drums.

AUDIENCE JOINS SALUTE

The salute came as the aftermath of the dinner given Major Higginson last Wednesday on the occasion of his 80th birthday. Just before last night's concert began Frederick P. Cabot appeared at the front of the hall and spoke briefly to Major Higginson.

"In these concerts," said Mr. Cabot, "you have given to each of us a wonderful revelation of beauty, and we, the listeners, join with the orchestra in this greeting and expression of love and gratitude."

Thereupon Dr. Muck raised his baton and the orchestral salute was sounded, while the audience rose to its feet and applauded for minutes.

There were shouts of "Speech, speech," but the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though touched by the tribute, preferred to sit down with the rest of the audience and participate with them in the enjoyment of the orchestral performances that redound so greatly to his honor.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 21,

CATCHY NUMBERS AT THE SYMPHONY

First 'Cellist Charms as the Soloist in Dvorak Selections.

There was a friskiness about yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra that kept you alert whether you willed or no. Right from the first number the Strauss symphonic fantasia "From Italy," just how true the number is to real Italy doesn't particularly matter, there was a snap and go that appealed. Strauss even at this early date gave promise of his later greatness. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" and the Rondo for 'cello and orchestra afforded one of those eagerly awaited opportunities of hearing Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. The Dvorak numbers came pretty close to being the feature of the concert.

Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," played for the first time at these concerts, proved well worth the hearing. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," which particular comedy is left to the hearer's imagination, with which the concert closed, would doubtless had made a better impression had it not been overshadowed by the merit of the earlier numbers.

Tomorrow afternoon comes the first of the annual pension fund concerts, with Dr. Muck leading the orchestra in an all-Wagner program.

Next week's concerts will bring Harold Bauer as soloist in the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4. The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter" and Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," will round out the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25,

WOUNDED VIOLINIST IN U. S. FOR TOUR

(Photo copyrighted by Aime Dupont, N. Y.)

FRITZ KREISLER

◆

KREISLER SHOT COSSACK WHO WOUNDED HIM

Famed Austrian Violinist, in New York, Tells His War Experiences.

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist who took part in the fighting around Lemberg early in September and was wounded in the thigh by a Cossack lance thrust, returned today on the Holland-American liner Rotterdam.

As a result of his wound Mr. Kreisler was in a hospital near Vienna for several weeks and is not entirely recovered yet. He looked white and walked with the aid of a cane. Mrs. Kreisler, who accompanied him, was a Red Cross nurse in Austria until she broke down under the strain. She said today that she had nursed the wounded of "all nations."

After the mobilization Mr. Kreisler was made a lieutenant in the Third Jaeger Regiment at Gratz. This command was in training near Gratz for a month before being sent to the front to support Lemberg. Mr. Kreisler gave a description of his work in the trenches, where the fighting went on for four days before the attacks of the Cossacks began to close in on the Austrian lines.

Cossacks Irresistible

"The Cossacks came on in irresistible numbers and finally our defense was overcome," said he. "We had been shooting the men and horses for three days as they advanced in their whirling formation, but their attacks were spirited and they always gained in strength instead of losing.

"They would come at us at night, as well as during the day, so we had to be always watchful. On the afternoon of the fourth day they burst across an open space before the trenches, yelling like Indians, and coming in great volume. The cracking of our machine guns did not suffice to drown out their screaming, nor did it stop the rush.

Shot Down the Cossack

"It is no cinch, as you say, to stand and watch a Cossack charge, especially if they are riding right at you. But our men faced them very well, although we could not stem that horde—that is, not before they rode us down. They rode right across us, and the hoof of one of the foremost horses struck my shoulder, inflicting a painful bruise. Then another Cossack came thundering over me, and as the horse jumped the trench its rider's lance slashed me in the right thigh.

"He did not get away, though. As he jumped I emptied my revolver at him and he toppled over on the other side of the trench, dead.

Lay in Trench for Hours

"I lay in the trench in pretty bad shape for seven hours. Although the Cossacks took our position, they were driven back again, and finally my orderly found me. After seven hours without attention I was very weak and I did not care much whether they picked me up or not. If my orderly had not been faithful I should not have played the violin again, at any rate.

"Finally they found me and I was taken from one hospital to another. They were all so crowded that I was taken to Baden-bi-Wien before I found permanent quarters."

Mrs. Kreisler's Red Cross Work

At this point in the narrative Mrs. Kreisler broke in and told how she was doing Red Cross work in a hospital in Vienna and had not heard from her husband for six weeks. At last there was word of him from a brother officer, and she finally discovered that he was lying wounded in a hospital not so very far from that in which she was tending injured men. She immediately went to his side.

Mr. Kreisler's wound did not heal very quickly at first and the surgeons told him that he would be lame for at least a year. As long as he was incapacitated for military service he was allowed by the Austrian military authorities to come to this country for his tour.

The Kreislers will stop for a time at the Netherland.

Mrs. Kreisler said that the Emperor Franz Josef of Austria visited the army hospitals at Vienna every day and that she had many conversations with him. He seemed to be in good health, but was depressed.

SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 29, 1914

Boston Symphony Today

The Orchestra of 1881 and 1914—Fruits of the Labors of 34 Years—Men Who Made Possible the Fulfilment of Early Ideals—Concerts and Recitals

The Post publishes today, on Page 5 of the Second Feature Section, photographs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it appears today and as it appeared in 1881. At that time, although undoubtedly one of the best orchestras then in existence in this country, the band was, of course, inferior both in numbers and in the quality of its performances to the present organization. It may be said that the phenomenal development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its constantly increasing prestige, its incalculable force for musical righteousness in the United States, are the direct results of the character of Major Higginson's ideals, and the practical foresight shown by him in making his plans for the orchestra's future, back in 1880.

How clearly he foresaw the possibilities and the difficulties of his task is shown in early chapters of Mr. M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," which was issued from the presses of the Houghton Mifflin Company, on the 18th of this month, in commemoration of Major Higginson's 80th birthday. In quoting from the original plan drawn up by Major Higginson, Mr. Howe justly remarks that to those who read it at that time "it must have seemed a document of surprising promise. The surprise after an intervening third of a century must be that so many of its promises have been fulfilled."

Mr. Howe's book, which may be earnestly recommended to the many who feel an interest in the affairs and the accomplishments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an account of the circumstances which led to Mr. Higginson's decision to found an orchestra of the first importance in Boston, of the early years of struggle and development when the path of the new enterprise was not of the smoothest, of the successive conductors who came to Boston and the character of their work, of the comments of the music critics who were active in the course of the 30-odd years of the orchestra's development. The book is not merely a collection of data. It is a living picture of a most significant period in the musical history of this city. It includes the publication of letters of Major Higginson and others concerned with the orchestra, now appearing for the first time in print.

A fact which stands out in the history of this orchestra, and which is patent in the light of present activities at Symphony Hall, is the solidity with which the business affairs, as well as the artistic ambitions of the orchestra, have been undertaken. A symphony orchestra is not a money-making institution. Major Higginson has not only founded, but maintained the Symphony Orchestra of this city, by meeting, in nearly every year of its existence, a large deficit. No expense has been spared to gain any necessary artistic end, but the money that has been spent has been spent very wisely and well. Major Higginson's spirit has been emulated by his executives, and the traditions of Symphony Hall are such as promise to be handed down to future generations, after the years that have seen the orchestra's development to the position of one of the three or four greatest orchestras in the world have gone by. The history of this organization is not only the history of one man's achievement. It is testimony to the best elements of the New England character and New England ideals. To the thrice admirable management at Symphony Hall, to the men who have served Mr. Higginson with conspicuous fealty and enthusiasm, the public of the country owes also a very considerable debt. As for Major Higginson himself there is no need, at this time and in this place to speak of the public's gratitude and esteem.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET

NOVEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE CHARMED BY BAUE

Great Pianist Receives Ovation at Second Concert of Boston Orchestra.

Beethoven and Brahms—names power in the world of music—h a monopoly in the programme of t Boston Symphony Orchestra on the o casion of the second concert of the se son at Infantry Hall, last night. It wa an evening lacking in novelties, b abounding in the beauties of a pr gramme not too severe for the avera concert goer while eminently satisfyi to the classicist. It was, in short, typical Symphony concert, which aft all is a sufficiently descriptive term f any who have in the past had the plea ure of listening to this truly great o chestra.

But in spite of the greatness of t orchestra and the power of its achiev ments there are times when it takes se ond place by the common consent of i own members and the choice of its a dience. Last evening, with Haro Bauer as the soloist, was manifestly o of these occasions. The eminent pianis recognized the world over as one of t greatest living masters of his instr ment, received an ovation at the clo of his marvellously played concer which is rarely accorded a pianist, a r cognition of achievement only to granted to positive genius.

The symphony was the second Brahms in D-major, a work which h grown rapidly and steadily in the est mation of audiences and has becom more popular with conductors in rece years. It abounds in the beauties man fested by Brahms in his kindliest moo it lacks neither the dreamy sweetne nor the rugged power of the master his greatest, and it is undoubtedly o of the masterworks of music which a sure to live as long as organized orch tras command the attention of discrim nating audiences.

There is no need to affirm that it wa splendidly played. Dr. Muck's interpr tation of the works of Beethoven, Brahn and the other inspired symphonists, h been too often heard by American aud ences to require any exposition of h methods. It is sufficient to say that t orchestra was completely responsive his most subtle mastery, completing performance of the highest class.

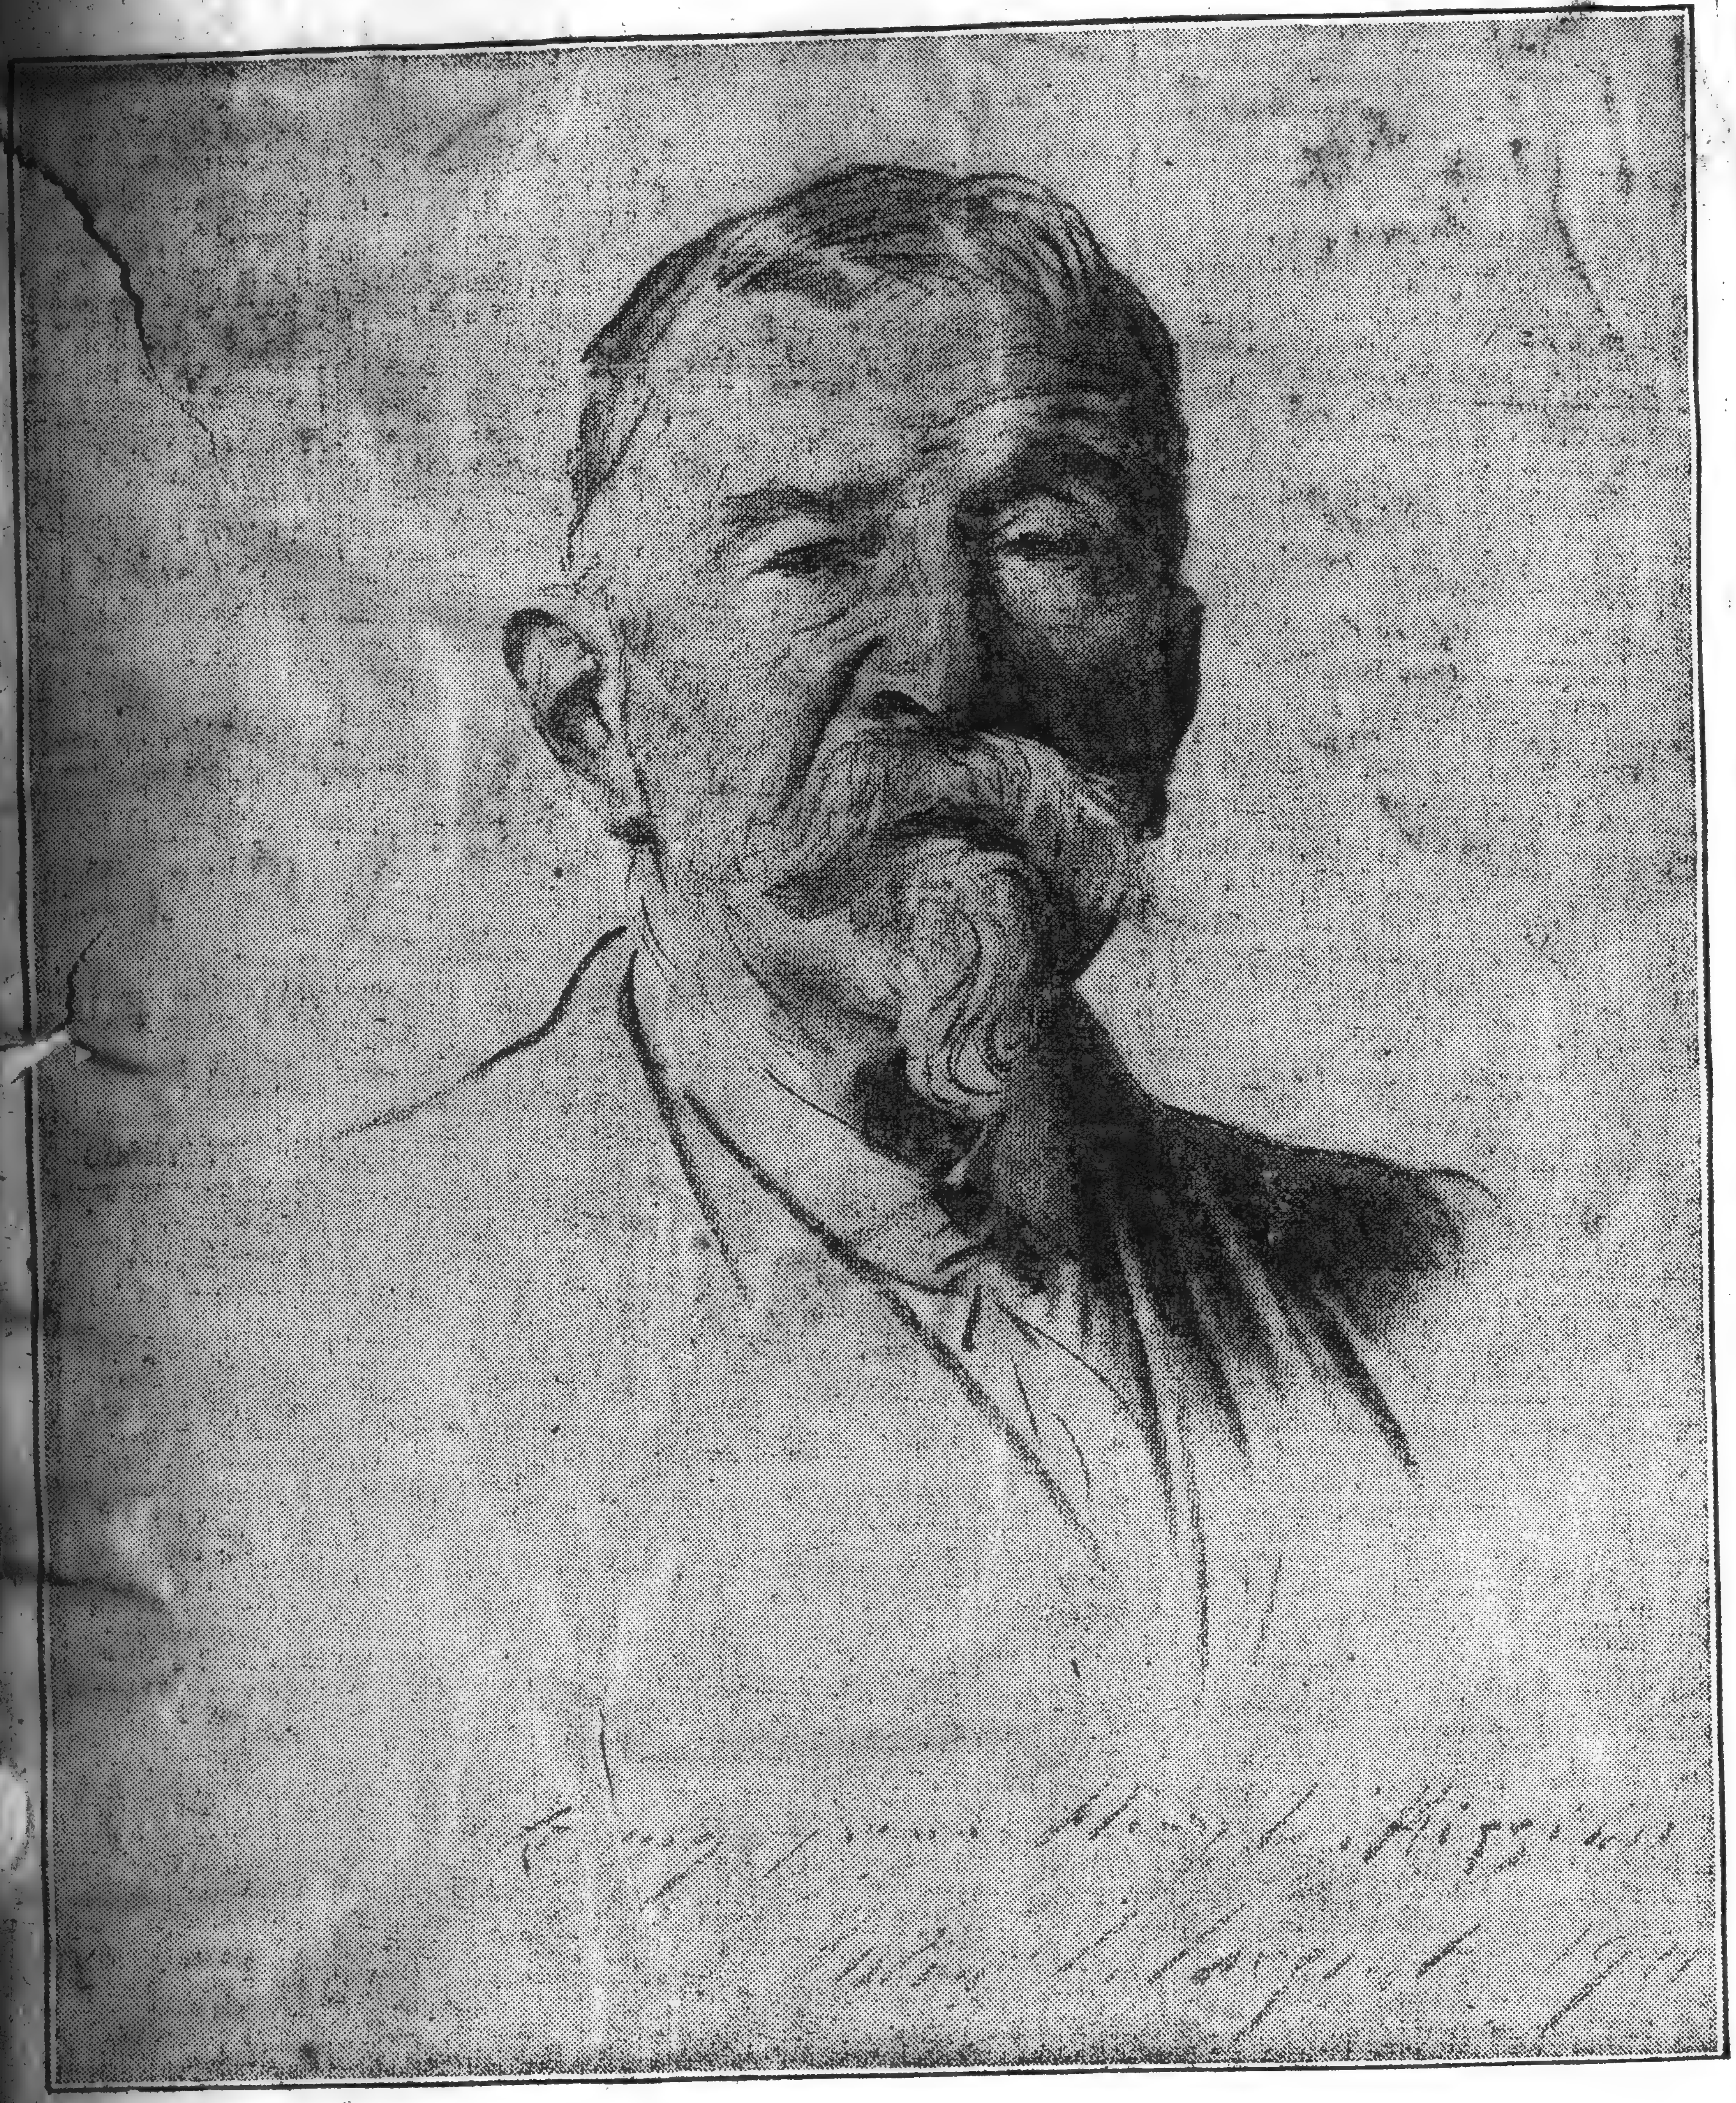
Mr. Bauer played Beethoven's fourt concerto, a work which has been play by the world's pianists since the tim of the great composer. Strong and mas terly with a love for his instrumen which seems to dominate his entire pe sonality, Bauer is unquestionably to included in the small and select grou of great pianists. There is no mane ism no affection of any kind. A sin ple but powerful personality lends self to the interpretation of the maste work until the spirit of the compose fairly dominates the piece. In the days when the horrors of war ha seized on the emotions of men in music home countries, when the master violi ist, Kreisler, has been transformed int a killing machine, it is especially grat fying to music lovers that the great Ger man pianist has not thought it necessar to join his Austrian brother virtuoso o the battle front.

At the close of the concerto he wa greeted by a torrent of applause, re called time and again to the front of th platform and compelled to bow his ac knowledgment of a stormy ovation.

The final number was Beethoven' overture to Goethe's "Egmont," whi was played by the orchestra with strik ing effect, and was a fitting close to splendid concert.

Mr. Higginson's Own "Account" of the Birth and the Growth of t

Record, Judgment and Self-Revelation in Mr. Howe's New History of the



Henry Lee Higginson

(From a Hitherto Unpublished Drawing by Sargent)

AT the suggestion of Mr. Higginson himself, Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe has written an historical sketch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its beginnings in 1881 to the end of the thirty-third year of its existence, six months ago. The resulting book which, with its appendices, makes a substantial volume of nearly three hundred pages will be published within a few days by the Houghton Mifflin Company—as nearly as possible upon Mr. Higginson's eightieth birthday, which falls on Wednesday next. Mr. Howe's "sources," as the learned say, have been the memoranda that Mr. Higginson drafted, with the exactitude of a man of business, about his purposes, when he was laying the first foundations of the orchestra; an "account" of it that he put among his papers three years ago; reports of occasional speeches that he has privately made concerning it; letters from Mr. Gericke and Mr. Paur about their work with it; records of its programmes, journeys and expenditures in the offices at Symphony Hall; articles in the newspapers of Boston and New York from 1881 to 1914; and the recollections in talk and print of Bostonians who have followed these many years the fortunes of the band. Of this material, Mr. Higginson's papers have never before been published; while Mr. Gericke's and Mr. Paur's letters were written at request for the particular purposes of the book. Mr. Howe, in turn, has spared no pains in his scrutiny of the newspapers of thirty-odd years for what they may contain about the rise and progress of the orchestra and the reactions of the reviewers and of the town generally to one and another incident of the early days. The [illegible] of his resources testifies curiously to the transformation that Boston has undergone within the period that his sketch embraces. In the eighties, matters of disciplinary routine in the orchestra were discussed in the journals acrimoniously and very "personally." In this more metropolitan day, they pass unheeded outside the immediate friends of the directly aggrieved. Now the orchestra stands above narrowly local considerations. In its first years, it was tried by nothing else.

A Self-Denying Book

Mr. Howe, as he explains in his prefatory note, has written his book as an editor and an annalist and not as a reviewer of music, critically concerned with the history of the orchestra on its æsthetic side. He has had, perforce, to enumerate those characteristics of the successive conductors upon which there is no disagreement; to note the advance of the band in technical efficiency, the gradual broadening of its repertory and the heightening of its standards; to touch casually upon the changes in the mood and judgment of a public that once mistrusted the music of Brahms, for example, and now accepts it as classic; and to record such quasi-æsthetic matters in the routine of the concerts as the lessening of the number of "assisting artists" and the lengthening of the programmes. Yet, as his preface promises, nowhere has he surveyed conductors or public, standards or achievements from the point of view of a writer about music and the performance of it. The reader of his modest annals would hardly suspect that they concern what is now, in all probability, the most accomplished and distinguished orchestra in the world, with a prestige only a little less in Europe than it enjoys in America; that has spread the note of Boston as has nothing else within the borders of the city in our time; and that has made Mr. Higginson, eminent man of finance and affairs as he is, yet more eminent as "the founder and sustainer" of a unique band. In and out of Boston, the standards and the achievements of the Symphony Orchestra have long encouraged catholic knowledge, discriminating taste and high ambition with music in America. The band has become an institution in full vitality, a criterion steadily maintained and a ceaseless source of stimulation. Yet in all these matters, tempting and almost essential as they are, Mr. Howe has kept loyally to his self-denying ordinance. Tacitly he leaves them to the reviewers of music; but they—even when they are foolish enough to collect their ephemera into a book—record and judge for the day in the column that is forgotten tomorrow and that they would fain amend on the day after. Seldom may they survey the larger aspects of their theme. Perhaps, when the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the orchestra befalls in 1931, some historian of æsthetic accomplishments may have his inning.

Matter and Manner

That fortunate recorder, if he ever comes to be, will seem yet more fortunate if he does his work as well as Mr. Howe has discharged his task of annalist. Thoroughly as he has done his work of compilation, he has not merely laid the dry bones of ascertainable fact in orderly succession side by side. Instead, he has hidden them in the flesh and the blood of a lucid, flowing, animated and even graphic narrative, written in a fashion that hides its artfulness in its simplicity and suavity, diversified by little flashes of pleasant humor and turning now one sidelight and now another upon the moods and spirit of this singular and amusing town, as it was in the eighties. He has set the figure of Mr. Higginson in high relief against a foreground of the conductors of the orchestra and a background of its men. He has kept "the founder and sustainer," the leaders, the personnel and even the much-quoted reviewers, human figures in the human, as well as the æsthetic, life of this Boston of ours. The imagined historian of 1931, who turns to Mr. Howe's book for facts will find himself soon perusing it for the interest and the entertainment that it yields. He will discover his facts as well in the appendices—the patient work of Miss Duncan of the Brown Library—that tabulate the personnel of the orchestra, the "assisting artists" and each and every piece played by it from the earliest times to May, 1914—laconic memorial, as it were, to many a forgotten musician and much forgotten music. In his turn, Mr. Howe has overlooked little. He happens not to mention the concert of the orchestra in New York, in the nineties and with Mr. Paderewski assisting, for the increase of the fund for the Washington Arch, or its share in the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Harvard College and in the inauguration of President Lowell. Otherwise, the casual reader, more or less versed in the history of the orchestra, notes hardly an omission.

The Symphony Orchestra of 19

Mr. Higginson as a Music Student

Necessarily fully half the book falls to the beginnings of the orchestra from Mr. Higginson's first steps toward the founding of it to the end of Mr. Gericke's transforming conductorship in 1889. To this narrative Mr. Howe prefixes a chapter about the musical estate of Boston in the sixties and the seventies, full of curious details, and about Mr. Higginson's little-known studies of music in Europe in his early twenties. It discloses him as a student of music in Rome and especially in Vienna in the last years of the fifties, devoting himself so assiduously to practice upon the piano that overwork and the blundering "surgery" of a barber finally incapacitated him. It discloses him also as a teacher of English to Germans to eke out his slender means and in quotations from letters to his father, now printed for the first time, it reveals the place that music had already come to hold in his mind and heart. "As everyone has some particular object of supreme interest to himself," he writes, "so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it, I miss much, and with it I am happier and better. You may remember that I wished to study music some few years ago when in Europe before. . . . I am studying for my own good and pleasure. . . . It is only carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me." Mr. Higginson even thought of entering upon music as a "calling for life," but the hurt to his arm and much scrutiny of his own talents dissuaded him. He could do no more than make it a means of pleasure to himself and to others. Accordingly, he returned to Boston, bore his share in the Civil War as a soldier, joined the banking house that now bears his name and worked toward the fortune that would enable him to fulfil the vision that gradually arose before his eyes. In 1880, he could safely say: "I can drop business now, retire, and lead a life of comparative leisure; or I can continue to work and by my earnings establish an orchestra. This has been the dream of my life. I should like to do it if you agree with me."

Beginnings Recalled

Three years ago, at the beginning of the thirtieth season of Symphony Concerts, the late Mr. Apthorp, who was a part of many an incident and judgment that he recorded, told on these pages the story of the establishment of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel and its fortunes with public and reviewers in its earliest years. His narrative and Mr. Howe's differ in no essential matter; but with larger room and more than individual recollections at command, the later chronicler amplifies it with many a quotation from the journals of the day, with a memorandum that Mr. Higginson drafted in 1881 about his purposes and plans with the orchestra in case the fulfilment of them should fall to his executors and with extracts from an "Account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" that he subsequently dictated in 1911. The fragments from the newspapers show the warm approval with which public and private opinion seemed at first to receive the project; the suspicions, the scruples and even the jealousies that afterward arose; the debate that the choice of an "outsider," like Mr. Henschel as conductor, stirred in an intensely localized community, and the gradual progress of the concerts and the leader in the good-will of audiences and reviewers.

From the beginning, the public liked the concerts; but not until Mr. Henschel had served more than a year did some of the reviewers and a fraction at least of the audiences find much to approve in him. Quite in the fashion of today, his skill seems to have preoccupied his detractors less than his "personality." To these reflections of the excitement of the town over its new orchestra, its new conductor and its transformed musical life, Mr. Howe adds necessary record of the changes in the organization of the orchestra and the arrangements for the concerts as experience showed a better way in both. Nor does he overlook amusing anecdotage and such points of view as found the music of Wagner "a dreary cacophony."

Mr. Higginson's Own Memoranda

Mr. Higginson's memorandum, read in the light of the thirty-three years elapsed since he drafted it, shows how thoroughly and far-sightedly he had worked out his project for a Boston Symphony Orchestra; how little departure there has been from the original scheme and how much of it has been fully and finally accomplished. It still lacks an accessory chorus, such as Mr. Higginson seems to have destined for it; the extension of its concerts to many cities has limited it to its own work and forestalled the coöperation in other musical undertakings at home, which in the early days the founder anticipated for it; and no longer does he maintain a string quartet from its members, as he did for many years and as he now contributes to the support of the Longy Club of wind instruments.

In the essentials, however, of standards and policy, the orchestra of 1914 is only the fulfilment of the orchestra of 1881. From the first, Mr. Higginson made the conductor the unquestioned master of its personnel, its programmes and all the details of the concerts on the æsthetic side. As completely he confided the business management of the band to the administrators that he chose. From the first, he sought high standards of performance and catholicity of repertory. To establish and maintain these standards, he first required that the players should be at the disposal of the conductor and subject to any restrictions he might impose about outside work; and subsequently he gave to Mr. Gericke a free hand in the reorganization of the orchestra that displaced many a "local man" for a newcomer from Europe. Both decisions and their consequences raised little tempests that swept up and down the columns of the newspapers and through the talk of the town and that still sweep in retrospect over Mr. Howe's pages. But Mr. Higginson held fast. Out of like purpose have sprung at bottom, the increase in the prices for seats, the more exacting choice of "soloists," the Growth of the Symphony Orchestra

New History of the Band

Harris
Boston

e Symphony Orchestra of 1914—The Wind Choir

any a quotation from the journals lay, with a memorandum that Mr. on drafted in 1881 about his pur- nd plans with the orchestra in case lment of them should fall to his rs and with extracts from an "Ac- f the Boston Symphony Orchestra" subsequently dictated in 1911. The ts from the newspapers show the approval with which public and opinion seemed at first to receive ject; the suspicions, the scruples en the jealousies that afterward he debate that the choice of an r," like Mr. Henschel as conductor, in an intensely localized com- and the gradual progress of the s and the leader in the good-will of es and reviewers.

the beginning, the public liked the ; but not until Mr. Henschel had more than a year did some of lewers and a fraction at least of iences find much to approve in him. n the fashion of today, his skill o have preoccupied his detractors an his "personality." To these re- s of the excitement of the town new orchestra, its new conductor transformed musical life, Mr. Howe ecessary record of the changes in anization of the orchestra and the ements for the concerts as ex- e showed a better way in both. es he overlook amusing anecdotage ch points of view as found the f Wagner "a dreary cacophony."

gginson's Own Memoranda

Higginson's memorandum, read in nt of the thirty-three years elapsed e drafted it, shows how thoroughly -sightedly he had worked out his for a Boston Symphony Orchestra; tle departure there has been from ginal scheme and how much of it en fully and finally accomplished. lacks an accessory chorus, such as gginson seems to have destined for extension of its concerts to many as limited it to its own work and lled the coöperation in other musi- dertakings at home, which in the ays the founder anticipated for it; longer does he maintain a string from its members, as he did for ears and as he now contributes to pport of the Longy Club of wind ents.

e essentials, however, of standards licy, the orchestra of 1914 is only lfilment of the orchestra of 1881. the first, Mr. Higginson made the tor the unquestioned master of its nel, its programmes and all the de- f the concerts on the æsthetic side. mpletely he confided the business ement of the band to the adminis- that he chose. From the first, he high standards of performance tholicity of repertory. To establish intain these standards, he first re- that the players should be at the of the conductor and subject to any ions he might impose about outside and subsequently he gave to Mr. e a free hand in the reorganization orchestra that displaced many a man" for a newcomer from Eu- Both decisions and their conse- s raised little tempests that swept down the columns of the news- and through the talk of the town at still sweep in retrospect over Mr. s pages. But Mr. Higginson held Out of like purpose have sprung at the increase in the prices for seats, re exacting choice of "soloists," the another change that the years have brought. Out of the result, no less, have been born the catholicity and the discrimination with music and performance that years of experience have instilled into the enduring public of the concerts. Even on the financial side, Mr. Higginson's anticipations have been fulfilled. In his memorandum he suggests a million dollars as the principal that the orchestra would require if an assured income was to shelter it in perpetuity from any financial vicissitude. It is such a sum that his will is likely to establish for it as a trust fund.

His Judgment of the Early Orchestra

For the most part, Mr. Higginson's narrative of the origins of the band recounts facts already familiar, but toward the end, it recites his own judgment of its first accomplishments:

> Considering the newness of the scheme, the concerts went on well enough during the first winter, and were well received. The public was generous and kindly then, as it always has been. Toward the end of the season I gave out that the concerts would go on, and that I should ask the men to play only under one conductor. This caused trouble at once, and all but four men of the orchestra refused my terms. The newspapers took their side, and one prominent critic accused me of trying to make a "corner in musicians." The men sent a delegate to see me. This delegate was pleasant and clever and laughed at my statement that the concerts would go on and that it was only a question of who would play. Therefore, on the next public rehearsal day I went to the green-room of the Music Hall and asked the men to come in after the rehearsal, which they did. I then said to them: "I made a proposition to you which you have rejected. I withdraw my proposition. The concerts will go on as they have this year, and in this hall. If any of you have anything to say to me in the way of a proposition, you will make it"—and that meeting was over. During the next few days almost every man came to me and asked to be engaged. The delegate from the orchestra was not one of them.
>
> During the second and third years Mr. Henschel conducted as before, gaining experience and skill in his work—and the concerts, so far as I remember, were fair, and were growing better. People would say to me: "Isn't the orchestra splendid?" to which I replied: "It is not—it is learning, and will be good by and by."

Mr. Gericke Makes an Orchestra

As Mr. Howe was bound to do, he traverses at length the five years from the autumn of 1885 through the spring of 1889 of Mr. Gericke's first term as conductor. It was the formative period of the orchestra in which the new leader reconstructed and fused it, set its standards and established its routine. "There are some musicians in it," he said to Mr. Higginson after his second concert with it, "but it is hardly an orchestra." He made it such and set it far on its way to become one of the finest orchestras in the world. It was his orchestra when he left it; under Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur, it remained intrinsically his orchestra; it was his again in the fullest sense of the word during his second term, from 1898 through 1906, and not until Dr. Muck succeeded him was a transforming hand laid upon it. Mr. Gericke reorganized the personnel—under what opposition from the dismissed, their friends and divers "local interests," Mr. Howe tells interestingly and amusingly; began the recruiting of able players from Europe; imposed a new and unyielding discipline and new and arduous methods of rehearsal; trained the orchestra to a sensuous quality and an adroit [illegible] were strange new things in American concert-rooms, and transformed it from a collection of individuals that played more or less each in his own fashion into a fused, expert and susceptible instrument. On another side, to give the band longer employment and ampler practice, he added concerts in New York and other cities southward and occasional visits westward to its work at home and in New England; established "The Pops"; ventured other experiments that proved less lasting; widened the classic repertory, began the accumulation of the modern, and finally established a standard of programme that made the concerts in fact what in name they purported to be.

In a long letter that Mr. Howe reprints almost in its entirety, Mr. Gericke recounts his experiences in Boston in the retrospective vein of proud kindliness proper to a man who can now look back upon work so well done that by its sheer virtue, it finally overcame all opposition to it. Mr. Gericke confesses that he consented to come to Boston from Vienna largely because he was piqued at certain changes in his work at the Court Opera and that his first impressions of this town were hardly agreeable: "When I arrived," he writes, "the room that had been engaged for me proved only large enough for a bed, a chair, and a table. No place for piano or anything which might make it comfortable. Not used to such wholesome but somewhat Spartan simplicity, I wished for better accommodation; but, as my English was so very poor, it was thought unwise to take me to a hotel. I was brought into a private family, but, also there, nobody spoke any German. My room looked into a yard, I had nobody to speak to, and, though they kindly tried to make it comfortable for me, I felt very much like a prisoner in Siberia. After a few days, however, I was taken to the Tavern Club, which at this time was just founded by a number of young gentlemen—all nice and charming fellows. There I found kindred spirits and some good and stanch friends, who did their best to help me over my first difficulties." Thereafter, Mr. Gericke's work and the long contest to establish his methods and standards saved him from all homesickness, except when passing discouragements seemed to gather black about him.

As Mr. Higginson Judges Him

In turn, Mr. Higginson, in long passages from that mysterious "Account of the Symphony Orchestra," and in a speech at the farewell dinner of the Tavern Club to Mr. Gericke, surveys and estimates the conductor's work for the orchestra. "He had unusual talent for forming and developing it. He was a thorough musician with a fine sense for sound and careful execution, a refined taste, and entire command over his men. (When I asked my friend Epstein in Vienna about him, he said all these things, and added: 'He is conscientious and faithful in the highest degree'; and he proved so from the beginning to the end.) He took no end of pains, especially with the violins, kept the brasses down, and encouraged the good wood-wind. There was no limit to his patience, and no limit to the pains which he took; and he taught those first violins to sing as violins sing in Vienna alone. It was he who gave to the orchestra its excellent habits and ideals." Yet warmer and equally deserved is many a sentence in the speech to the Tavern Club.

Through Nikisch and Paur

To Mr. Gericke succeeded Mr. Nikisch, then at the beginning relatively of his career but clearly revealing the qualities that were to carry him to the first rank in his calling. The Nikisch of 1914 was too busy or too indifferent to set down his recollections of his work in Boston for Mr. Howe, but the annalist recounts it sufficiently from the records of the time and from the memories that a young conductor of such individual ability, vivid personality and romantic and poetizing temper left firmly behind him. In the routine of the concerts the orchestra followed the paths that Mr. Gericke had laid out for it and incidents were few in the four years in which Mr. Nikisch reigned over it. Under him, the modern repertory gained larger and larger place in the concerts and Mr. Paur, who succeeded him from 1893 to 1898, was yet more eager with it. He has written a note rather than a letter to Mr. Howe about his experiences in Boston and in the course of it he is the first conductor to expatiate upon the unique constitution and position of the orchestra:

Continued on Page [illegible]

> The reason why the Boston Orchestra plays better than all other existing orchestras is—besides the excellent qualities of the men—the comfortable living the men are able to enjoy. They all are paid better than anywhere else, consequently they have no sorrow of provisions; they feel free, satisfied, happy, not overworked, and the result is joy, enthusiasm and perfection in their work. There are other wisest points in the rules set by the founder of the Boston Orchestra, which brought the institution to the best in the world. The most important and wisest one is the absolute power given to the manager, in all business matters, and to the conductor in all artistic, musical matters, both only responsible to the owner of the Orchestra.

Mr. Higginson and the Union

Even the Musicians' Protective Union, which fondly and insistently believes that the virtuosi of the orchestra are on the same level with its mechanics of music, tooting their horns and scraping their fiddles, has been unable by overt attack or covert intrigue to alter the status of an orchestra the personnel of which remains obstinately outside it. In a succinct paragraph Mr. Higginson writes of the necessity of such independence:

> The union specifies in a way the number of rehearsals, the pay for the musicians, the number of concerts, etc., and interferes with the engagement or dismissal of men. As I hold that all these points are very important for the good of the orchestra and must rest with me or with my conductor, I see no need or use for the union. We pay more, ask entire control of the men, and see to it that they are well paid, have pensions, and also get outside work if possible; therefore the union cannot benefit them. We can keep the orchestra at its present level or even higher only by asking such work as our conductor thinks essential, and sometimes the rehearsals mount very high, even to thirteen. On no other terms can I go on and pay a large subsidy, and not control—all this for the sake of art.

Time, the Present

When Mr. Paur departed Mr. Gericke returned—this time to an orchestra that was still in all essential qualities his handiwork. For six years he led it again, carried it to the highest point of accomplishment that it had yet attained, saw it gain larger and larger audiences at home and abroad, entered with it into the hall that is now its permanent abiding place and, reciprocally as it now seems, ripened himself into a conductor of larger power and warmer feeling than he had been in the preceding eighties. "During Gericke's last stay," writes Mr Higginson, "the orchestra reached a high point. He had made it originally, had seen it pass through the hands of Nikisch and Paur, each of whom did something for it, and, at any rate, had freed it from his discipline, which, albeit excellent in forming it, was rather rigid. When he came back to the orchestra, it was better than when he left it, and also he was freer in his beat, and under his magical touch, taste, skill, and industry it reached a very high point."

The rest of the book is brief record of the relatively recent days of Dr. Muck in his first conductorship, of Mr. Fiedler, and of Dr. Muck in these halycon years of his return. Self-denying to the end, Mr. Howe contents himself "with the briefest presentation of essential facts"; but model annalist though he is he cannot forbear a hint of the new severities that Dr. Muck has added to the routine of the concerts and of the new heights to which he has carried the achievements of the band. He has kept it a perfect instrument and he has given the voice of that instrument a manifold eloquence that it never knew before. Upon that pinnacle of "artistic supremacy—a point of permanence to be maintained through all the years to come," Mr. Howe ends his recording. A chapter of semi-philosophical retrospect and of shrewd surmise as to the future and the public it will bring to the orchestra and he is done.

"The Founder"

Yet Mr. Higginson, since the book is as much a record of his purposes with the orchestra and his relations to it as it is a sketch of its rise, progress and fulfilment, deserves the last word. He may speak first out of a letter to the late Otto Dresel, written in 1888, in which he sets forth the course that he has followed in all the thirty-three years of the orchestra in his intimate dealings with it.

> I have never exercised any supervision and I am not in a position to do so. You know very well that I am a busy man, and have many cares on my mind; that I must keep this orchestra matter before me, but I cannot give it much daily care or thought. I cannot go and see that the conductor is busy with his work day after day, week after week. Very often I do not go to a rehearsal for months at a time. That care I will not have on my mind, nor will I have any care or worry with regard to making the programmes or arrangements; nor will I undertake to engage any musicians. I have a manager who, here and in other cities, makes all arrangements. He also makes the contracts, by reëngaging men when their contracts expire, engages new men and discharges old men, but he does this at the bidding of the conductor of the orchestra. . . . The conductor must lay out his plans, of course make his programmes, find new men if he loses the old ones, either by their going or by his dismissal of them for ill conduct or for want of ability. He must think beforehand and arrange as to the concerts in town and out of town; he must preserve discipline in the orchestra, which is a more difficult matter than on the other side. He is free and unfettered in all these matters, has no Government officer, inspector or director to bother him. He is as free as a man can well be in this world—any man who has much work and considerable responsibilities on his shoulders. . . . If I cannot be on friendly terms with the conductor of the orchestra, I do not want to have anything to do with the thing at all. You know the aims, objects and pecuniary results of all my musical experience here, and you know what the result has been. It is far enough from what I want to attain, but, at the same time, it has been something. It is a work with which I wish to go on as long as I can, and if it can be made to continue forever, which is my expectation, so much the better.

"And the Sustainer"

And, as though Mr. Higginson were continuing the letter and shifting, in the warmth of his feeling, from external fact accomplished to the inner impulse that made such accomplishment possible and permanent, he said, in a speech to the Tavern Club, with a simple, intimate and touching eloquence:

> Several times when I have faltered in my plans for the future, I have taken heart again on seeing the crowd of young, fresh school-girls, of music-students, of tired school teachers, of weary men, of little old ladies leading gray lives not often reached by the sunshine, and I have said to myself: "One year more anyway." To us all come hard blows from the hand of fate, with hours, days, weeks of suffering and of sadness. Even boys and girls know this early and know it late. At these times music draws the pain, or at least relieves it, just as the sun does. Considering these things, can I have done harm by the concerts? Are they not worth while, even if they cost me years of work and worry? What were we made for? We are all bound in our day and generation to serve our country and our fellow-men in some way. Lucky is he who finds a fair field for his work, and when he has put his hands to the plough, he may not lightly turn back. He may not too easily say, "Enough, I am weary."

The Symphony Orchestra of 1914—The Leaders of the Strings

Horner Boston

The Symphony Orchestra of 1914—The Brass Choir

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 16,

NEWS OF MUSIC

A MONTH OF PROGRAMMES FROM DR. MUCK

Stravinsky's and Schoenberg's Music to Be Heard in December—Mr. Kreisler on His Way to America—Mr. Damrosch Will Compose No More—Parisian Perturbations Over Weingartner and Siegfried Wagner—Opera in Chicago Next Year—Items and Opinions

DR. MUCK has now made his programmes for the Symphony Concerts through those of Dec. 25 and 26. As they now stand, Stravinsky's "Fireworks" will be heard on Dec. 11 and 12, the first piece by the noted—or notorious—Russian to be added to the repertory of the orchestra; Schönberg's "Five Pieces" on Dec. 18 and 19; and Volbach's new symphony on Dec. 25 and 26. Schönberg's pieces and Volbach's symphony will then be played for the first times in Boston. Furthermore, at the concert of the orchestra in Cambridge, on Dec. 10, Dr. Muck will make known a prelude, "The Delectable Forest," written by Edward Ballentine of the Department of Music at Harvard, thereby renewing a custom that the conductor followed in his first term here, with the work of the young composers of the college. Finally, when next the orchestra plays in New York on Dec. 3 and 5, its audiences there will hear all three of the novel pieces that Dr. Muck will have recently included in current programmes here —Sibelius's fourth symphony; Ropartz's [illegible] and Reznicek's symphonic bi- [illegible] "Schlemihl."

[illegible] artists," Mr. Bauer, the

27 and 28; Mr. Malkin, the new first 'cellist at the concerts of Dec. 11 and 12; and Mr. Noack, the violinist, and Mr. Marshall, the organist, at the concerts of Dec. 25 and 26. Miss Hinkle, the singer, will appear at the concerts of Dec. 18 and 19.

Word has definitely come from Mr. Kreisler, that he sailed from Rotterdam on Saturday last, on his way to New York; that he has recovered from his wound and that he is ready for work. Accordingly, the violinist will begin his new tour in a recital of his own, at Symphony Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 13. By these tokens all doubts of his coming may be dismissed.

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 11

NEWS OF MUSIC

A MUCH MAGNIFIED EPISODE IN NEW YORK

The Little Critical Shindy Over One of Dr. Muck's Programmes—Novel Pieces for the Symphony Concerts—Programmes in Prospect—Mr. Bauer Makes New Ventures—Items and Impressions

NO man has a more hapless lot than he who is hired to be smart in print six times a week about music or plays. No wonder he is occasionally hard put to find material for the exercise of his ingenious and exacting calling. Perhaps the reviewer of music for The Evening Sun was in such straits when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra paid their first visit of the season to New York last week and made their first programme, as they had in Boston, out of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Or maybe, the reviewer is one of that singular company so obsessed by their feelings over the war as to have lost all sense of the fitness and the proportion of things. Anyhow, the reviewer wrote:

> Tonight Karl Muck conducts his full list from the land of the Kaisers. The same music wouldn't have stirred a ripple of comment if put in second place at Saturday's matinée. That would have been a graceful act to exchange the two programmes, giving the first night to Sibelius and the American Chadwick. It is the thrusting of Teutonic propaganda into front rank by Boston's premier band—heaven save that shining mark—that has set all the other fellows by the ears.

There is no obvious reason to attach any importance to these sayings, grossly as they misrepresent Dr. Muck's motives in the choice of his programme. They belong with the amusing caperings of the other reviewer, who believed it smart to write next day of Beethoven as a Belgian composer. But as it happened they stirred much wrath in the other reviewers of music in New York, who with speed and warmth proceeded to set Dr. Muck right before the public of the Symphony Concerts who had already heaped him with applause, caring not a pin and probably taking not a thought of the nativity of the composers on his programme. When the second concert of the visit came around, The Sun said, noting the recent performances under Dr. Muck of a symphony by Ropartz, a Frenchman, and of tone-poems by Sibelius, a Russian subject:

> If these facts had not been overlooked there might have been less said about the exclusively German character of the music at the first concert of the Bostonians on Thursday evening. Dr. Muck is a musician and a great master, as well as a Prussian (sic), and he has under his baton an orchestra in which Germans, Bohemians, Russians, French, Belgians, Italians and Americans are seated together. The beneficent shield of art will protect them all, and therefore it will probably not be necessary again to touch upon the subject of neutrality.

And the Tribune in a sharp note about "politics and chauvinism in our concert-rooms":

> Beethoven and Brahms are surely representatives of the art universal. As for Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, that is all romantic idealism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry. Besides, the political reflections to which the names might have given rise ought not to have > contained a tinge of German chauvinism—Beethoven, of Belgian extraction, writing music to glorify a heroic conception of Bonaparte as the champion of liberty; Brahms, the child of commercial Hamburg, whose mind was wholly engrossed with his art, and Weber, whose patriotism and love of liberty flamed up with Körner's so fiercely in "Lyre and Sword" that their passionate warmth is still felt by every republican soul. Moreover, the music was so superbly played that the mental reservations of even the most suspicious listener must have been dissipated like smoke in a gale.
>

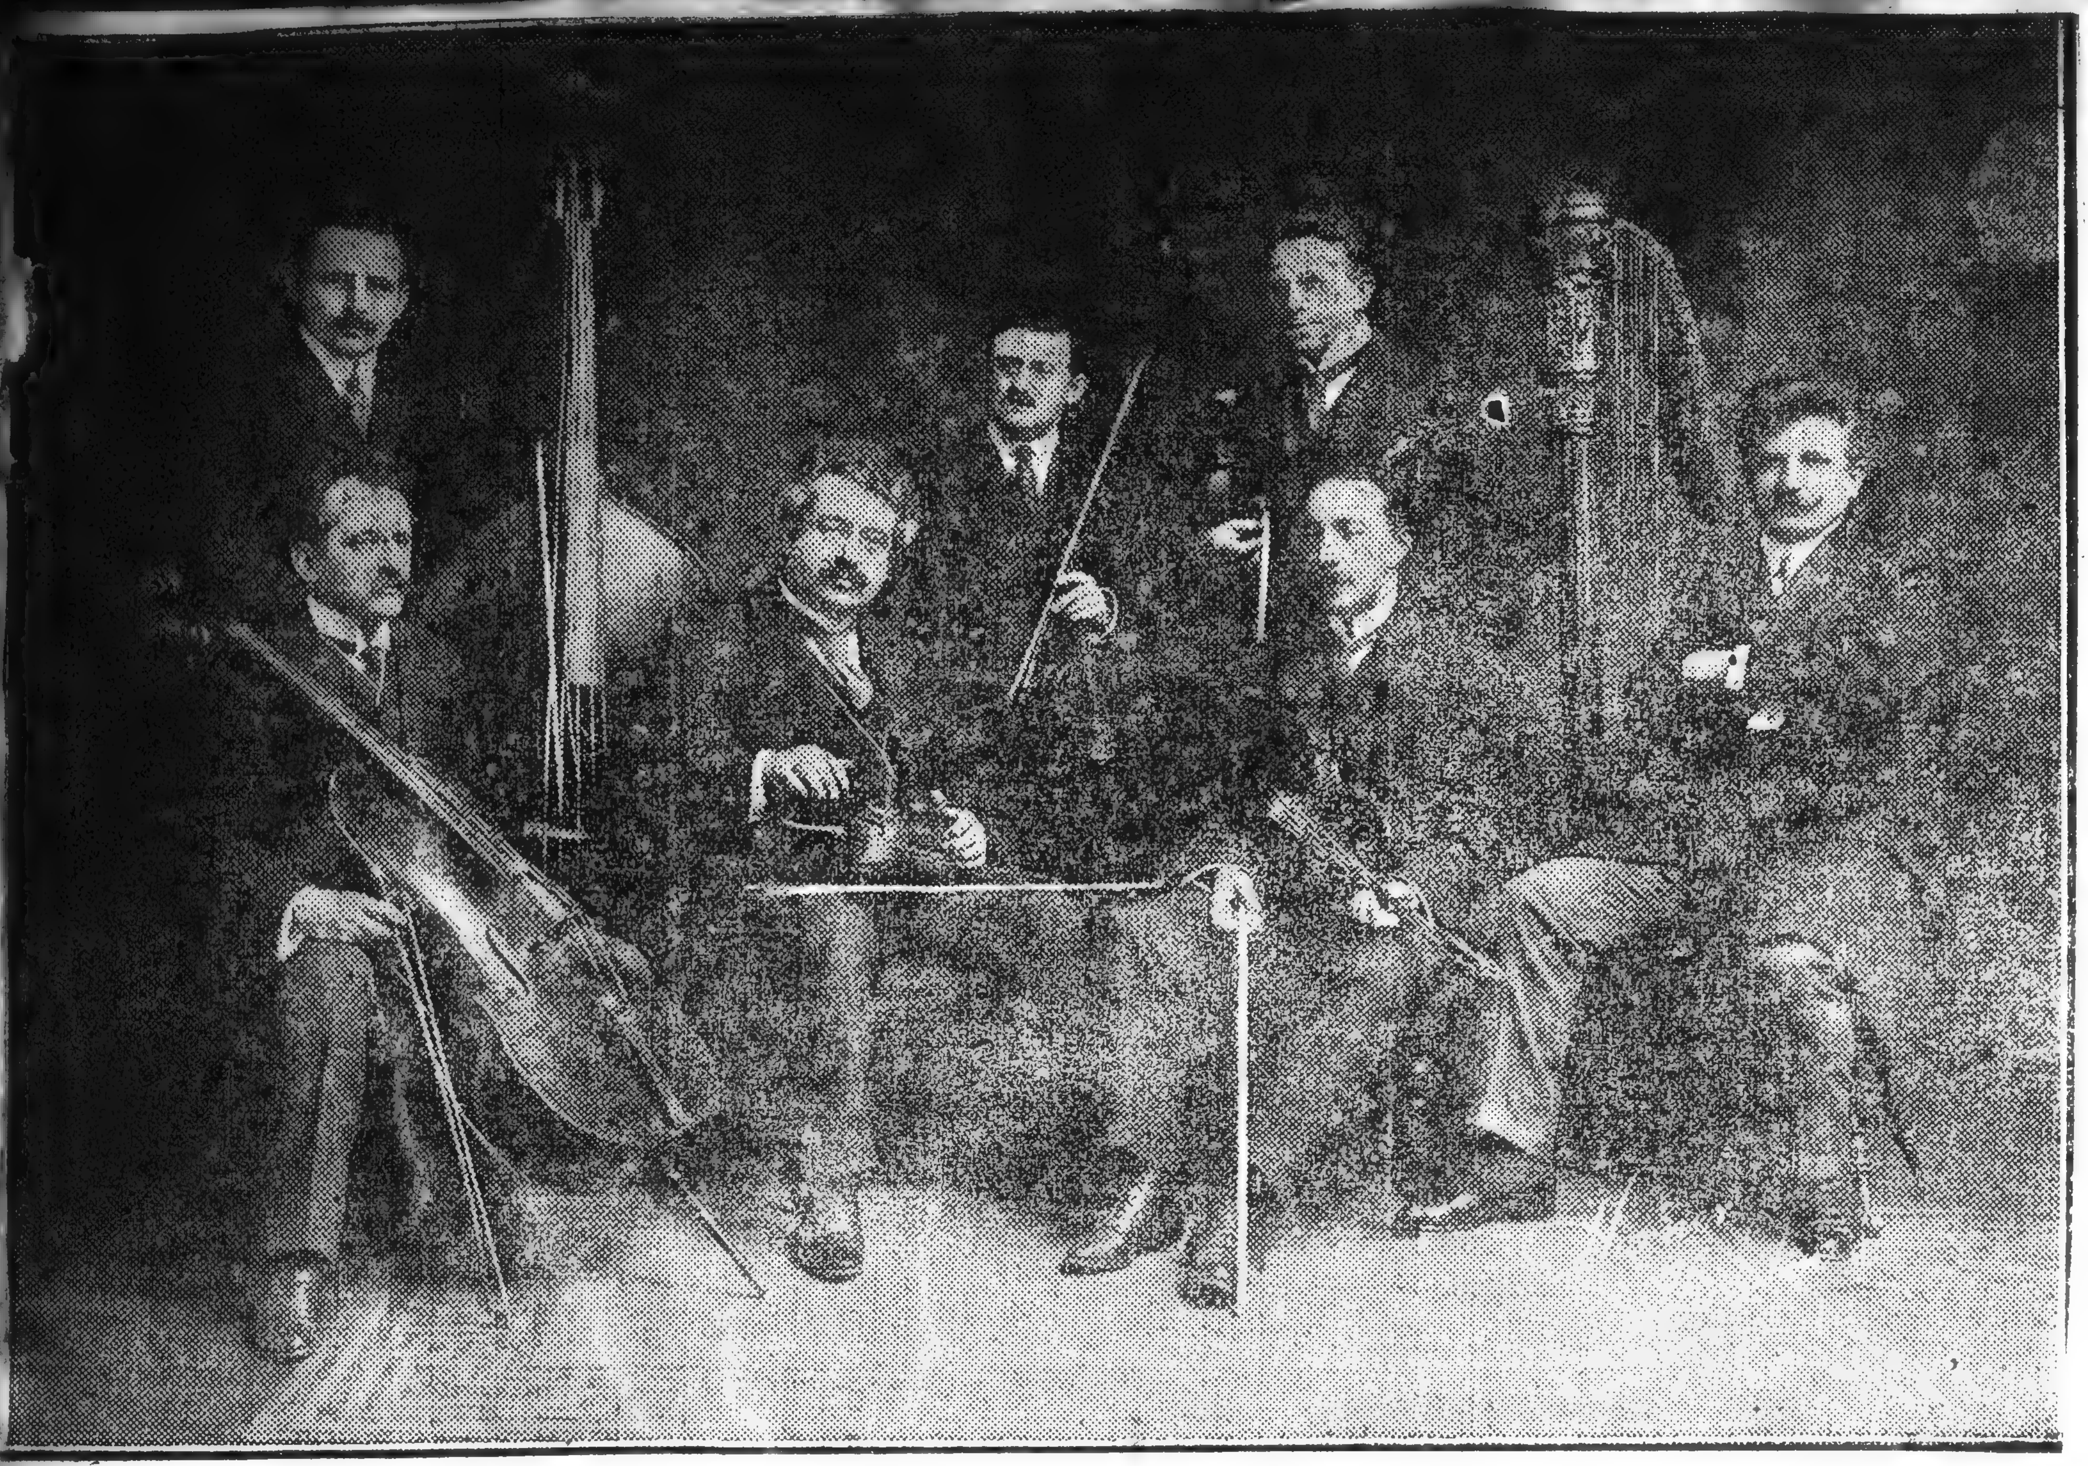
Finally, the Telegraph, needlessly magnifying a passing incident, which it justly calls "a piece of stupidity," ends with this biting sentence:

> It is pitiable that men who are unable to distinguish between the abstract and impersonal beauties of the most idealistic of arts, and the concrete issues of war and politics, should be sitting in judgment on artistic matters.

From Symphony Hall

The brief series of concerts that Mr. Paderewski contemplated in America at midwinter, on his way through the United States from Switzerland to Australia, has been abandoned. The pianist believes rightly that conditions in the antipodes will be unfavorable to such a tour and he has no liking for mine-strewn seas and uncomfortable voyages. He has, therefore, notified his manager in America that he will remain at his house at Morges through the winter and that no arrangements need be made for the projected tour.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dr. Muck will include in his programme Ravel's glittering Spanish Rhapsody, hitherto heard here only once and in amateur performance and Strauss's early and pictorial symphonic suite, "From Italy." A week later, in deference to various requests, he will repeat Reznicek's tone-poem, "Schlemihl," the largely written and boldly imagined piece that proved the most striking of the "novelties" of last season. In the spring, furthermore, when there is ampler time for rehearsal, he intends to conduct for the first time in Strauss's "Zarathustra," unheard here since Mr. Fiedler's



The Symphony Orchestra of 1914—The Leaders of the Strings

Horner
Boston

The Symphony Orchestra of 1914—The Brass Choir

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 16.

NEWS OF MUSIC

A MONTH OF PROGRAMMES FROM DR. MUCK

Stravinsky's and Schoenberg's Music to Be Heard in December—Mr. Kreisler on His Way to America—Mr. Damrosch Will Compose No More—Parisian Perturbations Over Weingartner and Siegfried Wagner—Opera in Chicago Next Year—Items and Opinions

DR. MUCK has now made his programmes for the Symphony Concerts through those of Dec. 25 and 26. As they now stand, Stravinsky's "Fireworks" will be heard on Dec. 11 and 12, the first piece by the noted—or notorious—Russian, to be added to the repertory of the orchestra; Schönberg's "Five Pieces" on Dec. 18 and 19; and Volbach's new symphony on Dec. 25 and 26. Schönberg's pieces and Volbach's symphony will then be played for the first times in Boston. Furthermore, at the concert of the orchestra in Cambridge, on Dec. 10, Dr. Muck will make known a prelude, "The Delectable Forest," written by Edward Ballentine of the Department of Music at Harvard, thereby renewing a custom that the conductor followed in his first term here, with the work of the young composers of the college. Finally, when next the orchestra plays in New York on Dec. 3 and 5, its audiences there will hear all three of the novel pieces that Dr. Muck will have recently included in current programmes here—Sibelius's fourth symphony; Ropartz's symphony, and Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl."

For "assisting artists," Mr. Bauer, the [illegible] of Nov. 27 and 28; Mr. Malkin, the new first 'cellist at the concerts of Dec. 11 and 12; and Mr. Noack, the violinist, and Mr. Marshall, the organist, at the concerts of Dec. 25 and 26. Miss Hinkle, the singer, will appear at the concerts of Dec. 18 and 19.

Word has definitely come from Mr. Kreisler, that he sailed from Rotterdam on Saturday last, on his way to New York; that he has recovered from his wound and that he is ready for work. Accordingly, the violinist will begin his new tour in a recital of his own, at Symphony Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 13. By these tokens all doubts of his coming may be dismissed.

NOVEMBER 11

NEWS OF MUSIC

A MUCH MAGNIFIED EPISODE IN NEW YORK

The Little Critical Shindy Over One of Dr. Muck's Programmes—Novel Pieces for the Symphony Concerts—Programmes in Prospect—Mr. Bauer Makes New Ventures—Items and Impressions

NO man has a more hapless lot than he who is hired to be smart in print six times a week about music or plays. No wonder he is occasionally hard put to find material for the exercise of his ingenious and exacting calling. Perhaps the reviewer of music for The Evening Sun was in such straits when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra paid their first visit of the season to New York last week and made their first programme, as they had in Boston, out of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Or maybe, the reviewer is one of that singular company so obsessed by their feelings over the war as to have lost all sense of the fitness and the proportion of things. Anyhow, the reviewer wrote:

> Tonight Karl Muck conducts his full list from the land of the Kaisers. The same music wouldn't have stirred a ripple of comment if put in second place at Saturday's matinée. That would have been a graceful act to exchange the two programmes, giving the first night to Sibelius and the American Chadwick. It is the thrusting of Teutonic propaganda into front rank by Boston's premier band—heaven save that shining mark—that has set all the other fellows by the ears.

There is no obvious reason to attach any importance to these sayings, grossly as they misrepresent Dr. Muck's motives in the choice of his programme. They belong with the amusing caperings of the other reviewer, who believed it smart to write next day of Beethoven as a Belgian composer. But as it happened they stirred much wrath in the other reviewers of music in New York, who with speed and warmth proceeded to set Dr. Muck right before the public of the Symphony Concerts who had already heaped him with applause, caring not a pin and probably taking not a thought of the nativity of the composers on his programme. When the second concert of the visit came around, The Sun said, noting the recent performances under Dr. Muck of a symphony by Ropartz, a Frenchman, and of tone-poems by Sibelius, a Russian subject:

> If these facts had not been overlooked there might have been less said about the exclusively German character of the music at the first concert of the Bostonians on Thursday evening. Dr. Muck is a musician and a great master, as well as a Prussian (sic), and he has under his baton an orchestra in which Germans, Bohemians, Russians, French, Belgians, Italians and Americans are seated together. The beneficent shield of art will protect them all, and therefore it will probably not be necessary again to touch upon the subject of neutrality.

And the Tribune in a sharp note about "politics and chauvinism in our concert-rooms":

> Beethoven and Brahms are surely representatives of the art universal. As for Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, that is all romantic idealism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry. Besides, the political reflections to which the names might have given rise ought not to have contained a tinge of German chauvinism—Beethoven, of Belgian extraction, writing music to glorify a heroic conception of Bonaparte as the champion of liberty; Brahms, the child of commercial Hamburg, whose mind was wholly engrossed with his art, and Weber, whose patriotism and love of liberty flamed up with Körner's so fiercely in "Lyre and Sword" that their passionate warmth is still felt by every republican soul. Moreover, the music was so superbly played that the mental reservations of even the most suspicious listener must have been dissipated like smoke in a gale.

Finally, the Telegraph, needlessly magnifying a passing incident, which it justly calls "a piece of stupidity," ends with this biting sentence:

> It is pitiable that men who are unable to distinguish between the abstract and impersonal beauties of the most idealistic of arts, and the concrete issues of war and politics, should be sitting in judgment on artistic matters.

From Symphony Hall

The brief series of concerts that Mr. Paderewski contemplated in America at mid-winter, on his way through the United States from Switzerland to Australia, has been abandoned. The pianist believes rightly that conditions in the antipodes will be unfavorable to such a tour and he has no liking for mine-strewn seas and uncomfortable voyages. He has, therefore, notified his manager in America that he will remain at his house at Morges through the winter and that no arrangements need be made for the projected tour.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dr. Muck will include in his programme Ravel's glittering Spanish Rhapsody, hitherto heard here only once and in amateur performance and Strauss's early and pictorial symphonic suite, "From Italy." A week later, in deference to various requests, he will repeat Reznicek's tone-poem, "Schlemini," the largely written and boldly imagined piece that proved the most striking of the "novelties" of last season. In the spring, furthermore, when there is ampler time for rehearsal, he intends to conduct for the first time in Strauss's "Zarathustra," unheard here since Mr. Fiedler's

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 19

MEMORABLE BIRTHDAY

FRIENDS JOIN IN HONOR OF MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON

GETS MANY TRIBUTES ON 80TH NATAL DAY

Senator Lodge, Bishop Lawrence, Gen. Stephen M. Weld, William Roscoe Thayer and Others Join in Praises of Boston's "Grand Old Man," During Dinner at Copley Plaza.

Surrounded by more than 350 relatives and admiring friends, among them leaders in almost every walk in life, statesmen, financiers, business men, professors, musicians and artists, besides admiring comrades, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, "Boston's Grand Old Man," celebrated his 80th birthday last evening at the Copley-Plaza Hotel.

Speeches of warm and sincere affection and admiration from those best fitted by intimate association to know his boundless humanitarianism, anecdotes of his military career during the Civil War, and stories of his civic and business life were listened to with deep interest and delight by those honored by being present at probably the most memorable "birthday party" ever held in this city.

All had come to pay tribute to the man who, because of his deep love for Boston and its citizens, founded and supported the first Symphony orchestra in America, establishing Boston as the premier city of America in music and art, author of many charities and benefactor of Harvard College.

Greeted With Cheers.

Throughout the entire evening this "Grand Old Man" was obliged to listen to all manner of praise, to have many long forgotten incidents in his life brought again to notice. Perhaps the most touching tribute of the evening was made manifest when he rose to thank them. For several minutes a deafening burst of applause echoed through the hall, coming with such a will as to make speech impossible.

Following the dinner, the balconies were thrown open to the women relatives and friends and were soon filled. The centre box was occupied by members of Maj. Higginson's family, while in the others were many prominent leaders in Boston and Brookline society.

Symphony Orchestra's Tribute.

In appreciation of what Maj. Higginson has done for music in this city, more than half of the Symphony Orchestra were present and rendered Tchaikowsky's Symphony exquisitely, following it by offering a toast to Maj. Higginson which was heartily applauded. Twenty-five members of the Apollo Club, under the leadership of Emil Mollenhauer, also added considerably to the evening's entertainment.

Senator Lodge presided and the speakers were Bishop Lawrence, George W. Chadwick of the New England Conservatory of Music, William Roscoe Thayer, representing the Tavern Club, of which Maj. Higginson has been president for many years; Gen. Stephen M. Weld, who spoke of Maj. Higginson's activity and valor in the Civil War, and Maj. Higginson.

Senator Lodge read a letter from Pres. Eliot, who was unable to attend because of a slight illness, extolling the virtues and munificence of Maj. Higginson and his deeds of kindness to the students of Harvard College in giving them Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union. He said that his career showed the business man, social leader and humanitarian what American freedom has produced.

Letters of regret at being unable to be present, praising his broadmindedness, his strong character, and deep sympathy were read from ex-President Taft, Justice O. W. Holmes of the United States Supreme Court, Pres. Lowell, and Seth Low of New York.

Letter From War Comrade.

A letter which brought a smile of quickened interest from the guest of the evening was from Charles Francis Adams, a comrade in arms during the Civil War, and was read by Charles Francis Adams 2d, telling of a few adventures which they had together.

Senator Lodge said:—

"Great wars in which the lives of nations are at stake take a heavy toll from all that is best in the generation called to arms. The best physically, mentally and in character are the first to go and the last to return. Grievous to those who come after and to the strength and quality of the nation itself is the sacrifice then nobly and rightly made. This was peculiarly true of both sides in our own Civil War of 50 years ago, and among the best who then went to their death there was no finer example than Charles Russell Lowell. Gentleman, soldier, scholar, as brilliant in intellect as he was strong in character, he personified that type of our English-speaking race which history enshrines in the name of Sir Philip Sydney.

"Not long before that supreme moment, he wrote a letter to a friend at home, a [illegible]

[illegible] all fool- [illegible]tions, and are now content to become a "useful citizen." * * * Don't seek office, but don't "disremember" that the "useful citizen" always holds his time, his money and his life ready at the hint of his country. The useful citizen is a mighty, unpretending hero; but we are not going to have any country very long, unless such heroism is developed. * * * I believe I have lost all my ambitions—I don't think I would turn my hand to be a distinguished chemist or a famous mathematician. All I now care about is to be a useful citizen, with money enough to buy bread and firewood, and to teach my children to ride on horseback, and to look strangers in the face, especially Southern strangers.'

"We are here tonight to show, all too inadequately, the affection we feel and the honor we would fain pay to the man who received that letter and who carried out to the full its noble precepts.

"Certainly I know no better example of the 'useful citizen' portrayed by Charles Lowell than he in whose honor we have gathered here. But he has been more than a 'useful citizen.' He is a great public servant. He has never held public office and never desired it, but he has been none the less a great public servant in the highest and largest sense. In every year and through all the years of his life he has served the country, the state, and above all his fellow men.

"The number of years in a man's life does not matter when the account is made up. That which is of consequence is what was done with the years, whether few or many. Here every year has been marked by service to his fellow men or to his country by him whom we meet to honor. It is this which gives to the conventional birthday wishes tonight a reality of meaning and a glow of affection too often lacking in ceremonial utterances.

"We felicitate ourselves that as Americans the years of his life have been given to us. We measure age not by dates, but by mind and heart, and when both are active, both still warm with the flush of youth, as they are with Mr. Higginson, we wish for the happy returns of the anniversary as we hope from the bottom of our hearts that the procession of his days may still march on, beneficent, for many years to come."

Reads Old Record.

Bishop Lawrence read from a record 300 years old, of the action of a Rev. Mr. Higginson, in denouncing the drunken frolics of the Mayor and Aldermen in the town of Leicester, in which town he was a minister, and his subsequent removal to this country, where he became the first minister to the Massachusetts Bay Colony. He said that because of that removal Boston was honoring one of his progeny.

"He was a man," he said, "of deep convictions, who stood for the right as he saw it, of justice and purity, and that same strain has gone down through his descendants. So Maj. Higginson is a man of deep convictions and righteousness, of temperance, justice and purity. He has taught us the genius of friendship, and as loyal friends we stand here tonight to wish him 'Godspeed.'"

George W. Chadwick outlined the conditions of orchestral music in this city shortly before the formation of the Symphony Orchestra. He said that at that time if Boston was to maintain its musical prestige something had to be done, and Mr. Higginson did it. He continued:—

"Let us thank Maj. Higginson for this most perfect and wonderful of instruments, Symphony Hall, and while he is with us we can be sure that the musical centre of this country will not be moved to Oshkosh or any other Western city."

William Roscoe Thayer said that every member of the Tavern Club felt that Mr. Higginson was his particular friend. Speaking directly to him, he said: "I bring the affections of the Tavern Club and we beg you to teach us how to be young."

Gen. Weld said: "I would give five years of my life to carry on my face such a distinctive mark of bravery as you bear, Maj. Higginson."

Maj. Higginson Speaks.

Maj. Higginson, when he arose, waited several minutes for the applause to end. Then he said: "This is awful—and isn't it lucky that I am an old man or my head would have been turned by the things I have listened to, some of them true and some not. But life is going on and this is the result. What can I say in response to all this except to tell you the keynote of my faith. We should live according to our highest ideals, remember the creed of our nation, try to make everyone happy so that our country people will be happy.

"There are many things in this life hard to bear, and anyone who can help anybody else is a fortunate man. If there is anything that I've done to make you happy, think how lucky I have been.

"Friends, men and women, artists, business men and everybody, you know very well what this means to me. No words of mine can express my thoughts in the matter, you have done me this great honor, and I thank you again and again."

The Apollo Club then sang "Fair Harvard," in which everybody joined. Three hearty cheers were then given with a gusto and enthusiasm.

Seated at the head table were ex-Gov. Guild, Senator Weeks, George von L. Meyer, ex-Secretary of the Navy; James J. Storrow and many prominent neighbors and friends of the aged citizen.

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1914

HIGGINSON IS HONOR GUEST

Representative Citizens of City and State Gather at Banquet to Philanthropist

MAJOR HIGGINSON'S CREED OF LIFE

Try to make everyone happy.

Live according to your highest ideals.

Remember the creed of our nation—the pursuit of happiness.

There are many things in this life that are hard to bear, and anyone who can help another is a lucky man.

Crowning his 80th birthday with a tribute of respect and affection such as has been accorded few of her great citizens, Boston last night showed her appreciation of Major Henry Lee Higginson.

Assembled at a testimonial dinner in the Copley-Plaza Hotel, distinguished representatives of the many walks of life in which Major Higginson has long been an inspiring and helpful figure paid the city's full meed of grateful admiration.

LIFE OF KINDNESS

Men prominent in church, State, business, art, musical, military, educational and social circles recounted his many deeds of civic service and individual kindnesses which have marked his fourscore years of life, and then voiced a community's appreciation.

Deeply affected by the tribute, the guest of honor, with characteristic aversion for compliments, disclaimed credit for himself and then told the great gathering his creed of life—happiness in doing good for others.

The occasion was a spontaneous tribute to Major Higginson. The birthday dinner was arranged by no organization, but by a voluntary committee of his friends and associates in business and other walks of life.

In addition to the distinguished gathering about the tables in the great ballroom of the hotel, the galleries were filled with beautifully gowned women. Mrs. Higginson, with a party of relatives and close friends, occupied the central box in the balcony.

And between the speeches, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Major Higginson is the founder, and the Apollo Club, of which he has long been a friend and supporter, mingled their tributes of musical numbers.

Senator Henry Cabot Lodge was toastmaster and among the speakers and distinguished guests were Bishop William Lawrence, Senator John W. Weeks, George von L. Meyer, ex-Governor Curtis Guild, ex-Governor John D. Long, Lieutenant-Governor-elect Grafton D. Cushing, Howard Elliott, Eben D. Jordan, General Stephen M. Weld, George W. Chadwick, William Roscoe Thayer, James J. Storrow and mony others.

Warm tributes were paid the guest of honor in letters of regret from former President William Howard Taft, President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court, ex-Mayor Seth Low of New York, Charles Francis Adams and others.

A great Harvard "H" of crimson roses, standing on a table in the centre of the dining hall, bore witness to Harvard's appreciation of Soldiers Field, the Harvard Union and other gifts of Major Higginson to the university.

A cadet bugler, in full uniform, summoned the guests to the banquet hall at the appointed hour. Previous to calling upon the speakers of the evening Senator Lodge read a letter of regret from President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot of Harvard.

Referring to Major Higginson's gift of Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union Mr. Eliot wrote: "He taught in both these gifts democracy and toleration. His whole life shows what kind of a business man, social leader and humanitarian American freedom has produced and will continue to produce."

Tribute From Taft

Ex-President Taft's tribute follows:

"He has the finest flavor of New England, and typifies in the highest degree her best traditions. His broad, catholic value of things, his sense of responsibility for the general weal, his sturdy adherence to the principles that have made our country great, and the courage of his convictions—all awaken in one who knows his long, patriotic, useful life, real enthusiasm and grateful admiration."

John P. Reynolds read the other letters of regret and then followed an unexpected tribute to the guest of the occasion. As the strains of a musical selection died away, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra turned to the table where Major Higginson sat, and raising a glass, proposed "The Symphony Orchestra's toast" to Major Higginson. It was drunk amid applause.

Relating the sterling qualities of one of Major Higginson's ancestors, the Rev. Mr. Higginson, who was the first minister of the Massachusetts Bay colony, Bishop Lawrence, the first speaker, declared that the guest of the evening stood for the same qualities as the founder of his family in America—"for right as he understands it, for justice, for temperance, for purity."

"To him trade and money-making have been merely incidental in order that he might use what he made for the benefit of others," he declared.

Man of the People

"He has been always a man of the people, always a gentleman, always chivalrous. In the man in the street, in the Italian on the road, Henry Higginson has been able to see the heart of a gentleman.

"Of all the gifts that Henry Higginson has made to this community—munificent in amount though some have been—the greatest has been his expression of the genius of friendship. He has taught us that life is not in the quantity but in the quality, that gifts are not in the size, but in the love that is behind them.

"Major Higginson, we stand here tonight in loyalty to you because you have taught us the genius of friendship."

George W. Chadwick, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, paid the tribute of appreciation for what Major Higginson has done for musical circles in Boston.

"As the angel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," declared Mr. Chadwick," he did something that had never been heard of before in symphony concerts the world over, asking nothing in return but that the people should hear and love the great masterpieces of music."

Tavern Club Tribute

The tribute of the Tavern Club, of which Major Higginson has long been president, was brought by William Roscoe Thayer.

"I bring you the affection of the Tavern Club, Major," he said to the gray-haired guest, "and I beg you to teach us how to be young."

Last came the words of respect and affection from the Major's comrades on the battlegrounds of the Civil war. A letter from Charles Francis Adams, who served under him, related how on June 17, 1863, Major-Higginson received the deep sabre cut, the scar from which he wears on his right cheek, in a cavalry charge at Blue Ridge Pass.

Referring to that same scar, a moment later, General Stephen M. Weld, who was also serving in the Army of the Potomac at the time, declared: "Major Higginson, I would give five years of my life to carry on my face the distinctive mark of bravery and of personal contact with the enemy you bear."

Throughout these glowing expressions of respect, admiration, affection and appreciation, Major Higginson's face was a study of mingled emotions. Recollections of happy incidents of his life had brought smiles to his features; others had brought tears. There were tears in his eyes as Senator Lodge began his introductory remarks.

Major Higginson's Address

"Now comes the last and best of the many pleasures which have fallen to my lot this evening," the latter began. "You all know what this one now coming is to be to us all. But let us start fair. This is a birthday dinner, but we decline to admit any suggestion of age or time in that connection.

"'Hang the Almanac's cheat and the catalogue's spite.
'Old Time is a liar! We're 20 tonight.'

"Our guest comes with all the glory of his service and achievement upon him, but there comes with them no mark of the years except those which the greatest of poets said should accompany old age:

"Honor, love, obedience,
Troops of friends."

"I present to you Henry Lee Higginson."

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 19

MEMORABLE BIRTHDAY

FRIENDS JOIN IN HONOR OF MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON

GETS MANY TRIBUTES ON 80TH NATAL DAY

Senator Lodge, Bishop Lawrence, Gen. Stephen M. Weld, William Roscoe Thayer and Others Join in Praises of Boston's "Grand Old Man," During Dinner at Copley Plaza.

Surrounded by more than 350 relatives and admiring friends, among them leaders in almost every walk in life, statesmen, financiers, business men, professors, musicians and artists, besides admiring comrades, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, "Boston's Grand Old Man," celebrated his 80th birthday last evening at the Copley-Plaza Hotel.

Speeches of warm and sincere affection and admiration from those best fitted by intimate association to know his boundless humanitarianism, anecdotes of his military career during the Civil War, and stories of his civic and business life were listened to with deep interest and delight by those honored by being present at probably the most memorable "birthday party" ever held in this city.

All had come to pay tribute to the man who, because of his deep love for Boston and its citizens, founded and supported the first Symphony orchestra in America, establishing Boston as the premier city of America in music and art, author of many charities and benefactor of Harvard College.

Greeted With Cheers.

Throughout the entire evening this "Grand Old Man" was obliged to listen to all manner of praise, to have many long forgotten incidents in his life brought again to notice. Perhaps the most touching tribute of the evening was made manifest when he rose to thank them. For several minutes a deafening burst of applause echoed through the hall, coming with such a will as to make speech impossible.

Following the dinner, the balconies were thrown open to the women relatives and friends and were soon filled. The centre box was occupied by members of Maj. Higginson's family, while in the others were many prominent leaders in Boston and Brookline society.

Symphony Orchestra's Tribute.

In appreciation of what Maj. Higginson has done for music in this city, more than half of the Symphony Orchestra were present and rendered Tchaikowsky's Symphony exquisitely, following it by offering a toast to Maj. Higginson which was heartily applauded. Twenty-five members of the Apollo Club, under the leadership of Emil Mollenhauer, also added considerably to the evening's entertainment.

Senator Lodge presided and the speakers were Bishop Lawrence, George W. Chadwick of the New England Conservatory of Music, William Roscoe Thayer, representing the Tavern Club, of which Maj. Higginson has been president for many years; Gen. Stephen M. Weld, who spoke of Maj. Higginson's activity and valor in the Civil War, and Maj. Higginson.

Senator Lodge read a letter from Pres. Eliot, who was unable to attend because of a slight illness, extolling the virtues and munificence of Maj. Higginson and his deeds of kindness to the students of Harvard College in giving them Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union. He said that his career showed the business man, social leader and humanitarian what American freedom has produced.

Letters of regret at being unable to be present, praising his broadmindedness, his strong character, and deep sympathy were read from ex-President Taft, Justice O. W. Holmes of the United States Supreme Court, Pres. Lowell, and Seth Low of New York.

Letter From War Comrade.

A letter which brought a smile of quickened interest from the guest of the evening was from Charles Francis Adams, a comrade in arms during the Civil War, and was read by Charles Francis Adams 2d, telling of a few adventures which they had together.

Senator Lodge said:—

"Great wars in which the lives of nations are at stake take a heavy toll from all that is best in the generation called to arms. The best physically, mentally and in character are the first to go and the last to return. Grievous to those who come after and to the strength and quality of the nation itself is the sacrifice then nobly and rightly made. This was peculiarly true of both sides in our own Civil War of 50 years ago, and among the best who then went to their death there was no finer example than Charles Russell Lowell. Gentleman, soldier, scholar, as brilliant in intellect as he was strong in character, he personified that type of our English-speaking race which history enshrines in the name of Sir Philip Sydney.

"Not long before that supreme moment, he wrote a letter to a friend at home, a disabled [illegible]

[illegible] that you have [illegible]own all foolish ambitions, and are now content to become a "useful citizen." * * * Don't seek office, but don't "disremember" that the "useful citizen" always holds his time, his money and his life ready at the hint of his country. The useful citizen is a mighty, unpretending hero; but we are not going to have any country very long, unless such heroism is developed. * * * I believe I have lost all my ambitions—I don't think I would turn my hand to be a distinguished chemist or a famous mathematician. All I now care about is to be a useful citizen, with money enough to buy bread and firewood, and to teach my children to ride on horseback, and to look strangers in the face, especially Southern strangers.'

"We are here tonight to show, all too inadequately, the affection we feel and the honor we would fain pay to the man who received that letter and who carried out to the full its noble precepts.

"Certainly I know no better example of the 'useful citizen' portrayed by Charles Lowell than he in whose honor we have gathered here. But he has been more than a 'useful citizen.' He is a great public servant. He has never held public office and never desired it, but he has been none the less a great public servant in the highest and largest sense. In every year and through all the years of his life he has served the country, the state, and above all his fellow men.

"The number of years in a man's life does not matter when the account is made up. That which is of consequence is what was done with the years, whether few or many. Here every year has been marked by service to his fellow men or to his country by him whom we meet to honor. It is this which gives to the conventional birthday wishes tonight a reality of meaning and a glow of affection too often lacking in ceremonial utterances.

"We felicitate ourselves that as Americans the years of his life have been given to us. We measure age not by dates, but by mind and heart, and when both are active, both still warm with the flush of youth, as they are with Mr. Higginson, we wish for the happy returns of the anniversary as we hope from the bottom of our hearts that the procession of his days may still march on, beneficent, for many years to come."

Reads Old Record.

Bishop Lawrence read from a record 300 years old, of the action of a Rev. Mr. Higginson, in denouncing the drunken frolics of the Mayor and Aldermen in the town of Leicester, in which town he was a minister, and his subsequent removal to this country, where he became the first minister to the Massachusetts Bay Colony. He said that because of that removal Boston was honoring one of his progeny.

"He was a man," he said, "of deep convictions, who stood for the right as he saw it, of justice and purity, and that same strain has gone down through his descendants. So Maj. Higginson is a man of deep convictions and righteousness, of temperance, justice and purity. He has taught us the genius of friendship, and as loyal friends we stand here tonight to wish him 'Godspeed.'"

George W. Chadwick outlined the conditions of orchestral music in this city shortly before the formation of the Symphony Orchestra. He said that at that time if Boston was to maintain its musical prestige something had to be done, and Mr. Higginson did it. He continued:—

"Let us thank Maj. Higginson for this most perfect and wonderful of instruments, Symphony Hall, and while he is with us we can be sure that the musical centre of this country will not be moved to Oshkosh or any other Western city."

William Roscoe Thayer said that every member of the Tavern Club felt that Mr. Higginson was his particular friend. Speaking directly to him, he said: "I bring the affections of the Tavern Club and we beg you to teach us how to be young."

Gen. Weld said: "I would give five years of my life to carry on my face such a distinctive mark of bravery as you bear, Maj. Higginson."

Maj. Higginson Speaks.

Maj. Higginson, when he arose, waited several minutes for the applause to end. Then he said: "This is awful—and isn't it lucky that I am an old man or my head would have been turned by the things I have listened to, some of them true and some not. But life is going on and this is the result. What can I say in response to all this except to tell you the keynote of my faith. We should live according to our highest ideals, remember the creed of our nation, try to make everyone happy so that our country people will be happy.

"There are many things in this life hard to bear, and anyone who can help anybody else is a fortunate man. If there is anything that I've done to make you happy, think how lucky I have been.

"Friends, men and women, artists, business men and everybody, you know very well what this means to me. No words of mine can express my thoughts in the matter, you have done me this great honor, and I thank you again and again."

The Apollo Club then sang "Fair Harvard," in which everybody joined. Three hearty cheers were then given with a gusto and enthusiasm.

Seated at the head table were ex-Gov. Guild, Senator Weeks, George von L. Meyer, ex-Secretary of the Navy; James J. Storrow and many prominent neighbors and friends of the aged citizen.

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1914

HIGGINSON IS HONOR GUEST

Representative Citizens of City and State Gather at Banquet to Philanthropist

MAJOR HIGGINSON'S CREED OF LIFE

Try to make everyone happy.

Live according to your highest ideals.

Remember the creed of our nation—the pursuit of happiness.

There are many things in this life that are hard to bear, and anyone who can help another is a lucky man.

Crowning his 80th birthday with a tribute of respect and affection such as has been accorded few of her great citizens, Boston last night showed her appreciation of Major Henry Lee Higginson.

Assembled at a testimonial dinner in the Copley-Plaza Hotel, distinguished representatives of the many walks of life in which Major Higginson has long been an inspiring and helpful figure paid the city's full meed of grateful admiration.

LIFE OF KINDNESS

Men prominent in church, State, business, art, musical, military, educational and social circles recounted his many deeds of civic service and individual kindnesses which have marked his fourscore years of life, and then voiced a community's appreciation.

Deeply affected by the tribute, the guest of honor, with characteristic aversion for compliments, disclaimed credit for himself and then told the great gathering his creed of life—happiness in doing good for others.

The occasion was a spontaneous tribute to Major Higginson. The birthday dinner was arranged by no organization, but by a voluntary committee of his friends and associates in business and other walks of life.

In addition to the distinguished gathering about the tables in the great ballroom of the hotel, the galleries were filled with beautifully gowned women. Mrs. Higginson, with a party of relatives and close friends, occupied the central box in the balcony.

And between the speeches, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Major Higginson is the founder, and the Apollo Club, of which he has long been a friend and supporter, mingled their tributes of musical numbers.

Senator Henry Cabot Lodge was toastmaster and among the speakers and distinguished guests were Bishop William Lawrence, Senator John W. Weeks, George von L. Meyer, ex-Governor Curtis Guild, ex-Governor John D Long, Lieutenant-Governor-elect Grafton D. Cushing, Howard Elliott, Eben D. Jordan, General Stephen M. Weld, George W. Chadwick, William Roscoe Thayer, James J. Storrow and mony others.

Warm tributes were paid the guest of honor in letters of regret from former President William Howard Taft, President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court, ex-Mayor Seth Low of New York, Charles Francis Adams and others.

A great Harvard "H" of crimson roses, standing on a table in the centre of the dining hall, bore witness to Harvard's appreciation of Soldiers Field, the Harvard Union and other gifts of Major Higginson to the university.

A cadet bugler, in full uniform, summoned the guests to the banquet hall at the appointed hour. Previous to calling upon the speakers of the evening Senator Lodge read a letter of regret from President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot of Harvard.

Referring to Major Higginson's gift of Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union Mr. Eliot wrote: "He taught in both these gifts democracy and toleration. His whole life shows what kind of a business man, social leader and humanitarian American freedom has produced and will continue to produce."

Tribute From Taft

Ex-President Taft's tribute follows:

"He has the finest flavor of New England, and typifies in the highest degree her best traditions. His broad, catholic value of things, his sense of responsibility for the general weal, his sturdy adherence to the principles that have made our country great, and the courage of his convictions—all awaken in one who knows his long, patriotic, useful life, real enthusiasm and grateful admiration."

John P. Reynolds read the other letters of regret and then followed an unexpected tribute to the guest of the occasion. As the strains of a musical selection died away, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra turned to the table where Major Higginson sat, and raising a glass, proposed "The Symphony Orchestra's toast" to Major Higginson. It was drunk amid applause.

Relating the sterling qualities of one of Major Higginson's ancestors, the Rev. Mr. Higginson, who was the first minister of the Massachusetts Bay colony, Bishop Lawrence, the first speaker, declared that the guest of the evening stood for the same qualities as the founder of his family in America—"for right as he understands it, for justice, for temperance, for purity."

"To him trade and money-making have been merely incidental in order that he might use what he made for the benefit of others," he declared.

Man of the People

"He has been always a man of the people, always a gentleman, always chivalrous. In the man in the street, in the Italian on the road, Henry Higginson has been able to see the heart of a gentleman.

"Of all the gifts that Henry Higginson has made to this community—munificent in amount though some have been—the greatest has been his expression of the genius of friendship. He has taught us that life is not in the quantity but in the quality, that gifts are not in the size, but in the love that is behind them.

"Major Higginson, we stand here tonight in loyalty to you because you have taught us the genius of friendship."

George W. Chadwick, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, paid the tribute of appreciation for what Major Higginson has done for musical circles in Boston.

"As the angel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," declared Mr. Chadwick," he did something that had never been heard of before in symphony concerts the world over, asking nothing in return but that the people should hear and love the great masterpieces of music."

Tavern Club Tribute

The tribute of the Tavern Club, of which Major Higginson has long been president, was brought by William Roscoe Thayer.

"I bring you the affection of the Tavern Club, Major," he said to the gray-haired guest, "and I beg you to teach us how to be young."

Last came the words of respect and affection from the Major's comrades on the battlegrounds of the Civil war. A letter from Charles Francis Adams, who served under him, related how on June 17, 1863, Major-Higginson received the deep sabre cut, the scar from which he wears on his right cheek, in a cavalry charge at Blue Ridge Pass.

Referring to that same scar, a moment later, General Stephen M. Weld, who was also serving in the Army of the Potomac at the time, declared: "Major Higginson, I would give five years of my life to carry on my face the distinctive mark of bravery and of personal contact with the enemy you bear."

Throughout these glowing expressions of respect, admiration, affection and appreciation, Major Higginson's face was a study of mingled emotions. Recollections of happy incidents of his life had brought smiles to his features; others had brought tears. There were tears in his eyes as Senator Lodge began his introductory remarks.

Major Higginson's Address

"Now comes the last and best of the many pleasures which have fallen to my lot this evening," the latter began. "You all know what this one now coming is to be to us all. But let us start fair. This is a birthday dinner, but we decline to admit any suggestion of age or time in that connection.

"'Hang the Almanac's cheat and the catalogue's spite.
'Old Time is a liar! We're 20 tonight.'

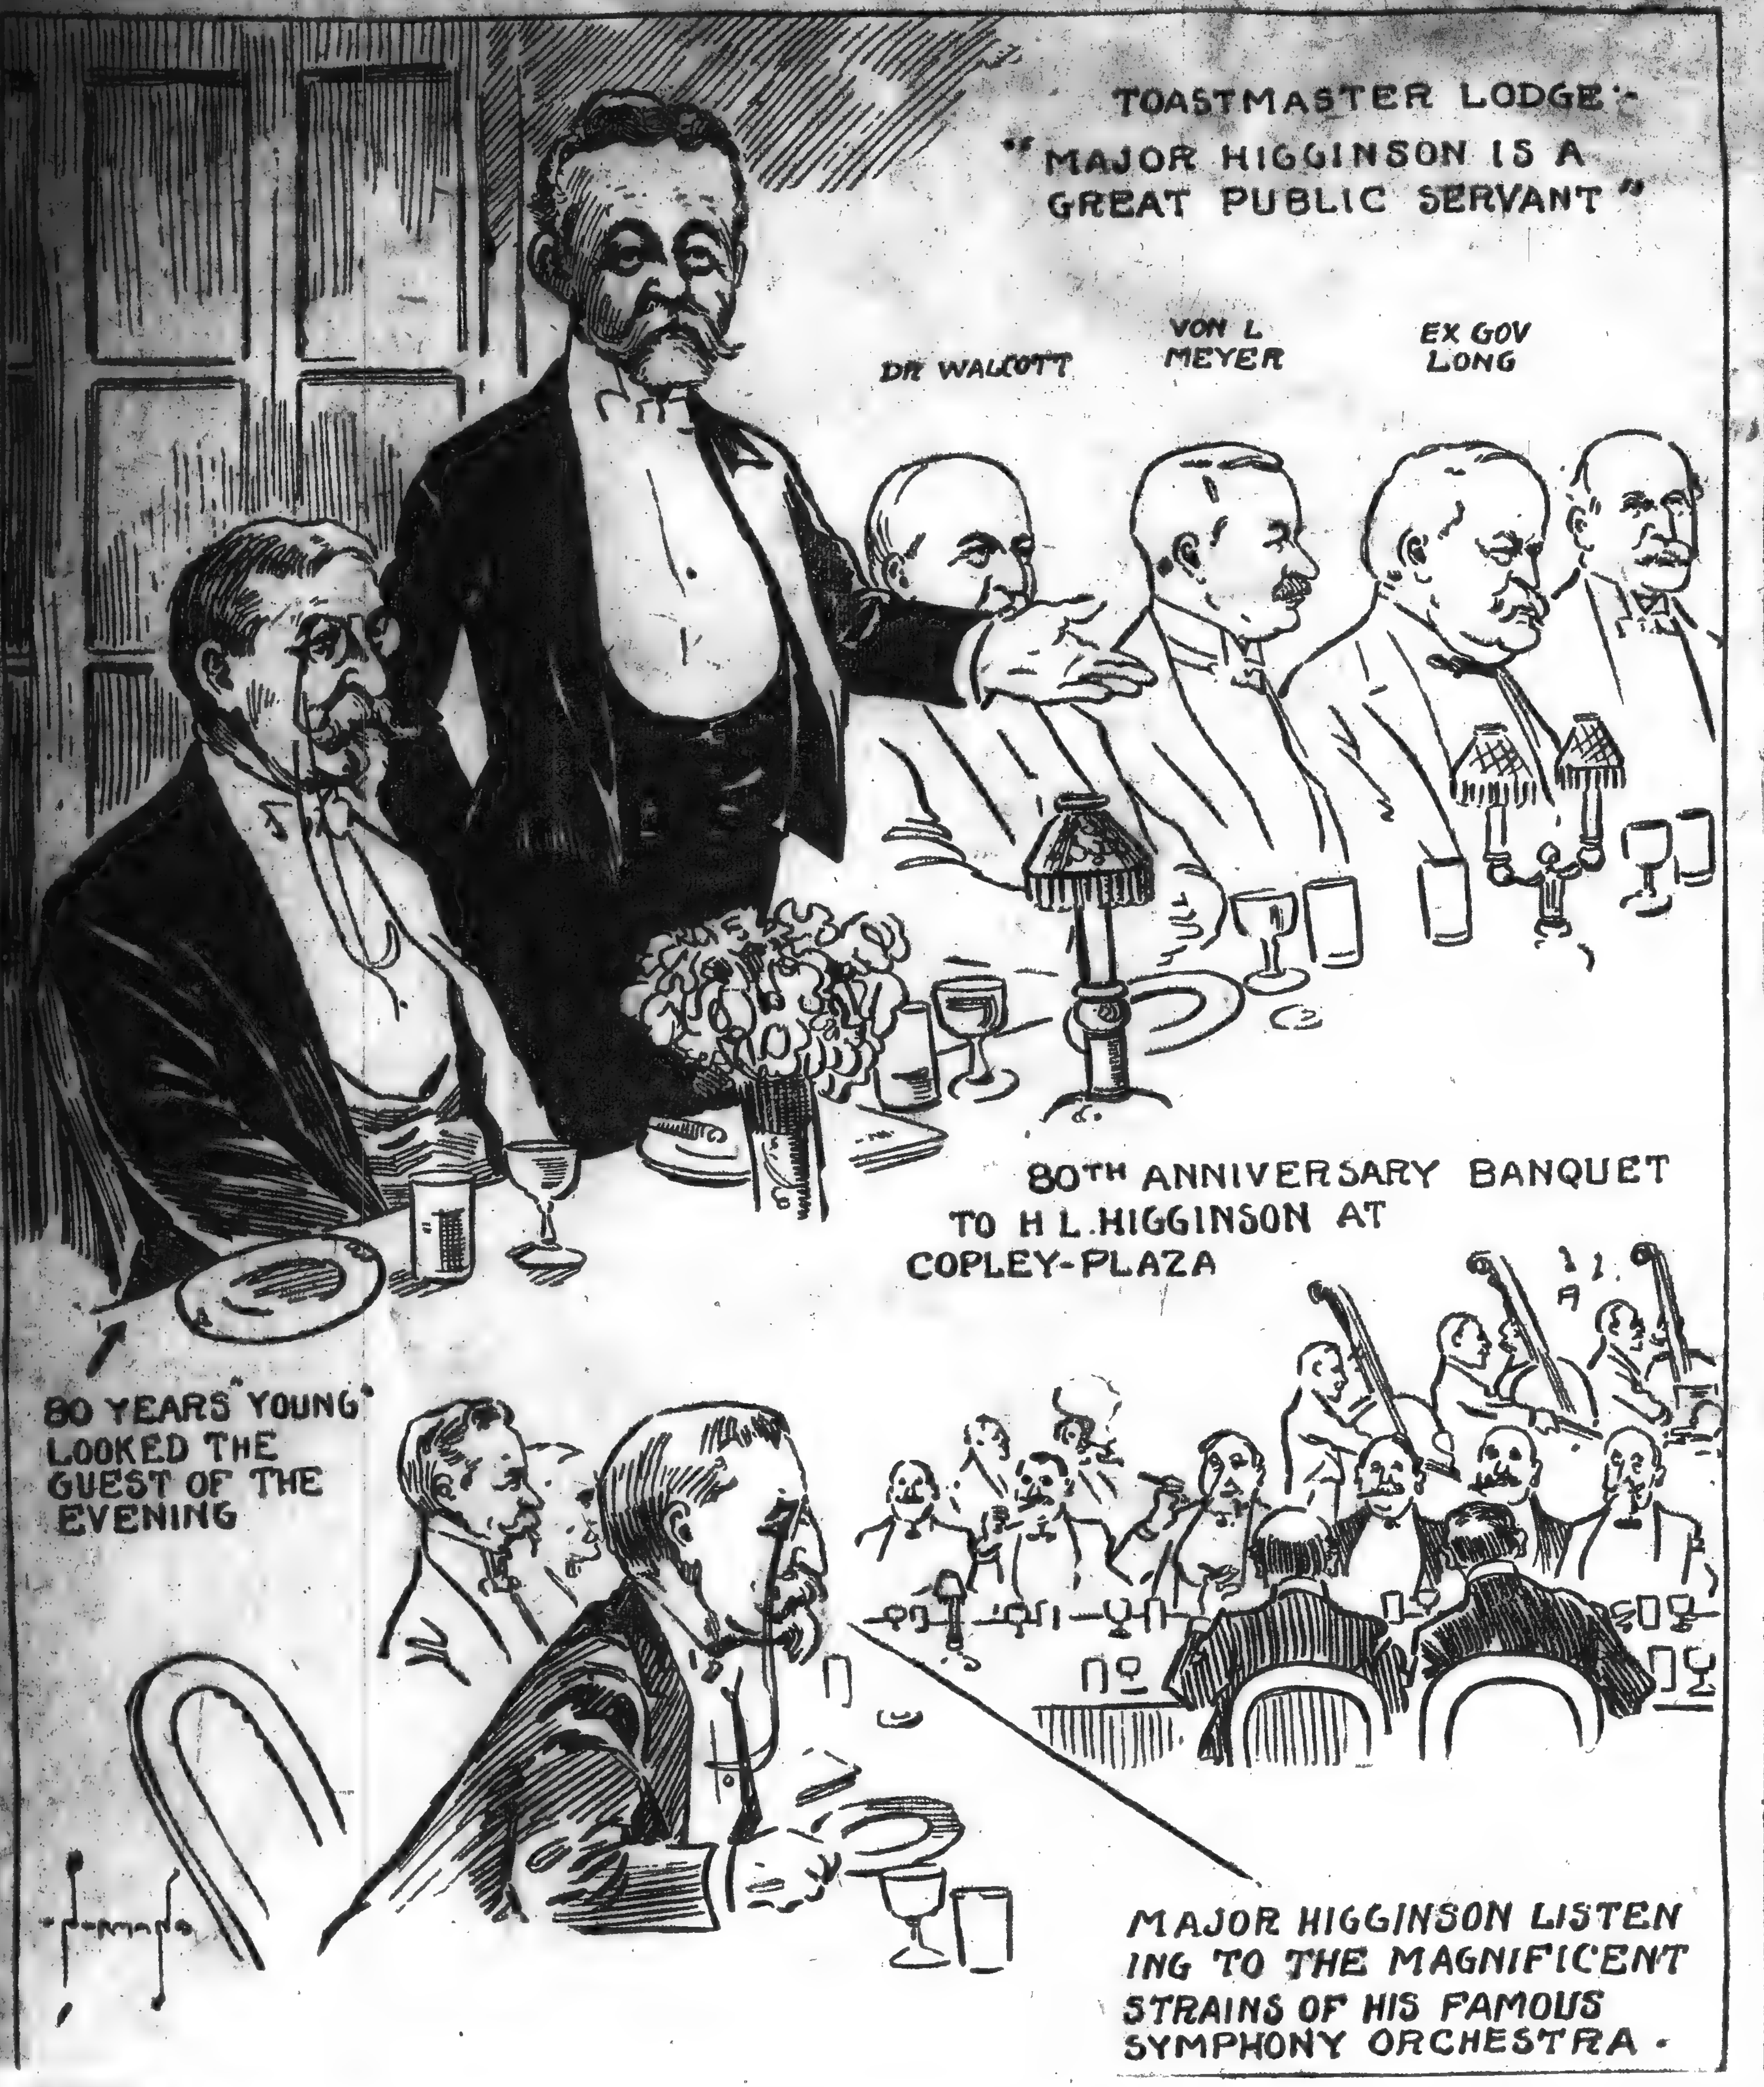
"Our guest comes with all the glory of his service and achievement upon him, but there comes with them no mark of the years except those which the greatest of poets said should accompany old age:

"Honor, love, obedience,
Troops of friends."

"I present to you Henry Lee Higginson."

[52]

Senator Lodge Toastmaster at Banquet for Major Higginson



TOASTMASTER LODGE:-
"MAJOR HIGGINSON IS A GREAT PUBLIC SERVANT"
DR WALCOTT
VON L MEYER
EX GOV LONG
80TH ANNIVERSARY BANQUET TO H L HIGGINSON AT COPLEY-PLAZA
80 YEARS "YOUNG" LOOKED THE GUEST OF THE EVENING
MAJOR HIGGINSON LISTENING TO THE MAGNIFICENT STRAINS OF HIS FAMOUS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON JOURNAL— NOVEMBER 19,

HONOR HIGGINSON ON HIS 80TH BIRTHDAY

Men Prominent in City, State and Nation Pay Tribute to Him as a Public-Spirited Citizen at Banquet in Copley-Plaza Hotel.

At one of the most elaborate birthday parties ever held in Boston, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson was greeted by friends of city, State and nation, on his 80th birthday at a banquet at the Copley-Plaza last night.

A feast of complimentary tributes, a charming bit of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an inspiring "soldier song" by the Apollo Glee Club, and a rousing cheer were all accorded to Maj. Higginson, "lover of art and men, public-spirited citizen, soldier, business man, and frend."

Senator Lodge, who was toastmaster, said:

"Certainly I know of no better example of the 'useful citizen' portrayed by Charles Lowell than he in whose honor we have gathered here. But he has been more than a useful citizen, admirable as that modest title is. He has never held public office and never desired it, but he has been none the less a great public servant in the highest and largest sense. In every year and through all the years of his life he has served the country, the State and, above all, his fellow-men.

Served Good Causes

"In war and in peace, on the battlefield and in the sheltered city, in unending charities, in the encouragement of art and in the advance of learning, wherever a good cause was to be found, there has his service been rendered.

"The number of years in a man's life does not matter when the account is made up. That which is of consequence is what was done with the years, whether few or many. Here every year has been marked by service to his fellow men or to his country by him whom we meet to honor. It is this which gives to the conventional birthday wishes tonight a reality of meaning and a glow of affection too often lacking in ceremonial utterances. We felicitate ourselves that as Americans the years of [illegible] given to us. We [illegible] by mind [illegible] wish for the happy returns of the anniversary as we hope from the bottom of our hearts that the procession of his days may still march on, beneficent, for many years to come.

Tribute in Browning's Words

"To him, as to very few, is it given to repeat, with a truth which we all acknowledge, the beautiful words of Browning's 'Rabbi Ben Ezra:'

" 'Grow old along with me!
The Best is yet to be,
The last of Life for which the first was made;
Our times are in His hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God, see all nor be afraid." '

Bishop William Lawrence said the major is a direct descendant of the Rev. Higginson of the town of Leiceste in England, who 300 years ago came Massachusetts to settle. He left England in spite of the fact that he was offered large emoluments to stay. These he refused and obtained for a Rev. Angel who, unlike himself, was a Conformist.

"And our friend, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, truly embodies the spirit of his ancestor," said the bishop. He said that all the major's works show that he is a man of "deep convictions, quiet and serene courage; a man enwrapped in the work of truth, justice and the right, doing the service of God."

Made Boston Mecca of Music

George W. Chadburne, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, told how Maj. Higginson made Boston "the mecca" and "Symphony Hall the great Moslem" of music.

Gen. Stephen M. Wells, at the conclusion of his address, turned to Mr. Higginson and said: "Colonel, I would give five years of my life to carry the scar that you have on your face. You have it now because you showed persistency and courage. You have it because of the traits that you have displayed all through your later life."

The others who spoke were William Roscoe Thayer, who represented the Tavern Club, of which Maj. Higginson has been president for many years, and Letters were read from President Emeritus Eliot, ex-President William Howard Taft, President A. Lawrence Lowell, Seth Low of New York and Oliver Wendell Holmes of Washington. All the writers were unable to attend but sent their felicitations.

Higginson Greeted With Cheers

Maj. Higginson was greeted with cheers. He said:

"Friends, this is awful. Isn't it lucky I am an old man. Else I would have had my head turned. There were many things said about me here this evening. A few were true, and many were not.

"Life's going on and this is the result of it. I'm sorry for it. If I go to the glass and comb my hair tomorrow morning I won't know this man. What can I say in response to all this?

"From boyhood I have tried to live the life to which my ideals pointed. I have tried to make others happy and prosperous. I have tried to come as near as possible to the creed of our nation.

"In my work I have tried to impress upon myself that my friend owed me nothing, but that I owed him all.

"Friends, men and women, artists, lovers of truth, all, you know what this dinner means to me. You know that I have no words to express my feelings. Thank you all. Let me thank you again and again."

At the conclusion of the major's speech and at the suggestion of Governor Guild all the diners rose to their feet and cheered Maj. Higginson to the echo.

The evening closed with all joining with Maj. Higginson in singing "Fair Harvard."

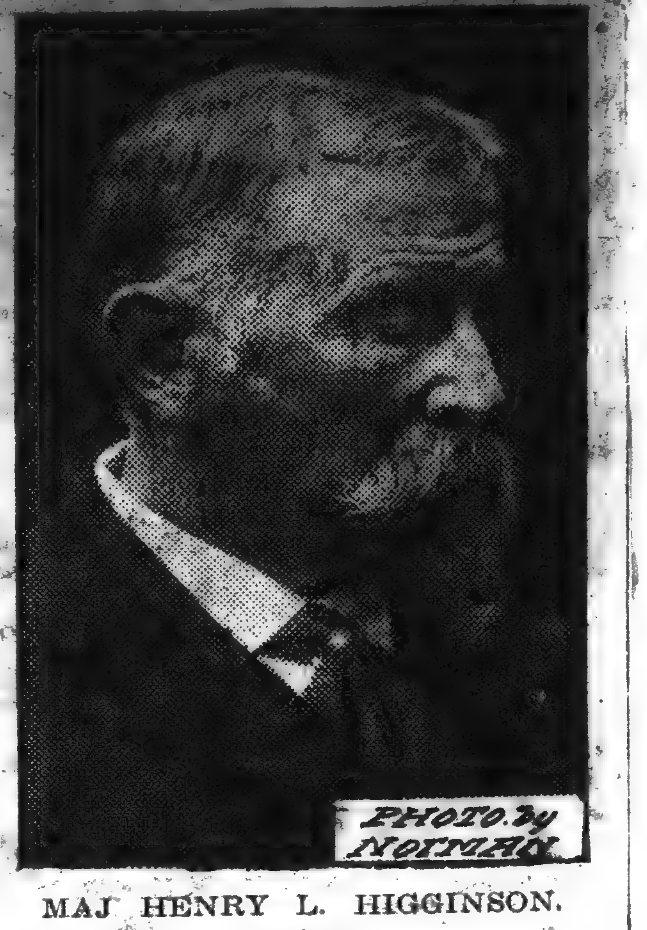
BOSTON GLOBE— NOVEMBER 19,

MAJ HIGGINSON HONORED GUEST

Notable Gathering on His 80th Birthday.

Senator Lodge Greets Him as Type of Useful Citizen.

Many Friends Pay Warm Tributes of Affection.



MAJ HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

It was a splendid body of more than 300 men, representative of the very best in Boston's art, commercial, banking, clerical and legal circles, that assembled at the Copley-Plaza last evening to pay a tribute of respect and affection to Maj Henry L. Higginson, foremost Boston patron of the arts and leader in philanthropic work, involving both generous financial giving and personal service, in honor of the 80th anniversary of his birth.

It was such a gathering as even a confirmed attendant at large public gatherings would hardly see more than once in a lifetime, including, as it did, not only faces of men of National repute in many spheres of the world's affairs, but also numbers of men, like judges of the higher courts and men of advanced age, many of them retired from active association with business or the world in general, who seldom attend a large gathering save for some occasion of transcendent importance.

United States Senator Lodge was presiding officer and his fellow-Senator, Hon John W. Weeks, was also at the head table. Ex-President Taft had sent a letter that breathed a spirit of genuine regret at inability to be present.

The highest that art can furnish in this country was present in the Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr Muck, its conductor, and the orchestra alternated between the courses of the banquet and the after-dinner speeches, with the Apollo Club, which sang choral selections under the baton of Emil Mollenhauer.

Many Fields Represented.

The speakers were comparatively few, but all were long-standing friends of the guest, and their addresses, while designedly brief and in the main devoid of formality, spoke sentiments that manifestly came direct from the heart.

The speakers had been so selected as to represent in turn the Government, the world of music, education as represented by Harvard University, the church, old friends as represented by the Tavern Club, of which Maj Higginson has been president for many years, and comrades of the major in the Civil War. Maj Higginson, of course, spoke last, with his customary modesty, and the affair ended after 11 p m with the singing of "Fair Harvard" by the entire gathering.

The seven balcony boxes in the great banquet hall were occupied almost entirely by the women relatives and friends of Maj Higginson, Mrs Higginson being seated in the center box, exactly opposite her husband, and the total number of women, who were in resplendent toilets, being about 70.

At the chief table, flanking Senator Lodge and the honored guest, Maj Higginson, were: Brooks Adams, Charles F. Adams 2d, George R. Agassiz, Charles B. Amory, Dr William S. Bigelow, George W. Chadwick, Alexander Cochrane, C. A. Coffin, Hon Grafton D. Cushing, Frederick A. Delano, Howard Elliott, Pres H. A. Garfield, Hon Curtis Guild, A. H. Higginson, F. L. Higginson, F. L. Higginson Jr, Charles C. Jackson, Rt Rev William Lawrence, George C. Lee, Col T. L. Livermore, Hon John D. Long, Hon Justice W. C. Loring, Pres R. C. Maclaurin of Tech, Hon George von L. Meyer, Col Charles F. Morse, Dr Karl Muck, Hon Richard Olney, Edwin Robinson, Gen Morris Schaff, Gen H. L. Scott, F. C. Shattuck, Col R. H. Stevenson, Charles A. Stone, James J. Storrow, William R. Thayer, Dr H. P. Walcott, Hon John W. Weeks, and Stephen M. Weld.

Senator Lodge's Tribute.

Senator Lodge in his opening remarks drew a parallel between the present war and the Civil War of 50 years ago, in their drain on the very best blood of the Nations, quoting from a letter sent home from the Civil War by Charles Russell Lowell, in which the writer urged that all personal ambitions be subordinated during the war to the one idea of rendering useful service to the country.

"We are here tonight to show," he observed, "all too inadequately, the affection we feel and the honor we would fain pay to the man who received that letter and who has carried out to the full its noble precepts. He to whom the letter was addressed needed no admonitions to set him upon the path to which Lowell had pointed.

"His own nature did that, and yet as he has fared along the road of life those words of his friend who had won 'the great prize of death in battle' must, I think, have often recurred to him and cheered him onward as he played his part of the 'useful citizen' with an ever-extending sphere of service.

Type of Useful Citizen.

"Certainly I know no better example of the 'useful citizen' portrayed by Charles Lowell than he in whose honor we have gathered here. But he has been more than a 'useful citizen,' admirable as that modest title is.

"He has never held public office and [illegible] the less a great public servant in the highest and largest sense. In every year and through all the years of his life he has served the country, the State, and above all, his fellow men.

"In war and in peace, on the battlefield and in the sheltered city, in unending charities, in the encouragement of art and in the advance of learning, wherever a good cause was to be found, there has his service been rendered.

"The number of years in a man's life does not matter when the account is made up. That which is of consequence is what was done with the years, whether few or many. Here every year has been marked by service to his fellow-men or to his country by him whom we meet to honor.

Wish Him Many More Years.

"It is this which gives to the conventional birthday wishes tonight a reality of meaning and a glow of affection too often lacking in ceremonial utterances. We felicitate ourselves that, as Americans, the years of his life have been given to us.

"We measure age not by dates, but by mind and heart, and when both are active, both still warm with the flush of youth, as they are with Mr Higginson, we wish for the happy returns of the anniversary, as we hope from the bottom of our hearts that the procession of his days may still march on, beneficent, for many years to come.

"To him, as to very few, is it given to repeat, with a truth which we all acknowledge, the beautiful words of Browning's 'Rabbi Ben Ezra':

" 'Grow old along with me!
The Best is yet to be,
The last of Life for which the first was made;
Our times are in His hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, nor be afraid." ' "

Symphony Orchestra's Offering.

After Senator Lodge had finished the Symphony Orchestra played the Pilgrims' Chorus from "Lohengrin" with a power and a feeling that held the great audience spellbound throughout. Then, at the suggestion of the orchestra, made through Dr Muck, the entire assemblage rose and drank the health of the guest of the evening.

Senator Lodge next announced that he had hoped to see Dr Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, present to speak for the educational world, but that the doctor is convalescing from a cold and could not leave home.

The Senator credited Dr Eliot with being "one of the great men of this age and this country, who, by his activity in the educational world during the last 40 years, has influenced more lives than can be estimated."

Dr Charles W. Eliot's Letter.

The Senator then read Dr Eliot's letter, which began by saying that though Maj Higginson is regarded as characteristically Bostonian, he was actually born in New York, and though regarded as preeminently a Harvard man, he spent only one year at the university and never received a degree from that institution till he was 48 years old, when he received an honorary one.

Dr Eliot continued, in part: "Appointed a fellow of the corporation when he was 59 years old, Mr Higginson has labored with diligence and devotion for the welfare of the institution during 21 years. He has had no return save the satisfaction of serving and helping a great institution.

"He has taken active part in many efforts to increase the endowment of the university, and has always felt it a privilege to use his resources and his influence in that way.

"By giving Soldiers Field to Harvard he commemorated not himself, but some of his boyhood friends who died for their country. He believed the manly sports of youth make vigorous and serviceable men, and he wished to inculcate the duty of patriotism, the splendor of self-sacrifice, and devotion to the common good.

"He gave Harvard Union to the university to teach the value of wide acquaintance with many sorts of young men from many parts of the world and to supply an example of comfort and of good facilities for work and play without luxury or enfeebling softness.

"In both his great gifts to the university he will long teach democracy and toleration and the high value toward success in life of friendship and broad sympathies." The letter also paid a high tribute to Maj Higginson for his annual series of 10 Symphony Orchestra concerts at Sanders Theatre.

Some Colonial History.

Bishop William Lawrence, whose whole address breathed the spirit of the warmest personal friendship, went into a bit of early Puritan history in England and New England to show how Maj Higginson had apparently inherited some of his most conspicuous and most admired traits from his first American ancestor, Rev Mr Higginson, who came from Leicester, Eng, to Salem about 285 years ago.

George W. Chadwick, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, next paid a tribute to Maj Higginson for making Boston the musical center of the Nation, and he said it will remain so as long as the Symphony Orchestra continues to exist.

William Roscoe Thayer spoke for the Tavern Club. Charles Francis Adams 2d read a letter from his uncle, Hon Charles Francis Adams, who is at Washington and who described his relations with Maj Higginson as a comrade in the war.

Gen Stephen M. Weld made comparisons of conditions in the Civil War and the present war and said to Maj Higginson in concluding: "Major, I would give five years of my life to carry on my face that saber cut, that mark of bravery and of contact with the enemy, which you bear. It is a badge of courage that everyone must envy."

Maj Higginson Presented.

In presenting Maj Higginson, Senator Lodge said: "Now comes the last and best of the many pleasures which have fallen to my lot this evening. You all know what this one now coming is to be to us all. But let us start fair. This is a birthday dinner, but we decline to admit any suggestion of age or time in that connection.

Hang the Almanac's cheat and the catalogue's spite,
Old Time is a liar! We're twenty tonight.

"Our guest comes with all the glory of his service and achievement upon him, but there comes with them no mark of the years except those which the greatest of poets said should accompany old age:

Honor, Love, Obedience,
Troops of Friends.

"I present to you Henry Lee Higginson."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Ex-President's Taft's Regrets.

Maj Higginson, in responding to all the compliments that had been paid him, arose and convulsed the audience by exclaiming: "This is awful. If I were not an old man my head would be turned by what has been said here tonight, some of it true, but most of it not true." After a few more discursive remarks of a deprecatory nature he thanked everybody present heartily for the compliment paid in giving him such a birthday celebration.

John P. Reynolds, one of the hardest workers in getting up the dinner, read several letters from friends unable to come. One from Ex-President Taft read:

"I feel a real regret that I cannot attend the dinner to Maj Higginson on his 80th birthday. He has the finest flavor of New England and typifies in the highest degree her best traditions.

"His broad, catholic view of things, his sense of responsibility for the general weal, his sturdy adherence to the principles that have made our country great and the courage of his convictions all awaken in one who knows his long, patriotic, useful life real enthusiasm and grateful admiration. I envy those who are to be present personally to tender him their felicitations."

Written Felicitations.

Pres A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University sent a letter saying he had been called away from home and reviewing some of the good things that Maj Higginson has done for young men through Harvard, both by his gifts and his personal talks.

Justice Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court, a cousin of Maj Higginson, sent an appreciative message, as did Ex-Mayor Seth Low of New York.

Among well-known men who were present were: Eben D. Jordan, Oliver Ames, Ezra H. Baker, Gen William A. Bancroft, Francis R. Bangs, Clarence W. Barron, Walter C. Baylies, Rev Sherrard Billings, T. Dennie Boardman, Robert S. Bradley, I. Tucker Burr, J. Randolph Coolidge Jr, Charles E. Cotting, Gordon Dexter, Philip Dexter, Hon Samuel J. Elder, William C. Endicott, Hon Louis A. Frothingham, Rev Paul Revere Frothingham, Thomas B. Gannett, R. H. Gardiner, George P. Gardner, Hon William A. Gaston, Wallace Goodrich, Rev George A. Gordon, Hon Robert Grant, Augustus Hemenway, Robert F. Herrick, Admiral Francis J. Higginson, Prof Ira N. Hollis, William Hooper, James H. Hustis, E. C. Johnson, Jerome Jones, Joseph Lee, John M. Longyear, A. P. Loring, John Lowell, Langdon P. Marvin, Justice James F. Mitchell, John T. Morse Jr, Frederick S. Moseley, Robert Lincoln O'Brien, Gen Robert S. Oliver, R. T. Paine 2d, Hon Herbert Parker, Henry Parkman, Rev Endicott Peabody, Francis Peabody, Bela L. Pratt, Neal Rantoul, Philip L. Saltonstall, Robert G. Shaw, A. Shuman, Col William D. Sohier, Moorfield Storey, Hon John A. Sullivan, Eugene V. R. Thayer, Edwin S. Webster, Prof Barrett Wendell, Frederick Winsor, Robert Winsor and Arthur D. Hill.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NOVEMBER 28,

SYMPHONY DOES BRILLIANT WORK IN "SCHLEMIHL"

Biographical Work of Reznicek Programs Modern Life From Many Angles—Harold Bauer Piano Soloist in Beethoven

SYMPHONY HALL—Sixth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, afternoon of Nov. 27. The program: Reznicek, symphonic biography, "Schlemihl"; Mozart, symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Beethoven, fourth piano concerto in G major, Harold Bauer, soloist.

In the work of Reznicek the audience recognized a veritable picture of modern life. It responded to the performance of the piece with an attention that meant it was in the presence of a symphonic writer who knows the life of his times down to the ground. For the listeners at the rehearsal the "Schlemihl" was a study of a typical present-day character, a discussion of the social motives that are actuating men and women today. To get its point was to know the world better, to know it better economically and politically. To take it in completely was to enjoy a view of the whole world of business, diplomacy and government. Hearers who followed the ins and outs of the story carefully found that they were making a journey to the principal points of interest in their international environment.

Orchestral music, one way of regarding it, cannot delineate character or paint scenery. The doubters can ask for the note that indicates a man and for the sound that means a tree or a house, and no answer can be given them. The competency of the orchestra to impersonate and describe is proved by the reaction it makes on hearers. And after all, it is precisely the same with statues, pictures and novels. Somebody must take notice of them and be moved, else they are but stone, canvas and paper. The response to the artist, not the medium through which he gives the message, is what counts. And the Reznicek work awoke a remarkable response in that skilled, shrewd, alert, artistic representative of the community, the Symphony [illegible] audience. There came [illegible] subtle one of attention to the spi[illegible] of the story as the composer unfol[illegible] them.

The symphonic biography is a distinguished success as a piece of program music. And the success of it arises, as in all good program writing, less in the way it follows the printed scenario than in its careful proportion of moods, its judicious arrangements of contrasts, its thoughtful manipulation of the subject-matter. In other words, the effectiveness of its impressions results from pure artistic management. The composer's purpose to give an account of a modern man's career is subordinated to his desire to construct an attractive symphony, to produce a piece of music that shall add to the pleasure to be found in concert halls.

The biography was most sympathetically presented by Dr. Muck and his men. The composition is almost too much for an orchestra even of the highest quality to prepare in a week. The performance should grow more elastic with repetitions. By the time it reaches the last cities of the orchestral tour next week, it should be in perfect trim. The first half of it was read on Friday afternoon with a brilliancy that was little short of surprising.

Conductor and orchestra shifted from Reznicek to Mozart with perfect ease. The performance of the symphony in C major would have been enough to give the program distinction, with the enormous task of the biography omitted.

Up to the last number the audience heard a modern concert. It heard works of serious orchestral import, works that represent an early school of scoring and a recent school, each at its best. The last piece took the house back to the artistic past of Boston, when the Symphony concert was the soloist. The second balcony, which is both the most liberal part of the Friday house to new ideas and the most tenacious of old ones, applauded the soloist at the end of the afternoon heartily. Indeed Mr. Bauer deserved all the applause he got. For his playing was in all respects admirable. But the fact remains that piano concertos do not fill the place in the public heart that they used to. The piano is accepted as an orchestral instrument but it is not valued as it once was as a solo instrument with orchestra. To begin with, those who have keen ears know that they do not get more than half the pianist's message in a large hall. And the mere effect of virtuoso display is not impressive today. Hearers know that there are better uses for the orchestra than to be accompaniment to a piano. There are so many great symphonic pieces demanding a place on programs for the public as a whole to find time to attend to secondary modes of expression, even when Beethoven is the composer.

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 28,

BAUER MATCHES SYMPHONY'S ART

Pianist and Orchestra Give Beethoven Concerto Brilliantly.

The first of the great musical artists to visit Boston this season, Harold Bauer, made his appearance yesterday as Symphony soloist. He is the first solo pianist of the current Symphony year—the first virtuoso who has proved himself a match for the orchestra.

There were great expectations on the part of the public, evidently, for several hundred enthusiasts were standing outside the hall at noon, long before the concert began; and there was a full house at 2.30. The expectations were richly fulfilled. It is doubtful if many were drawn to the concert by the Reznicek number, the symphonic biography called "Schlemihl," an imaginative composition, yesterday, brilliantly performed, but still mostly caviare to the average audience. The Reznicek music is realistic and descriptive. It is a tone picture sketched by a man who loves melodrama. The performance enriched it, for the Symphony men played as if they were assisting Dr. Muck to introduce the ninth wonder of the world. They got an ovation for their work, and they deserved it.

Bue the etraordinary excellence of the concert was to be enjoyed by all in the performance of Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony" and Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, in C major, with Mr. Bauer as soloist. Mr. Bauer played the concerto more beautifully, on the whole, than any Symphony soloist for nearly twenty years, or since Joseffy played it. His art ran the gamut of technic and of expression. The power was tempered with restraint and repose, and the poetry of the concerto came forth through tones that alternately charmed the ear and warmed the blood. Taken altogether, it was a performance of Olympian strength and beauty, a rarity to be compared with a view of a summer sunrise on Frenchmans Bay or a dance by Mordkin.

The orchestra goes on tour next week, with Mr. Bauer as soloist.

The prayer in the Reznicek number was sung by Paul Draper, the New

---

SCHOENBERG WOULD RESTATE ARCHITECTURAL RULES OF MUSIC IN HIS "FIVE PIECES"

In Hearing Forthcoming Work Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra the Listener Must Discard Notions of Melody and Harmony and Look for the Structure

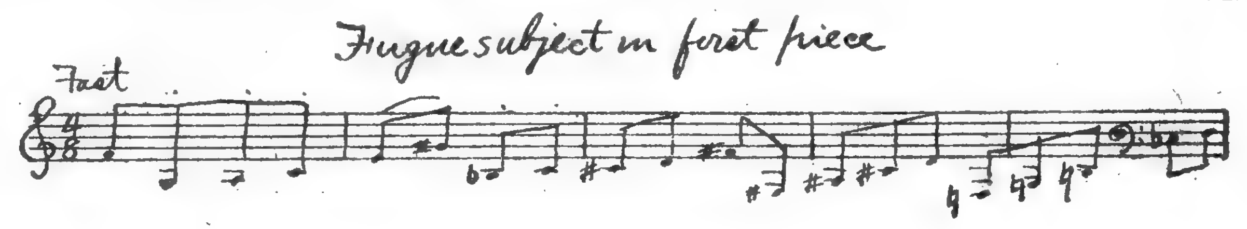
In these days of musical enlightenment in Boston, something extraordinary in the way of orchestral sound must be offered to cause Symphony concert listeners any surprise. Something pretty near a go-as-you-please on the part of the players would have to happen before the public would make objections.

It has been a long time since the Symphony conductor has presented anything that the public would not accept as art. People laugh today when they think how once they were scandalized at the music of Wagner. Wagner, who in the early years of the orchestra could be understood by only a few, is now a drawing name on popular programs. Almost as meaningless at that time was Brahms. And as for Strauss, he was remote from Beethoven even to insolence. His symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," at its first performance emptied a good part of the seats in old Music hall. This piece at its revival recently was far, indeed, from being an offense to the hearers. It just gave the impression that its composer was too busy in mastering a style to attend properly to his structure.

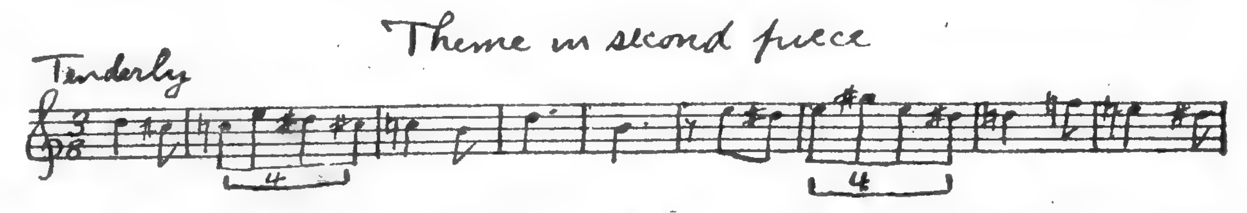
Definition Revised

The difficulty 25 years ago in Boston was that the public held a narrow definition of music. That does not mean that the public thought narrowly about music. It had abundant listening power. It gave enthusiastic attention to Haydn. Without doubt audiences then heard the symphonies of Mozart more intelligently than audiences today do. Keenness of understanding is required of a hearer to take in a piece of music built on eighteenth century simple lines in just the same degree as to take in twentieth century complex lines. The voluminous tone poems of Strauss and the vast symphonies of Mahler imply not enlarged thought, but only a freer means of expressing thought.

Fugue subject in first piece



Theme in second piece



The orchestral public in the eighties and early nineties was as keenly appreciative within its confined definition as the modern public is within its broader definition. It perhaps knew only too well that the new definition would mean at last a shift of emphasis, that the classic masters would in time fall into neglect.

The forward-looking people who have seen Wagner, Brahms and Strauss through to triumph may soon have the same experience that the champions of the old schools of compositions had two decades and a half ago. For a reform in music-writing is now in progress, which is the most radical attempted since the time of Bach. This reform, headed by Arnold Schoenberg, means a complete change of building materials of music, and probably in time a thorough restatement of its architectural rules.

Music to those who ended all symphonic art with Beethoven meant first, melody—that is to say, melody with a systematic accompaniment of chords; second, it meant organic structure through theme; third, it meant a group of clearly defined moods, which may be roughly described as contemplation, romantic sentiment and comedy. Symphonies, in other words, had to be composed in movements, called allegro, andante and scherzo, or names of like significance. Overtures had to be, generally speaking, on the allegro design.

Brahms disturbed this scheme very little. He really did nothinig more than amplify it. Wagner, to mention only his strictly orchestral pieces, his overtures and preludes, did not upset the structure of his predecessors. But he did reorganize melody, and with it the scheme of accompanying chords.

Strauss followed Wagner more or less in his melodic methods. People could have endured him with Wagner to show them what he meant if he had not pulled formal structure to pieces. But in time [illegible] it was found [illegible]ture with his tone poems, the essentials of the old symphonic form were left. He still kept the moods of contemplation, sentiment and humor in his pages. While he seemed to mix them up, he only rearranged them to suit a descriptive program.

Influence of Debussy

Since the time when Strauss was finally accepted, nothing new has occurred until now, to make listeners change essentially their attitude. The French, with Debussy at their head, caused a temporary disturbance. The modern French school has indeed introduced certain exotic variants on the old melody and harmony. But they have been speedily accepted. They did not much alarm even those who cherish ideas about the immutability of artistic law.

Now the time has come when Symphony listeners may prepare to be shaken out of their security of a quarter of a century. For the composer Schoenberg, who is presently coming with his "five pieces for orchestra," will demand that they give up every notion they entertain about melody and combinations of notes in chords. The entire system they have been used to, the system in which Haydn worked and from which neither Wagner nor Debussy in extreme measure departed, is now given up.

The Schoenberg situation is surely going to be disquieting, if there is the slightest trace of conservatism left in the public. It will clear itself in time, no doubt; but it will not do so with the rapidity of the Debussy problem. It may be that some day the Schoenberg melody will fall plausibly into the same system as Haydn's, but certainly for present-day ears it is worlds away from that system. The Schoenberg chord plan, too, is radically unlike that of any system ever used before. Whatever rules it may have of its own, they are not very closely related to those of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, nor even to those of the twentieth before the year 1912. Indeed, if the Schoenberg formulas survive, music will have undergone a greater change in the last two years than in the previous 200.

New Position Established

One of the reasons why hearers oppose a new departure in composition, is because they fancy that the composer is trying to break up the foundations of past esthetics, that he is declaring enjoyment of music written before he came on the scene to be empty. It was once supposed that a listener could not like Mozart if he liked Wagner. But composers do not write to overthrow the position of their predecessors. They write to establish a new position for themselves and their contemporaries. If Schoenberg takes issue with any school, it is not with one dating before 1910. He merely asserts a starting point for the second decade of the twentieth century. He must be listened to, therefore, as a challenge to today rather than to yesterday. It will hardly be a denial of the worth of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms for listeners to say that they can see some good in the "Five Pieces."

Score Orderly

When Schoenberg asks our attention to melodies written without regard for key, and when he begs us to take pleasure in harmonies that bear hardly a trace of resemblance to any ever put together before, it will be the part of friendship and goodwill on the part of the Symphony public to bear in mind that his purpose is as far as possible from being disrespectful. When the orchestra announces themes that have only the motion and rhythm but none of the tunefulness of former days, when it sounds chords that so far as present ear habits go are absolutely unrelated to one another, the public must remember that no insult is offered to it, but that a call is made to its latent powers of hearing. When the music seems to lack [illegible] when it seems con[illegible] and static, the duty of the public is to get to work and enlarge its listening faculties to meet the situation.

For in the "Five Pieces" there is melodic pattern, to say the least. There is also a relation between note and note of the chords as they succeed one another, though it is not to be explained on old-time rules. The pages of the score represent order, not confusion, and they have dynamic, progressive quality. Their thought moves to a goal.

Structure to Be Noted

Those who wish to make anything out of the "Five Pieces" the first time they hear them, should be willing to surrender all their preconceptions about music

Fragments from fifth piece as sound. Nothing should be heeded but the structure. That is the most interesting thing in any music. It is what gives every great composition its vitality. The structural solidity of Beethoven's fifth symphony and of Brahms' first is what keeps them unskaken monuments of expression. The sound of a piece of music has about as much relation to its permanent worth as the color of the masonry in an architectural maste work.

Schoenberg's recent product will ne the weathering of many performances bring it into outward blend with product of the nineteenth century. Meantime the interest is in how it is built.

Doubtless the "Five Pieces" are to b considered as one composition. The com poser does not call them symphony o even a suite. But there can be litt question that the five numbers are i tended as a cycle. The third could con ceivably be taken out of its surrounding and made an interlude on a progra where various schools of writing we represented. But it would have mo meaning played in connection with th others. It would hardly seem that an besides the third could give a complet impression played by itself. Each nee the others for context. The five a mutually explanatory.

Plan of Development

Schoenberg's analysts have pointed o that the first number is a fugue. Lis eners will find it to be a fugue much the manner of Bach, except as to con erations of key. Since key is discar they must not expect the fugal vo to be in agreement, according to us harmonic experience. When the sec voice takes up the subject it just st it without regard to the way it fits with the first one. Likewise in the d velopments, the subject in various for is piled high on itself, no thought chord effect, in the ordinary understa ing of it, being entertained.

One of the possibilities of the Schoe berg method of forcing notes togeth without harmonic restriction, is a v compact structure. Ordinarily a fug starting out like this one in the first the "Five Pieces" would work out developments in succession. Schoenbe instead of having one development c after another, has a number of them at once. There will be no objection the Schoenberg fugue, as there is so times to the classic form, that the m idea has to be elaborated at great leng before the music can logically stop.

The first of the "Five Pieces" is unlike the first movement of a sympho in feeling, though with its fugue it is d ferent in form. The second pi resembles the slow movement of sy phony, again in feeling and not form. For its themes are develo rather on the order of an allegro stead of an andante. The third m ment is themeless, being wholly a st in the atmospheric style of writing. fourth piece corresponds in a way to scherzo, being more on the fantastic der, however, than the humorous. last piece is a novel study in thema writing. Many themes are pronoun but none much developed. It is though the composer were trying to the right one and never got it, the he regarded the ideas he did find as petent to express his emotions.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. BAUER, DR. MUCK AND A PIANO CONCERTO

A Performance That Transcended All Recollection of the Piece and Many a Player of It—Mozart and Tonal Felicities — Reznicek's Eloquent and Impassioned Tone-Poem—His Power and His Individuality

As Mr. Kreisler, Dr. Muck and the orchestra once played Beethoven's concerto for violin and it seemed to sound as never at a Symphony Concert it had sounded before, so yesterday afternoon Mr. Bauer, the conductor and his men played one of Beethoven's concertos for piano. It was the fourth in the series—the only one that keeps its place nowadays in concerts beside the fifth, which is called "The Emperor." The music dates from the same period in which Beethoven wrote the concerto for violin, and as he designed that as a virtuoso piece for Clementi, so he may similarly have designed this concerto in G major for himself as executant. Had Beethoven not been the composer that he was, his name might still have lived obscurely as one of the virtuosi of the piano in the Vienna of a hundred years ago.

In any case, the analogies between the two pieces are not far to seek. Neither gives voice to grave and deep musical thoughts in large eloquence of utterance or moving stress of spirit. Each is written to be of displayful service to the virtuoso in the higher and the finer sense of the word as well as to give pleasure in itself. Both abound in fancy rather than emotion and run amiably their spirited course. Each treats instrument and form with impulsive freedom and each is plentifully and ingratiatingly songful. The concerto [illegible] violin and this fourth concerto abide the years because in themselves they are perennial pleasure to the listening ear and the answering fancy and because the virtuoso, the conductor and the orchestra may multiply this pleasure many fold. In both, more nearly than in any other of Beethoven's pieces that now survive in the active repertory, he wrote a smiling and an elegant music.

Mr. Bauer, Dr. Muck and the seconding orchestra seemed, indeed, to be resummoning the charm and reanimating the vitality of the concerto; for, as it is lightly written, so may it be easily dulled. Within no very long memory of the Symphony Concerts, the learned Dr. Neitzel spread it as so many dry wisps of tone upon the keyboard and Mr. Godowsky spun it into finical filagree. Yesterday, for the first time within easy recollection, it lived anew in its own bright and buoyant image. Even in the afternoon and at the end of a concert Mr. Bauer was rarely in the vein and seldom has he better exemplified, even at the present meridian of his powers, the keen intelligence, the poised sensibilities, the guiding taste, the just flow of feeling and fancy that control his exercise of them.

Throughout, the pianist's tone was as clear and warm and soft as sunlight. There was no hint of felt or wire in it. It was sensuously beautiful sound exquisite to hear in its lightness and brightness, its fluidity and its roundness. It spun arabesques in softly glinting and gently curving traceries. It melted phrase into phrase as they coalesced into the melodic flow. It flung off little challenges to the orchestra to new euphonies and new fancies. Or it smiled out its crisp bravura and then ran its course in purling fleetness. It was a softly incandescent tone, a gently kaleidoscopic tone that seemed to warm the music into luminosity, color and endless play of fancy. And it accomplished all these artistries as though it and the pianist who evoked it were improvising the concerto in instant and flawless elegance. The melodic and the harmonic phrases of the slow movement seemed rainbow-like against the dark background of the orchestral recitative and as the colors melt [illegible] of the sky so they hushed themselves into silence. The fancy, the charm, the suave sentiment of Mr. Bauer's playing were like a releasing enchantment to the exhaling spirit of the music. And, like a rhapsody in little, it exorcised the iridescent brilliance, the gay returns of the finale. "A dance of particles of light upon the air" was said of some piece of Debussy. It could have been said as truly of Mr. Bauer's playing of this four-fold rondo. Again he was setting free the magic of the music, and the wand was a piano that he conjured even out of its own limitations.

Meanwhile, from end to end of the concerto, Dr. Muck was conjuring with the orchestra too. Conductor and pianist became as a single mind and spirit in twofold play, and piano and orchestra were as one instrument to their hands and fancies. [illegible]ce, rhythms, modulations and shadings seemed born of reciprocal and instant understanding or impulse. The orchestra [illegible]ve translucent backgrounds for the arabesques that the piano spun; each melt[illegible] into each with a flawless euphony; sen[illegible]ent and symmetry met in eighteenth-[illegible]tury wise in the contrasts of the slow [illegible]vement; the orchestra caught the light [illegible] inflection the piano lent to the finale [illegible] Muck's rhythms were as fleet-footed as [illegible] Bauer's—and Beethoven's. The orches[illegible] was coequal with the piano, the con[illegible]tor with the virtuoso. The two means [illegible] expression were at one with each other [illegible] the music to the minutest shading and [illegible] slightest accent. The performance was [illegible]re than perfectly unified into an indivis[illegible] voice. It was as perfectly spiritualized [illegible] a single fancy, elegance and charm. [illegible]e a Bauer or a Kreisler to Dr. Muck [illegible] the orchestra and musical marvels are [illegible] with born.

[illegible] Dr. Muck likes to exercise himself [illegible] the orchestra upon every grace of such [illegible] Beethoven's concerto, so does he [illegible] opportunity and take similar [illegible] symphonies and the occa[illegible]. A year ago he [illegible] programmes, to [illegible] yesterday for the first time this season he returned to his Mozart and prefaced the concerto with the "Jupiter" symphony. Half an hour before he had proved his own and the orchestra's command of tonal grandiloquence in Reznicek's "symphonic biography" of a fated and struggling soul. Now, as it seemed, he would summon to the "Jupiter" symphony an equal command of tonal felicities. He heightened the charm of the songful andante by the equisite evenness and euphony of the instrumental voices that sang it. The most sensitive and expert of Mozartean singers with a single voice might not have phrased it more artfully and suavely than did he with sixty. The triple melodies flowed as one. As artful was the bright pointing in pace and rhythm of the smiling song of the first movement. It was newly radiant. The pace of the minuet was the golden mean that neither overspeeds nor overstays it, but keeps it moving in its animated grace. The finale was playful brilliance itself—a round game with the four "subjects" that in its zest lost not a whit of its elegance. In true Mozartean fashion scholarship seemed as play. And steadily through the symphony Dr. Muck held the orchestra to Mozartean suavity, roundness, brightness and plasticity of tone. Not a figure lacked its suppleness, not a phrase its smoothness. The conductor plays his Mozart for connoisseurs, and even for his own ear and imagination—and scarcely another—in some of the felicities he conjures from the orchestra. His brisk, crisp tempi seem as the weaving of these tonal tapestries before his own quick mind, ear and imagination. Yet the dullest listener feels, however vaguely, the new and stimulating sensation of it all. The new beauty is a freshening beauty.

At the other end of the concert by every scale stood Reznicek's magniloquent tone-poem of the generalized mortal that he calls "Schlemihl" and, as the gossip of Berlin says, of more than one of his own spiritual adventures. There are those that will not abide such music. They dislike its grandiloquence; they will have none of its fierce intensities as it passes from mood to mood; they recoil before its wide-stretched canvas and fresco-like delineation; they resent its passion as insincere and theatrical; they deny it imagination; they dismiss it as so much strenuous, restless and nerve-pricking "effect." None the less, it is quite as possible to conceive such a piece imagined and accomplished in the utmost sincerity, because such a passion for grandiloquent and graphic utterance rose in the composer and no other means might release the images and the emotions that were quickening him. Reznicek has achieved a tone-poem on the Straussian model wherein symphonic structure and delineative suggestion, the continuity of the music and the sequence of emotion are closely and illusively knit. He has invented such a vivid and propulsive theme as that of his mortal and transmogrified it as vividly under the stress of the tonal and emotional conflict. A rare musical energy projects this tonal image upon the ears and the imaginations of his hearers; a rare musical power makes it mighty when it fronts fate for the final struggle.

More than command of timbres, of harmonies, of broken and conflicting rhythms, of nervous scraps of themes, make the scherzo of lewd grotesques a vivid and a reeking music or summons the rack and the exhaustion of the combat against disillusion. The one is tonal suggestion of foul image; the other is tonal suggestion of spiritual stress and desolation. Each seizes and searches the imagination. There is power in such music and passion, even if both diminish a little in intensity when Reznicek would linger over the illusions of happiness. He misses the heights and depths of Strauss in such ardent song of inner and exhaling emotion. He dwells too long upon it. A dramatic and not a static music is for him. He must people his imagination; he must fling forth his images; he must set the tonal battle in ebb and flow; cavernous fate in the answering instruments must yawn before human weariness in the tenor cry, heard at last in its spent intensity and aching disillusion in Mr. Draper's singing of it yesterday. Then is Reznick a composer of passion, power and imagination, who yet measures wisely the scope of his design and summons shrewdly all his resources. In a sense he has taken up the music of fate and mortals where Tschaikowsky laid it down; he imagines it more masculinely and less hysterically and he walks, besides, at his ease and in his own individuality on the Straussian highway. Scarcely one in his generation in Germany does as much or more.

H. T. P.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 21.

FIFTH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Program Interesting—Rhapsody by Ravel New to the Audience.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Heinrich [illegible] 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.....Strauss
"Waldesruhe," for 'cello and orchestra..Dvorak
Rondo for 'cello and orchestra..........Dvorak
Rapsodie Espagnole.........................Ravel
Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare....
Scheinpflug

The program was an interesting one. Strauss's Fantasia had not been played here as a whole for nearly eight years. The overture had been played only once, early in 1909. Ravel's Rhapsody, introduced here in January, 1910, by the Boston Orchestral Club, was new to the Symphony audience. The little pieces by Dvorak were also unfamiliar to many.

Strauss's Fantasia was the first composition in which, according to his own account, he asserted his independence. In its year—1887—this music was considered audacious; the last movement was thought to be insolently mad, and it was hissed in Munich, much to the composer's joy. Even Buelow hesitated. Today we wonder at the commotion. The first movement is to us the most poetic; the second is fantastic, but at times the construction appears to be labored and too deliberate; the third, "On the Shores of Sorrento," charming for the most part, although sentiment verges more than once on sentimentalism; and towards the end there is the fear that Strauss will never leave these shores; the fourth is not free from commonplaces, and Denza's "Funiculi, Funicula" is more Italian than Strauss's own themes. The finale could not now be called "crazy." The word "vulgar" might be applied to certain pages.

The Fantasia was certainly a surprising work for a man of 22 years to write. Especially for one that had been brought up strictly in the nurture and admonition of the classics. Strauss says that Alexander Ritter opened his eyes and showed him the new path. We have heard one of Ritter's orchestral works. No doubt he was more original, more convincing in conversation than in composition. This at least may be said: The first movement of the Fantasia, "On the Campana," contains noble music, as stately as the famous lines of Sir Thomas Browne, beginning: "Now since these dead bones have already out-lasted the living ones of Methuselah, and in a yard underground, and thin walls of clay, outworn all the strong and specious buildings above it; and quietly rested under the drums and tramplings of three conquests." This music is the "grandeur that was Rome." In the invocation of the heroic past it may be likened to Smetana's "Vysehrad," although there is a more sensuous spirit in the Fantasia, from which Smetana's tone poem is wholly free. Elgar tried to do the same thing in his overture "In the South," but his "Senatus populusque Romanus" was more like the House of Commons, and his Campagna might be mistaken for Hampstead Heath on a Bank Holiday.

In 1887 the instrumentation of "On the Shores of Sorrento" may well have perplexed Buelow and made him doubtful concerning a performance. It is beautiful to the ear and fresh and original even now. And in the oboe solo Strauss caught the secret of Italy. In this Fantasia, as in the later works and in many of the songs, the themes too often are rather common, obvious, surely popular, owing their true effect to the harmonic support and the orchestral coloring.

The first movement of Ravel's Rhapsody is a singularly beautiful example of musical impressionism. The two that follow might be entitled: "Hints at Spanish Dances." The last movement is a curious mixture of frankness and suggestion. Neither the ideas nor the treatment are to be placed by the side of Ravel's "Mere l'Oye" suite, played here last season. The two dances, the Malagnena and the Habanera lacking the essential quality, voluptuousness. It is as though the dead in a twilight land were endeavoring to recollect the airs to which they once danced passionately. But Ravel was not thus deliberately macabre. Chabrier and Debussy have done this thing much better; Chabrier in his fiery, brilliant, sensuous, irresistible "Espana"; Debussy in "Iberia" and in the piano piece "La Soiree dans Grenade." There is a word often used in praise which is after all not complimentary. The word is "clever." Ravel's Rhapsody is clever; clever in rhythm and harmony, clever in the instrumentation, in the blending and contrasts of timbres, but after the first movement it is only clever.

Scheinpflug's overture is to a comedy of Shakespeare. Some say "Merry Wives of Windsor"; others say "Twelfth Night." The composer himself makes no sign. The overture opens in a delightful manner. The music sparkles in its fleetness. The music tion of the old English air was a happy thought. But was there need of all the din of brass for a Shakesperian comedy? Somehow we do not associate trombones, tuba, trumpets blown furiously, bass drum and cymbals with "Twelfth Night" or any other comedy of Shakespeare. Nor is it easy to see how this music fits the Countess Olivia, Viola, Malvolio and Sir Toby and Sir Andrew. As merely a concert overture the music is admirably put together; it has true vitality; it is effective.

Mr. Warnke gave great pleasure to the audience, first by refraining from the performance of a formidable concerto, then by the performance of the agreeable little pieces by Dvorak.

"Waldesruhe" comes dangerously near admission into that class of musical compositions known as "gumdrops," but it is soothing and short. The Rondo shows Dvorak's facility and his ability to use a few instruments so that the accompaniment has character. Mr. Warnke played with a fine quality of tone and in his customary musical and tasteful manner.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Reznicek "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography; Mozart, "Jupiter," symphony; Beethoven, concerto for piano, G major, No. 4. Harold Bauer will be the pianist.

BOSTON GLOBE

NOVEMBER 28.

BAUER SOLOIST.

Pianist Plays Beethoven Concerto Superbly.

Performance Gives Brilliance to Reznicek's "Schlemihl."

Harold Bauer, always an impressive, a commanding pianist, was yesterday an inspired one. Soloist at the sixth Symphony rehearsal he played Beethoven's fourth concerto superbly. Dr Muck and the orchestra lent distinction by a brilliant performance to Reznicek's "symphonic biography, Schlemihl," last year recounted for the first time here. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was the remaining number.

Mr Bauer played as a poet who asks none of the liberties of modern style to express sheer beauty-thought in classic verse. He has been known as a pianist of impeccable mechanism, of large mentality, of understanding. Yesterday he poured into the formal mold of the concerto a wealth of romantic feeling. Beethoven was heard to sing with the lyric freshness, the spontaneity of Schubert or of Schumann, nor was breadth nor strength of utterance lost, nor majesty.

It was a performance not soon to be forgotten for the high spiritual plane of its artistic sincerity. The noble thoughts of the composition were molded, recreated and made to pulse with life. To hear them rounded into outlines of such symmetrical perfection and of such plasticity is to know again the magic fluidity of musical speech, its universality, its voice awaiting the hand of the master to catch and imprison in the curve of a phrase the subtlest tint of feeling, aspiration, repression, entreaty, fulfillment.

Of the exquisite limpidity which now rarely escapes Mr Bauer in all that he does, of the emotional gradations of his touch, of the harp-like singing tone, a tone of uncommon, in the softest passages, of hausting loveliness, of the expressive use of the sustaining pedal in reechoing fugitive tonalities, of his masterfully poetic rubato, of his admirable content to permit the piano to speak within its own adequate if limited range of dynamics, and not to suppose that eminence as an artist will permit him to pummel it into a state of untuneful protest—of these and of other things it is not possible now to speak. It was interpretation such as the hardened hearer of pianoforte playing rarely looks for from that instrument and more rarely hears.

Mr Reznicek is fortunate in being able to narrate the woes of his tragic hero through the good offices of Dr Muck and the orchestra. It is not pleasant to imagine what a robustious conductor and able bodied player of brass might accomplish upon it.

When the work was brought out last season as a novelty it received its due share of comment. It is a score of an undeniably clever craftsman.

More than that there is variety and fertility in its ideas, at times inspiration. The love music is not without beauty in parts, but tawdry in others. The final prayer with the solo voice—yesterday that of the discriminating and intelligent Mr Draper—approaches that breadth of expression treating of humanity rather than of the individual.

But when all is said the work remains that of a resourceful technician of the orchestra with delineative gifts, but limited imagination. Parts are boisterous after the fashion of reams of music that have come out of Germany purporting to illumine some combat of the soul. Again the composer was fortunate yesterday in his interpreters. The performance of the Mozart was one of euphony, of fine proportions, of nice discrimination in its moods, whether of archness, graceful melancholy, or of pompous flourishes.

Next week being that of the orchestra's second Southern trip, there will be no concerts. At those of Dec 11 and 12 the program will include Beethoven's 8th symphony, Stravinsky's "Fireworks" (first time at these concerts,) Haydn's concerto in D major for cello, Josef Malkin soloist, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 28,

REZNICEK NUMBER CONCERT FEATURE

Composer's "Schlemihl" Finely Given by Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was another case of an admirable program admirably interpreted. The second hearing of the Reznicek "Schlemihl" proved even more interesting than its initial presentation last spring. The marked merit of the composition and its practically flawless presentation rather inclined one to close his eyes to the wisdom of such works. Reznicek's story is not exactly ideal.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, following as it did after the somewhat strenuous "Schlemihl" was like passing from a storm to a harbor of peace. The contrast could scarcely have failed to make an impression.

Dr. Muck adopted a somewhat unusual course when he placed his soloist, Harold Bauer, at the [illegible] of the pro[illegible] major concerto as one not to be missed so practically everybody in the hall stayed to give Mr. Bauer the most enthusiastic recalls. The pianist was at his best and played in that modest, artistic way which has made him such a general favorite.

There will be no concerts the coming week as the orchestra will be on its second southern trip.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 19.

MAJ. HIGGINSON IS HONORED ON 80TH BIRTHDAY

Senator Lodge, in Eloquent Address, Voices Tributes Paid by 300 Leading Citizens Gathered at Copley-Plaza Hotel—Career as Soldier, Business Man and Benefactor Reviewed.

A remarkable tribute of admiration and love was paid last night in the Copley-Plaza Hotel to Maj. Henry L. Higginson on his 80th birthday. About 300 of Boston's most representative citizens gathered to honor the man whom Senator Lodge, as their spokesman, called "a great public servant in the highest and largest sense." For more than two hours eulogies were showered on the battle-scarred veteran of the civil war who gave Harvard its Soldiers Field and made this city one of the great musical centres of the world.

The guests were summoned to dinner by the bugle call of the Cadets, the bugler being in full uniform. The committee of arrangements had extended to Mrs. Higginson the use of the balcony boxes, and upon her invitation they were occupied by her immediate family connections and one or two of her intimate friends. About 100 members of the Symphony Orchestra had places allotted to them, and when shortly before 9 o'clock Senator Lodge rose to make the opening address an assembly rare in distinction and brilliance filled the great banqueting hall of the hotel.

At intervals in the speaking songs were given by the Apollo Club.

Senator Lodge's Speech.

"Great wars in which the lives of nations are at stake," said Senator Lodge, "take a heavy toll from all that is best in the generation called to arms. The best, physically, mentally and in character, are the first to go and the last to return. Grievous to those who come after and to the strength and quality of the nation itself is the sacrifice then nobly and rightly made.

"This was peculiarly true of both sides in our own civil war of 50 years ago, and among the best who then went to their death there was no finer example than Charles Russell Lowell. Gentleman, soldier, scholar, as brilliant in intellect as he was strong in character, he personified that type of our English-speaking race which history enshrines in the name of Sir Philip Sydney.

What Lowell Wrote.

"Not long before the day when

"'He, who deadly hurt, agen
"'Flashed on afore the charge's thunder
"'Tippin' with fire the bolt of men
"'That rived the rebel line asunder,'

"Not long before that supreme moment he wrote a letter to a friend at home, a disabled officer. This is what he said: 'I hope that you have outgrown all foolish ambitions, and are now content to become a useful citizen. * * * Don't seek office, but don't "disremember" that the "useful citizen" always holds his time, his money and his life ready at the hint of his country. The useful citizen is a mighty unpretending hero; but we are not going to have any country very long, unless such heroism is developed. * * * I believe I have lost all my ambitions. * * * I don't think I would turn my hand to be a distinguished chemist or a famous mathematician. All I now care about is to be a useful citizen, with money enough to buy bread and firewood, and to teach my children to ride on horseback and to look strangers in the face, especially southern strangers.'

"We are here tonight to show, albeit inadequately, the affection we feel and the honor we would fain pay to the man who received that letter and who has carried out to the full its noble precepts. He to whom the letter was addressed needed no admonitions to set him upon the path to which Lowell had pointed. His own nature did that. And yet, as he has fared along the [illegible] of life those words of his friend [illegible]

...ns at his best and
...dest, artistic way
...im such a general
...concerts the coming
...hestra will be on its
...rip.

HERALD.

BER 19.

GGINSON ORED ON BIRTHDAY

, in Eloquent Ad- s Tributes Paid by g Citizens Gath- pley-Plaza Hotel Soldier, Business efactor Reviewed.

ribute of admiration id last night in the l to Maj. Henry L.
80th birthday. About st representative citi-
honor the man whom
s their spokesman, ublic servant in the t sense." For more logies were showered
red veteran of the Harvard its Soldiers his city one of the es of the world.
summoned to dinner
of the Cadets, the uniform. The comments had extended the use of the bal-upon her invitation by her immediate and one or two of
s. About 100 memhony Orchestra had them, and when clock Senator Lodge opening address an distinction and bril-
eat banqueting hall

the speaking songs
Apollo Club.

ge's Speech.

hich the lives of na-said Senator Lodge, from all that is best alled to arms. The entally and in charto go and the last to o those who come trength and quality is the sacrifice then nade.
arly true of both ivil war of 50 years best who then went here was no finer rles Russell Lowell. scholar, as brilliant was strong in chard that type of our ace which history name of Sir Philip ell Wrote.

re the day when urt, agen
the charge's thunder
the bolt of men rebel line asunder;'
that supreme mo-
etter to a friend at fficer. This is what that you have out-
bitions, and are now useful citizen. * * *
rt don't "disremem-eful citizen" always money and his life of his country. The mighty unpretending ot going to have any unless such heroism
* I believe I have
ons. * * * I don't
my hand to be a disor a famous mathe-
y care about is to be th money enough to wood, and to teach e on horseback and the face, especially ight to show, all too affection we feel and fain pay to the man letter and who has full the noble pr-
the letter was ad-admonitions to [illegible]
th to which [illegible] own nature did th[illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible] him and cheered him onward as he played his part of the 'useful citizen' with an ever extending sphere of service. Certainly I know no better example of the 'useful citizen' portrayed by Charles Lowell than he in whose honor we have gathered here.

"But he has been more than a 'useful citizen,' admirable as that modest title is. He has never held public office and never desired it, but he has been none the less a great public servant in the highest and largest sense. In every year and through all the years of his life he has served the country the state and, above all, his fellow-men.

Always for a Good Cause.

"In war and in peace, on the battlefield and in the sheltered city, in unending charities, in the encouragement of art and in the advance of learning, wherever a good cause was to be found, there has his service been rendered.

"The number of years in a man's life does not matter when the account is made up. That which is of consequence is what was done with the years, whether few or many. Here every year has been marked by service to his fellow men or to his country by him whom we meet to honor. It is this which gives to the conventional birthday wishes tonight a reality of meaning and a glow of affection too often lacking in ceremonial utterances. We felicitate ourselves that as Americans the years of his life have been given to us. We measure age not by dates, but by mind and heart, and when both are active, both still warm with the flush of youth, as they are with Mr. Higginson, we wish for the happy returns of the anniversary as we hope from the bottom of our hearts that the procession of his days may still march on, beneficent, for many years to come.

Browning Quoted.

"To him, as to very few, is it given to repeat, with a truth which we all acknowledge, the beautiful words of Browning's 'Rabbi Ben Ezra.'

" 'Grow old along with me!
" 'The Best is yet to be,
" 'The last of Life for which the first was made;
" 'Our times are in His hand
" 'Who saith, "A whole I planned,
" 'Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, nor be afraid.' "

At the close of Senator Lodge's address, Dr. Muck led the orchestra in an overture and then proposed the health of Maj. Higginson, the toast being received with tremendous enthusiasm.

Senator Lodge thereupon read a communication from President Emeritus Eliot of Harvard University—"one of the great men of the United States." In his letter Dr. Eliot recounted the chief events in Maj. Higginson's life, telling of his gift of the Soldier's Field and Harvard Union, and of his establishment and maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra. "In both these great gifts to the unversity," said the writer, "Mr. Higginson taught and will long teach democracy and toleration, and the high value toward success in life of friendships and broad sympathies. When he organized this orchestra he did at the start another precious thing for the teachers and students of Harvard University. Every season he has caused a series of 10 concerts to be given in Sanders Theatre at prices within the reach of the members of the university. It would be hard to imagine a more friendly, considerate and enlightened act, renewed from year to year since the creation of the Symphony Orchestra.

"Do we not all see clearly as we greet tonight this friend of many years what the teaching of his career has been and is going to be? It shows what kind of a business man, social leader, humanitarian and citizen American freedom has produced and is likely to produce more and more abundantly."

Letters from Leading Men.

John P. Reynolds then read letters, selected from a mass of communications, from ex-President Taft, Mr. Justice Holmes, President Lowell of Harvard and President Low of Columbia.

"They show," said he, "the love and respect of the entire community for Maj. Higginson, given in abounding measure, heaped up, pressed down and flowing over."

Bishop Lawrence spoke of "Mr. Higginson as a man," recalling as he did so the guest's ancestor from Leicester, Eng., the first minister of Massachusetts Bay. "The traits of that ancestor," he said, "have descended to our guest. Henry L. Higginson is so enwrapped in the virtues of truth and justice and love, which we believe are impersonated in God, that he has a right when he speaks for truth and for justice to speak for God. Trade to him and business and money-making have been incidental in order that he might have the opportunity to use what he had honorably made for the benefit of others. From youth onward he has always been a gentleman, always chivalrous, and the people have responded to him with love and devotion. Maj. Higginson, we stand here in loyalty to you because you have taught us the genius of friendship, and as loyal friends we give you support and godspeed."

Service to Music.

George W. Chadwick, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, gave an account of Maj. Higginson's service to music. "To become the angel of a symphony orchestra," he said, "had never occurred to anyone before, but Maj. Higginson undertook this responsibility, asking nothing in return save that the public should hear and love the great masterpieces of music which had been an inspiration in his own life. How far-reaching, how immeasurable has been the influence of that foundation. By the force of example, permanent symphony orchestras have been established in six other cities of the United States, and in the smaller towns orchestras of 40 to 60 players have also been founded.

"Let us not forget that the founder of the Symphony Orchestra was also largely instrumental in providing Symphony [illegible] this most [illegible] musical instruments, the Boston Symphony."

From the Tavern Club.

William Roscoe Thayer assured Maj. Higginson of the affection of the members of the Tavern Club, and a tribute from Charles Francis Adams was read by Charles Francis Adams, 3d.

Gen. Stephen M. Weld told of Maj. Higginson's war record, saying that he would give five years of his life to carry on his face, as their guest did, the distinctive marks of bravery and personal contact with the enemy. "That," said the speaker, "is a badge of courage every one must envy. All these characteristics of ability, tenacity and courage you have shown also in your business career. May you enjoy many years of happiness and blessing."

Introducing Mr. Higginson.

In introducing Maj. Higginson, Senator Lodge said:

"Now comes the last and best of the many pleasures which have fallen to my lot this evening. You all know what this one now coming is to be to us all.

But let us start fair. This is a birthday dinner, but we decline to admit any suggestion of age or time in that connection.

"Our guest comes with all the glory of his service and achievement upon him, but there comes with them no mark of the years except those which the greatest of poets said should accompany old age:

" 'Honor, Love, Obedience,
" 'Troops of Friends.'

"I present to you Henry Lee Higginson."

Greeted with Cheers.

Maj. Higginson was received with prolonged cheering. He began by complaining that it was "awful" and telling his eulogists that, while some of the things said of him were true, many of them were not true.

"I am sorry for you," he said, "for perhaps you will be trying to say something tomorrow that is not so pleasant. What can I say in response to all that has been said tonight? What I want to tell you is that the keynote of my faith from my boyhood is that I have had a deep and passionate wish that we should live according to our highest ideals, that we should try to make others happier in order that our country should be prosperous in the highest sense of the word.

"There are many things in life hard to bear, and if any man can make the path of anybody else happier, he is fortunate. Whatever may have been done, a great deal more has been done for me. If it has given you any pleasure, think of my good luck in having had a hand in it.

"Friends, men, women, artists, business men, everybody, you know what this dinner must mean to me, and how I recognize it and thank you for the great honor you have done me. I can only thank you. Yet no words will express my thoughts and feelings on this occasion. Thank you again and again."

Maj. Higginson received a round of cheers, and the proceedings closed with the singing of "Fair Harvard."

ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 28

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY

REZNICEK'S WONDERFUL "SCHLEMIHL" PLAYED

Harold Bauer Wins Triumph in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Reznicek. "Schlemihl," Symphonic Biography.
Mozart. "Jupiter" Symphony.
Beethoven. Fourth Piano Concerto, G major.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

When we heard the second performance of the new Sibelius symphony we liked it even less than at first. When we yesterday heard the second performance of Reznicek's "Schlemihl" we found it almost a great work. To be sure, the performance of it was almost miraculous in its technical excellence. The composition given by a lesser orchestra would sound like Bedlam let loose. Some things in it we still dislike. The muted trumpets which are so constantly in evidence are scarcely suggestive of anything greater than the toy trumpets of the nursery (and Wagner used them thus in his "Mastersingers of Nuremburg"); the xylophone was never so prominently used outside of a minstrel show (the instrument is made of sticks of wood, struck with a wooden mallet); the chief figure, heard almost continuously, is simply an anapaest, a three-noted motive which is exactly like Beckmesser's call to Walther,—"Fanget an,"—only it came so frequently that we felt like altering it to "Hoeret auf!"

But the touches are those of a master, nevertheless. The frenzied passages are really exciting, the pictures of dissipation are very much above Charpentier's essays in the same field, in "Vie du Poete," or in "Julien."

The scenes of domestic felicity are wondrously effective and come like an oasis in the desert, after the fiendish character of the Scherzo—which has an attractive fiendishness nevertheless. The use of the voice made almost as subordinate as an orchestral tone-color, and set against as perplexing an accompaniment as any singer could ever have, was effective, on this occasion, for Mr. Paul Draper sang out sturdily and was not overthrown by the difficulties. He deserves credit for his short share in the work.

At times, however, we find the work but a chromo of the great "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss; in one or two orchestral touches it over[illegible] one can follow [illegible] of interest to the work, which at once wins the public, which certainly cannot understand the musical progressions. One can easily note the wild dissipation of the hero, and in contrast with this are the touches of domestic happiness and purer enjoyment; then one can readily recognize the figure of Fate, a dark premonition in the background, and the final disaster, somewhat suggestive of Delirium Tremens. We can conceive of Reznicek being tremendously in earnest in this work, and we do not wish to treat it flippantly, but it is all on a wrong path, as wrong as any Cubist picture, or any other modern madness, but Reznicek's very peculiar subject may be a justification for some of the extremes to which he goes, and his splendor of orchestration makes the work worth while for every auditor. It must be a very cold-blooded concert-goer who would not join in the applause which greeted the great orchestral triumph yesterday afternoon.

Dr. Muck is a very sly conductor and programme-maker. Whenever he gives us something musically indigestible, he immediately follows it with something very refreshing and simple. Last season he gave a Haydn symphony directly after this tonal cataclysm. Yesterday afternoon he followed it with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The auditor can exclaim with Addison—"My bane and antidote are both before me." The beauty of this symphony did not suffer because of the whirlwinds of tone that had preceded it. The fugal work was just as interesting, the first movement just as refreshing. And it was read in a manly and decisive style that showed that the 18th century had something to say even before 30-line scores were invented. But the slow movement seemed rather tedious and tame after the Reznicek cyclone. That movement was too extreme a contrast.

But the real refreshment came with the Beethoven Concerto and Harold Bauer. If we were asked what concerto we consider the most satisfying among piano concertos, we might pass by the "Emperor," and choose this melodious, symmetrical and altogether beautiful work. To hear such a composition with such a pianist, supported by such an orchestra, is an opportunity that does not come every day, it is one of the hours to be marked with a white stone.

The ensemble was exquisite, and Mr. Bauer did not force himself into the limelight, but merged his part into the orchestral mass in a manner that showed the true artist. After all, the true concerto is to give an orchestral impression, in spite of what Liszt and Chopin have done to show the contrary. Beethoven and Brahms had the truest appreciation of the true meaning and balance of the concerto.

It was rather self-abnegatory to have this concerto at the end of the programme, but the great artist did not suffer by this, for almost the entire audience remained to recall him vociferously at the end of the work. His playing had both fire and delicacy. We can only compare it to the exquisite manner in which our great resident pianist, Prof. Carl Baermann, used to interpret this work. The cadenzas were not too long, the Andante was given with much poetic freedom, and the spirited finale had plenty of dash yet nothing spasmodic in its performance. Altogether it made a fitting close to a concert which ran to two extremes in its first two numbers, but reached the happiest medium in its close.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 28.

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY'S 6TH REHEALSAL

Performance of Mozart Work by Orchestra One of Incomparable Beauty.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Harold Bauer was the soloist. The program was as follows: Reznicek, "Schlemihl"; Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony; Beethoven, concerto in G major No. 4 for the piano and orchestra. Mr. Paul Draper sang the prayer in "Schlemihl."

Reznicek's "Schlemihl" was performed here for the first time in this country last April. It then made a marked impression. It was thought to be an extraordinary composition.

The composer states that his symphonic poem has nothing to do with Chamisso's tale of the man that lost his shadow. His Schlemihl is a modern man pursued by misfortune. An idealist, he is overcome by material circumstances. The composer attempts to describe in tones this life. He boldly calls his symphonic poem a symphonic biography. From the music it is fair to infer that this Schlemihl's life was checkered but never dull.

In Reznicek's program, argument, Syllabus we are not informed about the unhappy man's childhood. A bold, defiant theme, well invented, though it is Straussian in profile and orchestral exposition, may well typify the hero. Destiny is at once on his track and drives him into horrid orgies, while calamity awaits him patiently. The orgy is indeed a terrible one. The dissonances suggest hard liquor rather than the juice of the Tuscan grape or wines of Burgundy or champagne, and the rhythms are appropriately unsteady. According to stage directions in the score, which if they had been published in the program book might have startled the more sensitive in the audience, the women in the wild scenes of dissipation were both foul and fair; there is the [illegible] ures of Aubrey [illegible] Marionettes" enter.

But this Schlemihl settles down for a time, takes to himself a wife, "Slow and in a somewhat majestic manner." Some might think that "four horns" argued ill for his domestic happiness. She is, however, faithful and devoted. A child is born to them, and the man has to struggle for existence. The struggle is desperate. He falls sick. He rises at last; there is a brave endeavor, but who can contend with fate. One last effort and the wretch in his despair "lets himself glide towards Nirvana."

Here we have a program that might prejudice a hearer, even though he were not a believer in absolute music, against Reznicek's composition. It could be said of any modern symphony that the first movement represents a conflict between two contending forces, between a good and a bad spirit. But Reznicek is not content with a broad statement. He goes into details. Here is the orgy. There is no mistaking it. Here comes the wife; later comes the child, and so on. These details are disturbing. It would have been better if the composer had announced his purpose in a few lines and let each hearer fill out the biography as he himself heard, meditated, imagined.

There are beautiful, there are noble pages in this symphonic poem. The music towards the end is grandly eloquent, without taint of bombast, without a drooping in the sustained and lofty flight. Everywhere are proofs of uncommon technical skill, fancy, imagination. It is easy to say that now we are reminded of passages in Strauss's "Heldenleben"; that there are thoughts of Mahler; that Wagner of "Die Walkuere" suggested this or that idea; in the main the music is surprisingly original, indisputably individual. There are times when fantastical instrumentation becomes grotesque. Too many sudden contrasts, abrupt transitions of mood, no longer startle or thrill, but induce the hearer to long for a sequence of ideas, for a more logical connection.

The performance was most brilliant; the performance of the "Jupiter" symphony was one of incomparable beauty. Hearing the andante, the minuet and the wonderful finale played as they were yesterday one no longer questioned the famous and subtle saying of Rossini. When he was asked who was the greatest composer, he answered "Beethoven"; he then said, "But Mozart is the only one." Let the first movement pass with its second theme that reminds one of charming music in "Figaro's Marriage." The andante could have been written only by Mozart. The beauty of it is purely Grecian. There is spiritualized sensuousness; there is perfect form, exquisite proportion, euphony such as was heard on Prospero's Isle, i' th' air or th' earth, sounds and sweet airs.

Mr. Bauer gave a romantic reading of Beethoven's concerto, which in some respects, if not in all, is to be preferred to the "Emperor" concerto. There is surley nothing so impressive in the latter as the Andante of the wourth, with its strange recitative for strings and the poetic improvisations of the piano in response. I do not see how this concerto could have been better played by pianist or orchestra. Mr. Bauer did not attempt to modernize the music in any way. The melodic phrases were sung in an enchanting manner, the passage work was delightfully clear and full of color; the responses in the Andante were gently poetic, quietly emotional; while the Finale was elegantly jocose. All in all, an admirable interpretation.

The orchestra will be away next week. The program of the concerts of Dec. 11, 12. will be as follows: Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 8; Stravinsky, "Fireworks"; Haydn, 'cello concerto in D major; Schumann, overture to "Genoveva." Mr. Josef Malkin will be the solo 'cellist.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 28,

REZNICEK NUMBER CONCERT FEATURE

Composer's "Schlemihl" Finely Given by Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was another case of an admirable program admirably interpreted. The second hearing of the Reznicek "Schlemihl," proved even more interesting than its initial presentation last spring. The marked merit of the composition and its practically flawless presentation rather inclined one to close his eyes to the wisdom of such works. Reznicek's story is not exactly ideal.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, following as it did after the somewhat strenuous "Schlemihl" was like passing from a storm to a harbor of peace. The contrast could scarcely have failed to make an impression.

Dr. Muck adopted a somewhat unusual course when he placed his soloist, Harold Bauer, at the end of the program. However the combination of Mr. Bauer and the Beethoven G major concerto as one not to be missed so practically everybody in the hall stayed to give Mr. Bauer the most enthusiastic recalls. The pianist was at his best and played in that modest, artistic way which has made him such a general favorite.

There will be no concerts the coming week as the orchestra will be on its second southern trip.

TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 24,

FRITZ KREISLER TELLS OF WOUND RECEIVED IN FIGHT

NEW YORK, Nov. 24—Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist who served as a lieutenant in the 3d Kratz regiment and was wounded in battle near Lemberg, reached New York today on the steamer Rotterdam. He was accompanied by his wife, who served as a Red Cross nurse in the Austrian army.

"I was wounded on the night of Sept. 16," said Mr. Kreisler. "While resisting a charge of Russian Cossacks, I was knocked down by a horse. As the rider passed over me, he sank his lance into my right thigh. It caught in my coat and before he could withdraw it I shot and killed him. I lay in the trench for hours until I was found."

Mrs. Kreisler saw duty in German and Austrian Red Cross hospitals. She came into personal contact with the American Red Cross units, and she said that they were receiving unbounded praise everywhere.

"I was told by both German and Austrian surgeons that the American nurses could do 20 times the work their own nurses could, and their system of handling wounded was simply wonderful.

"As to wounds, I found the Russian bullets were the most humane, and as foes the Russians were exceptionally courteous. While I was working in the Austrian hospitals I saw and talked with Emperor Francis Joseph many times. He frequently visits the wounded and gives his attention to officers and private soldiers alike."

BOSTON AMERICAN,

NOVEMBER 24, 1914.

VIOLINIST KREISLER LAID COSSACK LOW

NEW YORK, Nov. 24.—Fritz Kreisler, the famous Austrian violinist, who was a lieutenant in the Third Gratz Yeoman Regiment of the Austrian army, and was wounded in the fighting around Lemberg early in September, arrived here today on the liner Rotterdam and gave his own account of what had happened.

"For three days we had been fighting in the trenches," said Kreisler. "Our troops were worn out, cold and hungry. In the dead of night the Cossacks made a surprise attack upon us. I was asleep in the bottom of a trench at the time and the hoofs of one of the horses struck me, stunning me. A second Cossack, seeing that I was an officer, charged at me with his lance. I managed to draw my pistol and fired. I guess the Cossack will not take part in any more attacks. My wounds were painful, but not dangerous. I knew my wife was working as a Red Cross nurse in some hospital and I started out to find her. I wandered from hospital to hospital until I finally located her near Vienna. There I remained until I regained my health."

Mrs. Kreisler, who accompanied her husband, declared that Russians are humane fighters and that the bullets make clean wounds. There have never been any allegations that the Russians used soft-nosed cartridges.

Henry Vandyck, United States minister to Holland, who is returning on a furlough because of trouble with his eyes, had written out a brie statement, in which he said:

"When the madness that began th war has spent itself I hope Americ will have a good part to play in th restoration of a lasting peace wher in all the peoples of the world grea and small shall rejoic together. Then the nightmare of blood will be over and the palace of peace wil have its opportunity."

GLOBE—SATURDAY

NOVEMBER 21,

STRAUSS' ITALIAN FANTASIA PLAYED

Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody Abounds in Color.

Heinrich Warnke, Solo 'Cellist, in Two Pieces by Dvorak.

Dr Muck's Symphony program yesterday was a singularly attractive one. The Italian fantasia that marked the budding of the young Strauss into romanticism at the incitation of his learned friend Ritter is of more than merely historical or prophetic value. Ravel's distinctive "Spanish Rhapsody," made known first at one of Mrs Hall's now missed concerts, Mr Longy conducting, now first played by the larger orchestra, abounded in color. Mr Warnke, the soloist of the day, played two pieces by Dvorak, with ingratiating tone and style and with a far greater security in intonation than has sometimes rewarded him.

Paul Scheinpflug, the composer of the overture to a Shaksperian comedy, by a recent letter of his published in last week's Musical America, is now held a prisoner of war by the Russians near Archangel. He had conducted symphony concerts at Majorenhof, near Riga, after the declaration of hostilities. The letter was written to the directors of the Bluethner Orchestra in Berlin, of which he is the conductor-elect. He assures the committee of his diligence in composing a new work, with Germany's heroic fight as its theme, to mark his return to Berlin, and begs them to defer his installation.

Strauss' fantasia, conventional in comparison to the tone forms that followed, must have seemed the music of an idol-breaker, a heretic, in 1887. When Cesar Franck brought out his sublime symphony in D, there was a member of the Institute of the French National Conservatory that repudiated the work because it contained a part for the English horn. Not as a survival of any lingering traditional hostility to the English, but Beethoven had written symphonies without the aid of an English horn. And this in the year of grace, 1889.

At 23 in this series of tone pictures of Italian scenes and life, Strauss pointed the direction of his course. Certain pages could easily be spared as in the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento"; the themes reasonably do not betray the virile invention of the later Strauss, but the rising contrapuntist, the master colorist, the weaver of sensuously beautiful melody, had begun to cast his shadow before him. A youth of 23, able to conceive the poetic introduction to the same third movement, and to score its sustained harmonies with such clearness, with such understanding of woodwind and horns—how admirably Strauss wrote for his father's instrument—is not to be found today. Now we begin by writing orchestral enigmas that few care to play and fewer to hear. Strauss owes his subsequent brilliant daring no less to his boyhood's classic underpinning than to Ritter's awakening.

The paraphrasing on the popular Italian song, "Funiculi, Funicula," sung by the opulent and pulchritudinous Carmen Melis at the Sunday night concerts at the Opera House to the mad delight of the audience, plausibly might have evoked hisses for its daring in the late '80s. The independence in the treatment of the different choirs of instruments, the striking counterpoint, the assertive rhythms, the authoritative manner of handling his materials all command admiration even today.

Ravel's rhapsody contains representative pages of modern French orchestral music—the bold, irresitible dance malaguena, the atmospheric prelude to the night, the varied kaleidoscope of the fair with its animated scenes and musical toys. Scheinpflug's overture to a Shaksperian comedy has Elizabethan character, in light gayety, humor and pomp. Dvorak's two pieces for cello—the first of the nature of an obligato for the solo instrument—have melodic simplicity and measures of decorative embellishment rather than emotional significance, but they were played with artistic appreciation by Mr Warnke and the orchestra.

The program next week will be Reznicek's "Schlemihl," Mozart's symphony in C major and the G major piano concerto of Beethoven, Harold Bauer soloist.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 28,

'SCHLEMIHL' MODERN, BUT IS NOT NEW

Von Reznicek Piece at the Symphony—Bauer Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Emil von Rez [illegible]

[illegible] hearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, and the G-major piano concerto of Beethoven, with Harold Bauer as soloist, completed the programme.

THEME IS OF TODAY

In more than one sense is Renicek's "symphonic biography" modern. In the first place, it is redolent of the idioms of other living composers of Germany, notably Richard Strauss. In the scond place, and this is important in a sociological, if not also in an artistic connection, the theme is emphatically of today. Von Reznicek has written, even as Richard Strauss has written, an immense autobiography in tones, but the plot is not, in the former instance, that of a hero merely disgusted with the world, martyrized in his search for the ideal. Reznicek's hero, presumsumably himself, is a modern man, "pursued by misfortune."

And what is this mismortune? The misfortune, the deadly foe of the struggler, is the lack of that which, as Balzac said, was as necessary to the young man of the 19th century as armor was to him in the 16th—money! Discouraged by perpetual contact and struggle with necessity, his spirit dulled by his mundane environment, the poor wretch whose life has been only a succession of failures commends his soul to God, and permits himself to "glide toward Nirvana." And this plot is by far the most modern and the most original feature of the tone-poem.

Granted that there are some fine pages, that the theme of the man, though its character and its announcement are not unremindful of Strauss, is vigorous and complete; that there are striking passages in the section which corresponds to a scherzo; that the adagio contains some music of real beauty and that the last pages are solemn and sincere—granted all this, it remains that the music is essentially unoriginal, the music is not of an individual, but of a school, and this music, in its proportions and its workmanship, displays many of the most objectionable features of modern German composition.

The work is too long, it is gradiose, Hugoesque without the genius of a Hugo or a Strauss to make the thing picturesque and palatable; over-orchestrated, swollen with a mass of detail which tends to obscure the main lines of the composition. There are instances of beautiful instrumentation, but there is too much instrumentation. In the course of two-thirds of the piece the composer, apparently, has employed every instrumental device that he can think of, and has to hark back and repeat some of his combinations verbatim.

This is undoubtedly sincere music, but it takes more than sincerity to make a great composer. The score gives the impression of much labor, and neither the mid-night oil nor the proverbial bootstrap were absent during its composition. When one great man appears he does so at the expense of the individualities of a thousand mediocrities. There is not air enough in the world for the strong and the weak. For one Strauss, a hundred lesser composers shall perish.

Great Performance of "Jupiter"

The incomparable symphony of Mozart could not have had a more advantageous setting. The symphony played yesterday is beyond peradventure one of the seven wonders of musical literature. As it was said of Thalberg that he was the greatest pianist and of Liszt that he was the only pianist, so it may well be said of Mozart, in this and others of his greatest works, that whereas, even in the case of a Beethoven, one is keenly conscious of spirit struggling through clay; in the case of Mozart there is no clay.

Only the talent completely without alloy could have written this symphony, if only for the reason that a lesser man would have been perplexed and embarrassed in attempting to handle ideas so great and so many. There is little under heaven more ineffably tender and consoling than the slow movement of this symphony, as there is little music so drunken with inspiration as the finale. It is a rapturous outpouring of creative genius, only comparable in its exuberance and its glory to some radiant picture by an Italian artist of the 15th or 16th century, some picture that shows a sky of cherubim proclaiming the glory of God.

Now, it is easy to discuss such a performance as the very brilliant performance of Reznicek's tone-poem, but it is not so easy to speak of the interpretation of a Mozart symphony, because it takes so much more comprehension to percieve all of the beauty and the art in a symphony of Mozart that the reviewer of average ability may well beware of proclaiming his opinions regarding its proper interpretation. It is enough to say here that Dr. Muck, far better acquainted with the symphony than any reviewer, made the music eloquent to many as it had never been before. One may listen to a masterpiece for many years, and suddenly hear it for the first time, but with this experience the interpreter of the music has necessarily much to do.

Almost as fine an experience was Mr. Bauer's romantic and poetical interpretation of the concerto of Beethoven, which stands apart from all of the other works of Beethoven in this form, and is to us preferable even to the great "Emperor" concerto. The serenity of this music, which, indeed, passes understanding, the wondrous middle movement, in which the strings and the piano respond to each other, and the sportive play of beautiful ideas in the finale, are almost unmatched, even in the music of Beethoven.

And in its technic the G major concerto stands apart from the others. The orchestration is exceedingly light, clear, transparent. The piano part is written in an as equally modest manner [illegible] thus a lightness of touch, an [illegible] though the [illegible]

[illegible] upon paper is a mood of joyful contemplation that makes the work occupy only a second place, in this respect after the "Jupiter" symphony. It is as if the prophet of the 19th century were beholding with emotions too profound for boisterous utterance a new heaven and a new earth. In few, indeed, of his masterpieces was Beethoven so inspired, so incredibly original, so filled with awe and joy in the presence of the mystery of nature.

Mr. Bauer's performance was thrice admirable. It should also be said, that in spite of the modest scoring, there is perhaps no concerto in which one discovers a more intimate union of orchestral and solo instruments, and here Dr. Muck was remarkable. At the close of the performance there was an ovation for the soloist.

JOURNAL—

MUCK TO DIRECT WAGNER PROGRAM

Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall Tomorrow.

At the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon Dr. Muck will conduct a performance of Wagner's music. This is something he seldom does except at the Royal Opera or at Bayreuth. His fame as a Wagnerian interpreter, combined with the fame of the orchestra, make these rare all-Wagner programs a veritable feast for Boston music-lovers.

The program tomorrow will comprise the overtures and preludes of six of the music-dramas and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung." Dr. Muck places these works in chronological order so that it is possible in listening to the music to gain a very clear idea of the growth and development of Wagner's genius from the time he wrote "Rienzi" up to the culminating point of his creation, which is found in "Parsifal."

The order of the works is as follows: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Muck will use the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture, with the bacchanale of Venusberg.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 23 1914

THE ROUND OF CONCERTS

WAGNER AND DR. MUCK FOR THE PENSION FUND

The Overtures and Preludes from "Rienzi" Through "Parsifal" Played Again and in the Usual Eloquent Fashion by the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Lerner Reappears with Her Familiar Distinctions—The Pachmann-Like Quality in Her Touch and Tone—Week-End Episodes

TWICE a year the public of Greater Boston is asked to contribute to the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, and upon these occasions programmes designed to attract others than subscribers to the regular season must and should be offered. In spite of the statement by a New York critic several seasons ago that the Wagner "wave" had passed, Greater Boston is still ready once a year to hear not only a Wagner programme, but one particular Wagner programme—that in which all his preludes and two dramatic excerpts are assembled and presented in chronological order.

It is to be taken for granted that at the Pension Fund concerts the men of the orchestra outdo themselves; it is to be taken for granted that at Dr. Muck's hands the works of Wagner receive an incomparable interpretation. Many wish that Dr. Muck were willing to play Wagnerian excerpts at the regular concerts of the orchestra; in the face of his expressed opinion that operatic music has no place in the concert hall, many feel that, since Wagnerian excerpts are freely placed on concert programmes by other conductors, and since adequate operatic performances of Wagner's later works take place in Boston seldom or never, it would be better to hear excerpts carefully selected and artistically rendered by Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra than to hear random excerpts under less favorable circumstances. Be that as it may, surely the cleverly arranged programme which has become a familiar feature of the Pension Fund concerts sets forth Wagner and his music in a favorable and very special way.

An ordinary performance of the "Rienzi" overture gives an impression as flat and banal as that caused by much of the language in Bulwer-Lytton's romance on the same subject. Years ago Dr. Muck showed us that a slower tempo and more care as to details of expression and phrasing could transform an old bugbear of the concert-room into an artistic composition. Is this result wholly Wagner, or has Dr. Muck read into a childish work greater depth of thought than the composer's development was capable of when he wrote this overture? There is no question but that Wagner was deeply moved by the character and [illegible] sincerely sought adequately to express his feelings; therefore, despite some crudity of treatment, Wagner is entitled to the benefit of what ever doubt may arise concerning his power to compose "deep" music during that youthful period.

On the other hand, how immature in many details the "Rienzi" overture is, becomes evident with the opening bars of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Externally pleasing but under-expressive themes have given way to bare but characterizing motives, brilliant "treatment" in the conventional sense to still more brilliant tone-painting, noise to power, melodrama to drama. The growth from the earlier work to the later is enormous.

In the overture to "Tannhäuser" there is in part a return to pleasing but inexpressive music, in part to dramatically highly suggestive music. The popular "Pilgrims' Chorus" is deservedly liked for its lyrically attractive melody, and later, when this melody peters out, harmonic interest comes to the rescue; but what word does it suggest, what emotion does it arouse? Immediately afterward, the opening measures of the Venusberg are graphically suggestive, but the "hymn to Venus" can hardly be called significant music. Yesterday, fortunately, the return of the Pilgrims' Chorus, with its unhappy suggestion of a psalm-tune at a camp-meeting, was omitted to make way for the Bacchanale (Paris version).

Everyone knows that the Paris Bacchanale was composed by Wagner seventeen years after the completion of "Tannhäuser"; it dates from about the same period as "Tristan and Isolde." Upon the germ of sensual suggestiveness present in the early Venusberg music, Wagner built up a wild orgy of sustained horror and feverish restlessness. In the extraordinary close, the fury seems to have spent itself, and in the torpid silence which ensues the curious insistence of C-sharp followed by B over a descending bass recalls (intentionally or not—who knows?) the Pilgrims Chorus like a faint memory of the world outside to the infatuated minstrel in the Venusberg.

An intermission divided the concert, perhaps designedly, into two periods: The first, that of the young Wagner, bursting with new ideas, unable to restrain himself from healthy demonstrativeness; the second, that of the mature composer, with still greater ideas his servants not his masters, no longer "showing off" because he no longer needed to do so.

London critics once called the "Lohengrin" prelude "meaningless noise"; nowadays it is played at "pop" concerts to gather a crowd when wine and beer prove insufficiently attractive. In sixty years a piece of music may thus change mightily; happy its composer if the change is for the better.

The "Meistersinger" prelude is in itself a great work; as the creation of a composer addicted to the gloomy philosophy of Schopenhauer it is a "give-away." The remark of a well known musician that "Meistersinger" is the only opera in good repute in which nobody gets killed, has point. This sunny and whole-hearted work, as expansive and radiant as the good Sachs himself, is almost our only modern example of sustained cheerfulness and manly optimism.

Many would have enjoyed hearing the "Love-Death" appended to the "Tristan" prelude, but the "Love-Death" demands the last word of a concert. Wagner's concert close for the "Tristan" prelude usually seems perfunctory, a sudden letting-down of the tension; in these days of free tonality, an audience ought not to be shocked at a conductor's ending this prelude with the pizzicato G's which lead into the first act. Yesterday, however, Dr. Muck succeeded in warming the concert close to its task in such a manner that the customary bathos was pleasantly absent.

To some of us, the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung," from the moment when Brünnhilde enters the stage, is the sublimest passage in all music, and the funeral music of Siegfried is its close second. Nowhere else is sombre grandeur so eloquently yet concisely expressed. Yesterday the tubas were somewhat lacking in tone; the players, who are regularly hornists, used horn mouthpieces, evidently fearing that tuba mouthpieces would hurt their embouchure for their usual duties. This unfortunate circumstance is nobody's fault, since special players of Wagner tubas are not to be had. In all other respects, the performance was exceptionally fine.

After Wagner the fighter, Wagner the amorist, Wagner the pessimist—and even Wagner the optimist—then Wagner the mystic. Who could have prophecised of the stormy youth or the passionate man that in his old age he would produce this serene, tender, dispassionate "Parsifal?" It was a fittingly peaceful ending to a tragic and intense life; the presence at the end of yesterday's programme of the "Parsifal" prelude well symbolized this last stage of its composer's career, and sent the thoughtful to their homes reflecting, as was fitting, upon this out of all of Wagner's many phases.

Mr. Gericke once gave an agreeable programme consisting wholly of Dvořák's works. Programmes wholly of Brahms, of Strauss and others have also given pleasure. With almost all of the men whom one can enjoy for a whole afternoon or evening one nevertheless soon becomes conscious of mannerisms, of the limitations which are the seamy side of individuality. Even with Beethoven a programme consisting wholly of his works, however delightful, however inspiring, over-emphasizes Beethoven's virtues at the expense of others which are missed. With Bach and Wagner alone is one perpetually conscious not merely of a great individual, but of a whole man; their personalities are complete, if they have limitations they do not bring them to our attention. In truth, they are great not because of, rather in spite of, their powerful individuality; they master us because they are universal.

P. G. C.

[57]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME VARIOUSLY "UNIFIED"

NOV. 21

Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody", with the Suggestion of the New Spain of the Parisian Composers and Their Characteristic Procedure with It—The Young Strauss and His Italian Fantasia—Mr. Warnke and His 'Cello Pieces

DR. MUCK is capable of making such onerous programmes as that which he destins for New York a fortnight hence, whereon Sibelius's exacting fourth symphony and Reznicek's huge tone-poem, "Schlemihl," stand side by side and there is no explanation of them. He is also capable of assembling five such engaging pieces as made the list for the Symphony Concert yesterday and setting his hearers to amusing speculation as to the underlying principle by which he had "unified" them. Strauss wrote his symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," in his young years; Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" is relatively youthful work; and so also is Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakspeare." So, perhaps, was the programme "unified." It might have been "unified" again by its tonal geography, so to say; since Strauss was setting down his impressions of Italy, Ravel had fastened his imagination on Spain and Scheinpflug walked abroad in the merry and fantastic country—quite as real as the Italy of 1886 or the Spain of 1907—of Shakspeare's comedies. Finally, it was a light programme, as programmes at the Symphony Concerts go, and if lightness was the unifying principle, it accounted for the inclusion of the two 'cello pieces by Dvorâk that Mr. Warnke played with the orchestra — an adagio called "Woodland Rest" and a rondo, otherwise untitled. They were not youthful work; they were innocent of all tonal geography, unless it was a suggestion of the narrow region that the repertory of the violoncello traverses, but they were light.

Moreover, each came ingratiatingly to the ear; they had a mild measure of fancy; and after the manner of a concerto in little they displayed the two voices of the violoncello and the tone and technique of the violoncellist. He and it were broadly songful in the adagio with the rich, warm, suave and edgeless tone that Mr. Warnke habitually summons—never heavy, never thick, never candied with the excess of sentiment that is the pitfall of instrument and player in sustained melody. In the rondo, the 'cello did often caper through its higher tones and in abrupt transition in and out of them. Then, by itself, it is not so good to hear; but Mr. Warnke saved the day for it because his lightness of hand hid all trace of effort and his bright and flowing tone averted all shrillness. Mr. Warnke has unusual fineness of ear for the tone of the 'cello and for its euphonies with that of the other instruments and that sensibility halos his technical achievement and the bravura music that he plays. No wonder his audience heard him gladly, while he himself, if not his pieces, fitted into the "youthful" programme. The relentless programme-book set his age at forty-three and his years of service with the orchestra at nine. Yet he seems as young as he was when he joined it.

Ravel's excursion into tonal geography was the most interesting of the three, because it was obviously a journey into the Spain of the newest generation of Parisian composers. Ravel, like Laparra before him in the music-drama, "La Habanera" which was sung twice or thrice at our defunct Opera House, will have none of the old romantically conventionalized Spain—the Spain that is "literary" and theatrical and that speaks out of such "Spanish" music as Massenet's in the battle of "Le Cid," and, if the truth must be told, from more pages than one of Bizet's "Carmen." These realists do not even spare Chabrier's "España"; to them it is only music of the old conventionalized rhythms and "appropriate" tonal colors made vital by the composer's energy and opulence. (Yet he visited the Spain of the eighties, note-book in hand). They have even been heard to speak despitefully of Debussy's "Iberia," as these same rhythms and colors vivified once more by a highly individual imagination and expert harmonic and instrumental strokes. (Possibly they forget in these sayings the penetrating and illusive beauty of the song of the oboe in "The Perfumes of the Night.") Their Spain is a melancholy land of bare bleak expanses, of still and solitary patios, of stark lights and shadows. Up and down it, walk sombre and brooding figures against a background of distant and broken sounds—sometimes the rhythm of a dance, sometimes a fragment of a mournful and brooding melody, or again the remote echoes of some crass tumult of the folk. The rhythms do not stir these figures; the melodies move them not; once and again the tumult draws them and then the composers who would set in tones their vision of this glamorless Spain write such music as that of the first scene of "La Habanera" or the finale of Ravel's rhapsody.

With vision of such a Spain, and with dexterous use of the familiar harmonic and instrumental procedures of the newer French music, Ravel has written his rhapsody, that from beginning to end, except in freedom of form, is anything but rhapsodic. It begins in a "Prelude to the Night"—music that evokes the distant sounds, the still and tremulous atmosphere, the melancholy mood, and the pungent air of this newly-imagined Spain. The listener hears with the ear of one of these solitary and brooding figures unless he is over-occupied with the harmonic and instrumental detail, the divisions and the juxtapositions, the incessant "pointing" by which Ravel imparts his mood and suggestion. The distant sounds seem to take shape in the ghost of a malaguena—fragments of a melody shrilly piped, broken rhythms that beat feebly, gather strength, and fall away again; a drowning and brooding bass, the melan-[illegible]ings of an English horn [illegible] ish rush of the dance into [illegible]. The Habanera into which the music now flows is akin. Languorously and brokenly it comes out of the distance; in melancholy it gathers rhythm and melody; its syncopations seem the mockery of itself. Its sensuousness is acrid, as becomes this new Spain of the composers—this Spain the musical speech of which is the speech of the new composers of Paris. It needs their stripped and sharpset timbres, their piercing modulations, their graphic juxtapositions, their thin-edged chords.

Then the tumult, as though out of the distance it were coming to whirl into itself the listening and the brooding figures—rhythms that beat hard and clear upon the ear and then twist into each other in the rising confusion of sound; melodies that for a moment have shape and body and then disappear jangling; orchestral sound and fury as of the din of a people's fete; mocking stillnes and melancholy, though the voice of instruments must denote them; and then the tumult again and unmistakably colored, as it has been more than once, in this finale, according to the conventions of Spanish music. Grant this newly-visioned Spain—and every composer has his right to his premises—and Ravel's music is vivid with suggestion and atmosphere. The observation that—as the composers say—evoked the vision becomes the transmitting imagination that imparts it. The musical means as surely and illusively fulfil their purpose—and tax the virtuosity of the conductor and the orchestra to the utmost. The rhapsody, like the performance, was a tour de force in a narrowly specialized genre.

---

seemed in retrospect a frank, open broadly human, universally appealing music. There is not a trace of youth in Ravel's piece, except in the date on the title page and, maybe, in his unwavering fidelity to his visioned Spain and the tonal speech he has found for it. Strauss's, on the other hand, abounds in hints of the early twenties in which he wrote it and time, as usual, has not been kind to these youthful sins of excess. Now, after almost thirty years, not a few measures in the fantasia sound tinged, emphasizing the disparity between the sonorous and the resterating voice and the idea and the emotion behind. In all this early music, Strauss often suggests the young athlete of tones, strong, sinewry, in perfect condition, master of himself in all things but one—an inclination to test and prove his powers somewhat too insistently. There are lengths in these impressions of Italy in which Strauss is no more than taking his exercise with his music and adding nothing to the sum of its contents or to the force of its suggestion. On the other hand, the pieces that preceded the symphonic fantasia were little else than this exercise, whereas in it imagination kindled by more than zest of young resource and agility, and emotion newly awakened and deeply touched, have their play.

Strauss wrote his earliest pieces as so much adept music-making. He wrote the symphonic fantasia because Italy had filled him with sensations that he was eager to transmute into tunes. They were not novel sensations. He had seen the dazzling shimmer of Italian seas in the sunshine and heard the voice of wistful Italian song rising solitary over them. He had joyous tumult of Naples on a fete day. He had looked upon Roman ruins and felt their suggestion of vanished might. He had seen the bare expanses that they dot bathed in a light and heat that seemed to magnify the desolate emptiness. Ten thousand travellers in Italy have received these sensations and mused over them. But Strauss, already the born composer, sprang to highly individual expression of them in tones.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
NOVEMBER 21, 1914

TRAVEL MOTIVE DOMINATES DR. MUCK'SPROGRAM

Unity Brought About by Thought of Peregrination, Contrast by Diversity of Lands Visited — Heinrich Warnke as Soloist

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifth public rehearsal, Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor; Heinrich Warnke, violoncello soloist. The program: Strauss, symphonic fantasia, "From Italy"; Dvorak, two pieces for violoncello and orchestra, "Woodland Rest" and rondo; Ravel, "Spanish Rhapsody"; Scheinpflug, overture to a comedy of Shakespeare.

Musical travel was the subject with which Dr. Muck entertained his listeners this week. Peregrination was the idea common to his four numbers. A week in Central Italy, a romantic hour in the woods of Nowhere Land, a night and a day in Southern Spain and finally an excursion to Shakespeare's England gave the concert not only motion and color but also that other quality sought by orchestral program-builders with great zeal, unity.

It can hardly be proved that the sojourn of Richard Strauss in Rome and Naples in his formative days awoke his descriptive, lyric or dramatic powers to virile action. His fantasia, "From Italy," seems more like an effort to prove himself a Roman and as good a [illegible] than an inspiration to picture the Campagna, the Forum, the Sorrento cliffs or the streets of Naples in tone. Technically the work is masterful, quite as much so as the compositions which have brought Strauss his fame. But it lacks his peculiar expressiveness, probably because it is wholly pictorial. Strauss to be himself must have a hero. He has succeeded in giving his valuation on society best when he has had a dramatic figure for his subject. Fortunately he early found himself as a portrait maker through his "Don Juan." From the time he put the tone poem on a basis of character study in this work to his "Don Quixote," he almost never missed the mark.

Without much question Strauss erred both in the selection and in the arrangement of his subject matter for the fantasia. The two opening divisions, meditating on the Campagna and the ruins of Rome, do not give the work a proper symphonic start. It is not a safe procedure for a composer to work to a climax by beginning in contemplative mood and gradually awakening to actualities, and, as in this piece, to trivialities. There must be a strong statement of purposes at the outset, or listeners do not approve. In the third section, on Sorrento, the interest grows. In the last division, on Neapolitan street life, it is at its height. But this movement is not of the type that belongs at the end of a long symphonic piece. It is the part in which the composer comes forward as a humorist and it would be far more acceptable, according to musical canons, as an inside division. Strauss in his later works tried all sorts of musical trifling, such as the use of the song, "Funiculi," illustrates, but he always did it in the right place.

Ravel's trip to Spain was a delight from beginning to end. The end, indeed, was too close to the beginning. The piece had its full value as an example of striking orchestral style, played on the same program with the inert Strauss music. Ravel is doubtless at present the most attractive writer of the modern French school. It is a question whether in the end he will please as he does now, for his methods are not his own but Debussy's and the originator of musical methods is likely to prove the one who uses them to most lasting effect. This is not always so, however. For the orchestral successors of Liszt have won more acclaim with his methods than he ever won.

The composer of the "Spanish Rhapsody" has applied the Debussy scheme of tone coloring with irresistible charm. His pieces make their way without opposition. Even four years ago the rhapsody, when first played in Boston by the Boston Orchestral Club, stood out as an appealing work from among other modern French works that seemed to have novelty of sound as their whole end and aim. The "Prelude to the Night," with which the rhapsody begins, is not far from an outright imitation of Debussy. The difference is that Debussy invented this type of nocturne, and there was the end of it, while Ravel incorporated it in an intelligible pictorial plan.

In a way the subject-matter of the Ravel work parallels that of the Strauss work, beginning contemplatively and growing gradually to concern itself with action and people. The Ravel climax of "The Fair" corresponds to the Strauss climax of "Folk Life." But Ravel is writing in the form of a suite, Strauss in that of a symphony. The difference between the effect of the two pieces shows that the fundamental requirements of form hold through all changes of orchestral style. Strauss never tried to unsettle them after his experience with his "From Italy." No Parisian, like Ravel, would ever think of trying such a thing anyway.

Mr. Warnke gave the house delight with the two Dvorak songs for violoncello and orchestra. In the "Woodland Rest" and rondo studies, Dvorak treats the stringed instrument of bass and tenor range to make its sound pleasing. He writes for the hearer, not for the display of the player's virtuosity. There are few solo violoncello performances that do not have their moments of tunelessness, owing to the untamable manners of the instrument. There could be no such moments in the two Dvorak pieces with the orchestral accompaniment the composer has given them.

The Scheinpflug piece was brilliantly read. There is no musical form lasting into the twentieth century from the nineteenth that has more vitality than the overture. The work of the modern German is worthy of a high place in the repertory. It should win room close to the familiar compositions in the overture form of Weber and Wagner.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL PLEASING

Dr. Muck's Program of Superlative Interest

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most entertaining programmes ever offered by Dr. Muck was that of yesterday, the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Warnke was the soloist.

The programme was as follows: Symphonic Fantasia, "Aus Italien," Richard Strauss; "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Maurice Ravel; "Waldesruhe," and Rondo for 'cello, Dvorak; overture to a comedy of Shakspere, Paul Scheinpflug.

SUPERLATIVE INTEREST

The music was a superlative interest; what orchestra and what conductor would have been capable of doing it greater justice? Strauss' symphonic fantasia is the work of a young and highly gifted composer, not, perhaps, entirely out of his scholastic swaddling-clothes, inclined to develop his ideas rather too conscientiously and sometimes at greater length than is necessary, but nevertheless a young man full of romaniticism and musical ideas of genuine beauty.

Ravel's music is less subjective than that of Strauss. It is tone-painting. Its harmonic idioms are those of the mature Ravel, not the Ravel who started in the footsteps of Debussy. Ravel has undoubtedly taken some suggestions of value from the older man. So much is hardly to be controverted, but he has evolved a style which has become of late years more and more personal. It is possible to go too far in comparing musical impressions with those gained from the contemplation of other arts, but perhaps it is not too far-fetched to say that Ravel's music has a sheer brilliancy and vibrancy of color not unakin to that of the paintings of Monet and other colorists of the same period and tendencies.

A chord which is undeniably ugly on paper is played by the orchestra, and lo, the effect is one of shimmering beauty. The music must be judged somewhat by the standards of an impressionistic picture.

Exterior Music

It is what might be called exterior music. There is a hard brilliancy, an audacious emphasis of contrast in the music of Ravel, that leads one to think of him as a painter of things for the sake of such effects, rather than an individual of strongly subjective emotions. Strauss wrote his "Impressions of Italy" from quite a different standpoint. Ravel expressed his "Impressions of Spain," and his Spain is far from the gayly colored and charmingly romantic Spain of Bizet, or yet the somewhat Parisian Spain of Emmanuel Chabrier. It is a Spain of cruder colors and more violent contrasts than either, and in this, probably, is far more faithful to the impressions actually communicated by the landscapes of that country. Consider the "Prelude a la nuit," the sense of black shadows and grotesque shapes, the even macabre suggestion of this movement.

It is in the final movement that Ravel's orchestra, as one might say, swarms with life. There is overwhelming vigor and extravagant humor in this piece. The orchestra fairly crackles and blazes with all sorts of effects. The movements of a crowd, the shouts of dancers, are continually present to the ears. And is this merely the music of a clever Frenchman? Is it only a box of orchestral tricks, a sterile succession of phrases which are not ideas, but pegs upon which to hang bizarre harmonies and unheard orchestra combinations? We think better of the music.

Marvel of Style

The Rhapsodie Espagnoele is at least a marvel of style and of technical attainment. It dazzles us. Sufficient for the day is that, and for tomorrow—we are not concerned with tomorrow! We are here concerned with a reviewers ideas of Ravel's music, which was heartily applauded.

I could not hear Mr. Warnke's performance, but I am informed on good authority he played with unwonted warmth of style, with unusual purity of intonation and without exagerating the character of the very pleasing compositions he interpreted.

The 'cellist may well be as modest as that, for the literature of the 'cello is not so brilliant or so abundant that he need tax his hearers overlong, beautiful as his tone may be.

Schienpflug's overture is a very happy contribution to Shakspearian music. One need not speculate as to which comedy it was intended for, to enjoy this music and feel its spirit. Some say that "Twelfth Night" was the piece the composer had in mind. Why not "The Merry Wives of Windsor"? Why not any pleasant play that Shakspeare penned? It is good [illegible]

MONITOR
NOVEMBER, 21.

QUIRKS AND DIFFICULTIES OF OBOE PLAYING SET FORTH BY GEORGES LONGY FOR MONITOR

To be a successful oboe player, a man must first of all be a good carpenter; next he must be a musician. Thus Georges Longy, the solo oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the leader of the Longy Club of wind instrument players, spoke of his craft to a Monitor man who went to see him about his plans for the winter and to ask him to tell some of his experiences.

The distinguished artist was in his library at his desk and had just summarized for the visitor the work of the Longy Club in the 14 seasons it has been giving concerts. That story was compact, all in evidence in a few pages of a notebook which he held open before him, and in two shelves of folio music, the instrumental parts of his repertory, standing in a bookcase beside him. Closing the notebook on the page of last year's programs and starting from the room, "I will show what I mean," he said, "when I call myself a carpenter."

He returned bringing a big drawer, which he set down on his study table. It was filled with tools, including pincers, files and blades. In one corner were thin, yellow strips of wood in three-inch lengths; in another were many cork-bound conical tubes, about equal in size to a goosequill below the plume. The outfit looked as though it belonged somewhere between a watchmaker's table and a joiner's bench.

Strips of Cane Used

Reaching in, Mr. Longy jogged the drawer. One of the yellow splinters slid under something that looked like itself turned to steel. One of the little tubes rolled with the uneven course of things that taper and was swallowed in the jaws of a pair of pliers. They were just the objects the oboist wanted to illustrate his point. Catching them up and pointing first to the sliver of wood, "That is one of a great number of strips of cane," he explained, "which I sawed and split from a stalk last summer when I was at leisure. It will take its turn sometime to be shaped into a reed for my oboe. It is dry and stiff now and cannot be bent double, as it must be. The bending is a difficult operation and can be done only by the use of water to soften the fibers."

From the drawer Mr. Longy picked a reed that had been through the bending process, doubled back on itself in the middle, across the grain, with the shiny side of the cane outward. It showed no sign of splitting down the grain. It showed no sign of a fiber strained to breaking. The half inch of edge where the bend came was straight and was square with the length. Moreover the halves did not spring back from the bend to an angle, but lay flat against each other.

Mr. Longy next inserted the little quill-like tube between the free ends and wound a string around them to indicate the process of tying reed and tube fast together.

Accurate Cutting Needed

In a compartment of the drawer were a number of tubes with reeds bent over one end and bound tight to the cork overlay. Anybody could see that they were tips for the oboe half way on the road to readiness. Mr. Longy picked out one of them. "Now the precarious part of the work begins," he noted. "This edge where the reed is bent has to be cut across accurately to make the opening through which I blow."

There was room for a question here, why two short reeds were not tied, end to end, to save all the trouble of the bending and the lateral cut. If two parallel strips of cane were required for the oboe mouthpiece, why were they not fitted on there to begin with? But further explanations implied that an exact parallel condition of the two vibrant planes was necessary and that it could be obtained only through the bending, tying and cutting processes.

Another inevitable question, of less obvious answer was asked. Why should the oboist not let some instrument maker do all this work for him?

"I only wish it could be so," was the reply. "But no instrument maker can shape an oboist's reeds for him. Neither can one oboe player do it for another. A player must do this himself, fitting the ends precisely to his mouth. What I have shown is only the start. After the reed is fastened to the tube, the [illegible] edge has to be cut open with great [illegible] when the two strips have to be [illegible] just alike."

Here Mr. Longy illustrated by taking a tip that had been opened, placing it on a block and chafing off fine shavings with a thin knife blade. "In this way," he noted, the two halves are worked to about an equal thickness. After that they have to be changed a little here and there to suit the player's own mechanism of tone production, his lips."

Tone Production Secured

Mr. Longy repeated that unless he were a sufficient artisan to do the whole job, from splitting the cane from the stalk down to paring to the right thickness the two reeds through which he sends his breath in playing, he never could secure his tone production. He added that with all the skill he had acquired, he could not make tips that would be of more than indifferent service to anybody else. Where good work is done, he insisted, the oboist always prepares his own reeds.

A question which could not help intruding itself right here was why a reed job once done should not settle the oboist's difficulties for a good while.

"A new reed is needed," the artist replied, "for every important change of style in the oboe player's program. A reed that would do well in a symphony of Mozart would not do at all in a tone poem of Strauss. Whenever a new piece of music is announced to be played at the Symphony concerts I do not think, 'Well, now, how shall I play this?' Oh no! My first thought is, 'How shall [illegible] make a reed that will be right for it?' [illegible] cannot take the music home with me a[illegible] begin practising it at once, as a violinis[illegible] a flute player or a horn player can. [illegible] have to get out my tools and take pe[illegible]haps half a week perfecting a tip for m[illegible] instrument. When that is done I c[illegible] begin to practise my part."

Instrument Considered

After all this about the mere mout[illegible]piece of the oboe, Mr. Longy made tw[illegible] or three comments on the instrume[illegible] itself. It seems that the warmest tin[illegible] of the orchestral color system is un[illegible]conquerable for more than one reason[illegible] The tone that comes from Arcadia i[illegible] rare to obtain, simple though it is t[illegible] the ear. The task of the modern music[illegible] maker to tame the melody of Sicilian idyllic times has not been easy. His struggle to snatch the pastoral pip[illegible] from the rude hands that first contrive[illegible] it is far from being a victory. Neithe[illegible] nineteenth nor twentieth century invention has helped him much to shake o[illegible] the bucolic grasp.

"An oboist can use but one instrumen[illegible] at a time," Mr. Longy resumed. "If anything should happen to put my oboe out of use while a concert is going on, I should not ask the second oboist to let me take his; for I could do nothing with it. If I leave the oboe I have played on all winter behind me when I go to Europe in the summer, and buy a new one over there and practise on it for three months, I must continue to play on the new one on my return, for I shall have forgotten all about the old one.

Pitch Corrected

"The reason why a player must stic[illegible] to one instrument is because every obo[illegible] built has certain spots in its scale whe[illegible] its pitch is inaccurate, and no two a[illegible] alike in this respect. It takes me a lon[illegible] time to master the inequalities of intonation in an instrument so I can play it i[illegible] tune."

As to the question of buying a satisfactory instrument, Mr. Longy said that there was no great difficulty on that point. And he remarked that the term of usefulness of an instrument was about five years. "The chief mechanical problem," he noted in review, "is in the reed, for unless that is right, no production of tone is possible. The chief artistic problem is the tone quality. That is a question decided by the player's ear. And that is no different for the oboe than for any other instrument. A player acquires a good tone by hearing many others and selecting the good points of each one. I think the reputation of the French school of wind instrument playing arises from the fact that in the Paris conservatory so large a number of players are assembled. A beginner has many models to choose from and his taste is readily formed."

Ruminating a moment, Mr. Longy expressed regret that the oboe had developed less technical facility than the other high voices of the orchestra. "I have concluded," he said, "that oboe players spend so much of their careers in cargentry that they cannot find time to to raise their playing to the fluency in execution it ought to have. Mechanical [illegible] have held the double-reed in-

Chamber Music Record

The program books of the Boston Symphony orchestra have the name of Mr. Longy in the list of members from 1898. For the seventeenth winter, then, his melodies are giving the Symphony concerts their indispensable Arcadian gleam. The notebook which he opened at the beginning of the interview contains the record of his Boston work which pleases him most, the programs of chamber music concerts given by the Longy Club.

Entering on the fifteenth winter, the club is to present new works for woodwind instruments out of a list of pieces that Mr. Longy has collated from recent European concert programs and publishers' announcements. The pieces include a nonette by Lange, a suite by Amberg for solo woodwind instruments and piano, and a quintet, with a piano part in the score, by Blanc. Works which may be given if the club can obtain the music, are a septet by Kittl and a septet with which Joseph Holbrooke won the prize in a competition. Other possibilities are a Reger serenade for flute, and an unusual kind of piece, a quartet for flutes by Wouters. Mr. Longy has once performed this in an arrangement for two flutes, oboe and English horn, but never in its original form.

Count of Repertory

In Mr. Longy's bookcase are about 300 works for wind instrument combinations of various kinds. They are in the form of loose folio sheets, ready for distribution to the desks of the players, and take up less room than they would if bound in the form of scores. Of the two shelves that hold them, one is enough for the club's active repertory. There is a shelf of works that have been tried in rehearsal and put back as unavailable or that are waiting their turn to be tried.

The club this season, as heretofore, is composed of the leading men in the woodwind group of the Symphony orchestra, two horn players and a pianist. The oboists are Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom; the flutists, Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Brooke, [illegible] taking the place this year of Mr. Grisez, and Mr. Mimart; the bassoonists, Mr. Sadony and Mr. Mosbach; the horn players, Mr. Hain and Mr. Lorbeer; the [illegible] Mr. De Voto.

(Photo by Horner)

Georges Longy, first oboe player, Boston Symphony orchestra

DAILY ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 21

PROGRAMME IS EXCITING

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF MASQUERADE MUSIC

Works of Strauss, Ravel, Dvorak and Scheinpflug Played—Mr. Warnke Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.
Ravel. "Spanish Rhapsody."
Dvorak. Waldesruhe and Rondo, for violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Scheinpflug. Overture to a Shakespearian comedy.

Not only were several nations represented in this list of composers (German, French and Bohemian), but almost each one of the composers tried to masquerade in the costume of some other nation. Thus Richard Strauss endeavored to become Italian, Ravel Spanish, and Scheinpflug Old English. We do not always sympathize with this kind of musical Puss-in-the-corner, for the foreigner never writes as one to the manner born.

Thus Strauss' "From Italy" was a long way from Italy. The composer showed his ignorance when he mistook "Funicoli-Funicola" for an Italian folk-song. "Santa Lucia" is the folk-song of Naples, although Denza's song has been warbled from every Neapolitan throat. Possibly a third-of-a-century of such continual use may have made "Funicoli-Funicola" into a folk-song, but even then we do not enjoy having this thoroughly Neapolitan dish served up "A L'Allemande." Beer and Vino Vesuvio do not blend well. The Finale of the Italian symphony treats the street-song to progressions and developments that would astound anyone dwelling within a hundred miles of the volcano it celebrates.

But "Aus Italien" is interesting to the modern student as showing Richard Strauss first setting out on the path which led him to the heights of modern orchestral composition. Before this he had kept pretty close to the Brahms fold, and his one symphony which preceded this was quite strait-laced and formal. That he went much further in "Don Quixote," in "Heldenleben," and most especially in orchestral mountain-peak "Death and Transfiguration," cannot be denied, but it is interesting to watch this vein in its inception.

And, after all, "From Italy" is a strong work in its own right, particularly when it is so superbly played as it was yesterday afternoon. The first movement, "On the Campagna," gains tremendously on closer acquaintance, but we cannot quite understand the explosions of the second movement, "Amid Rome's Ruins"; perhaps they were blasting among the ruins, or possibly they were bombarding them. The long reverie, "At Sorrento," showed that Debussy has not got a monopoly of delicacy in tone-painting.

But in the Finale, as above hinted, we could not find as much of the true Naples, as is discovered in the first act of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." After all, it takes an [illegible] to [illegible] this kind of

MONITOR
NOVEMBER, 21.

QUIRKS AND DIFFICULTIES OF OBOE PLAYING SET FORTH BY GEORGES LONGY FOR MONITOR

To be a successful oboe player, a man must first of all be a good carpenter; next he must be a musician. Thus Georges Longy, the solo oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the leader of the Longy Club of wind instrument players, spoke of his craft to a Monitor man who went to see him about his plans for the winter and to ask him to tell some of his experiences.

The distinguished artist was in his library at his desk and had just summarized for the visitor the work of the Longy Club in the 14 seasons it has been giving concerts. That story was compact, all in evidence in a few pages of a notebook which he held open before him, and in two shelves of folio music, the instrumental parts of his repertory, standing in a bookcase beside him. Closing the notebook on the page of last year's programs and starting from the room, "I will show what I mean," he said, "when I call myself a carpenter."

He returned bringing a big drawer, which he set down on his study table. It was filled with tools, including pincers, files and blades. In one corner were thin, yellow strips of wood in three-inch lengths; in another were many cork-bound conical tubes, about equal in size to a goosequill below the plume. The outfit looked as though it belonged somewhere between a watchmaker's table and a joiner's bench.

Strips of Cane Used

Reaching in, Mr. Longy jogged the drawer. One of the yellow splinters slid under something that looked like itself turned to steel. One of the little tubes rolled with the uneven course of things that taper and was swallowed in the jaws of a pair of pliers. They were just the objects the oboist wanted to illustrate his point. Catching them up and pointing first to the sliver of wood, "That is one of a great number of strips of cane," he explained, "which I sawed and split from a stalk last summer when I was at leisure. It will take its turn sometime to be shaped into a reed for my oboe. It is dry and stiff now and cannot be bent double, as it must be. The bending is a difficult operation and can be done only by the use of water to soften the fibers."

From the drawer Mr. Longy picked a reed that had been through the bending process, doubled back on itself in the middle, across the grain, with the shiny side of the cane outward. It showed no sign of splitting down the grain. It showed no sign of a fiber strained to breaking. The half inch of edge where the bend came was straight and was square with the length. Moreover the halves did not spring back from the bend to an angle, but lay flat against each other.

Mr. Longy next inserted the little quill-like tube between the free ends and wound a string around them to indicate the process of tying reed and tube fast together.

Accurate Cutting Needed

In a compartment of the drawer were a number of tubes with reeds bent over one end and bound tight to the cork overlay. Anybody could see that they were tips for the oboe half way on the road to readiness. Mr. Longy picked out one of them. "Now the precarious part of the work begins," he noted. "This edge where the reed is bent has to be cut across accurately to make the opening through which I blow."

There was room for a question here, why two short reeds were not tied, end to end, to save all the trouble of the bending and the lateral cut. If two parallel strips of cane were required for the oboe mouthpiece, why were they not fitted on there to begin with? But further explanations implied that an exact parallel condition of the two vibrant planes was necessary and that it could be obtained only through the bending, tying and cutting processes.

Another inevitable question, of less obvious answer was asked. Why should the oboist not let some instrument maker do all this work for him?

"I only wish it could be so," was the reply. "But no instrument maker can shape an oboist's reeds for him. Neither can one oboe player do it for another. A player must do this himself, fitting the ends precisely to his mouth. What I have shown is only the start. After the reed is fastened to the tube, the bent edge has to be cut open with great care. Then the two strips have to be pared down just alike."

Here Mr. Longy illustrated by taking a tip that had been opened, placing it on a block and chafing off fine shavings with a thin knife blade. "In this way," he noted, the two halves are worked to about an equal thickness. After that they have to be changed a little here and there to suit the player's own mechanism of tone production, his lips."

Tone Production Secured

Mr. Longy repeated that unless he were a sufficient artisan to do the whole job, from splitting the cane from the stalk down to paring to the right thickness the two reeds through which he sends his breath in playing, he never could secure his tone production. He added that with all the skill he had acquired, he could not make tips that would be of more than indifferent service to anybody else. Where good work is done, he insisted, the oboist always prepares his own reeds.

A question which could not help intruding itself right here was why a reed job once done should not settle the oboist's difficulties for a good while.

"A new reed is needed," the artist replied, "for every important change of style in the oboe player's program. A reed that would do well in a symphony of Mozart would not do at all in a tone poem of Strauss. Whenever a new piece of music is announced to be played at the Symphony concerts I do not think, 'Well, now, how shall I play this?' Oh no! My first thought is, 'How shall I make a reed that will be right for it?' I cannot take the music home with me and begin practising it at once, as a violinist, a flute player or a horn player can. I have to get out my tools and take perhaps half a week perfecting a tip for my instrument. When that is done I can begin to practise my part."

Instrument Considered

After all this about the mere mouthpiece of the oboe, Mr. Longy made two or three comments on the instrument itself. It seems that the warmest tint of the orchestral color system is unconquerable for more than one reason. The tone that comes from Arcadia is rare to obtain, simple though it is to the ear. The task of the modern music maker to tame the melody of Sicilian idyllic times has not been easy. His struggle to snatch the pastoral pipe from the rude hands that first contrived it is far from being a victory. Neither nineteenth nor twentieth century invention has helped him much to shake off the bucolic grasp.

"An oboist can use but one instrument at a time," Mr. Longy resumed. "If anything should happen to put my oboe out of use while a concert is going on, I should not ask the second oboist to let me take his; for I could do nothing with it. If I leave the oboe I have played on all winter behind me when I go to Europe in the summer, and buy a new one over there and practise on it for three months, I must continue to play on the new one on my return, for I shall have forgotten all about the old one.

Pitch Corrected

"The reason why a player must stick to one instrument is because every oboe built has certain spots in its scale where its pitch is inaccurate, and no two are alike in this respect. It takes me a long time to master the inequalities of intonation in an instrument so I can play it in tune."

As to the question of buying a satisfactory instrument, Mr. Longy said that there was no great difficulty on that point. And he remarked that the term of usefulness of an instrument was about five years. "The chief mechanical problem," he noted in review, "is in the reed, for unless that is right, no production of tone is possible. The chief artistic problem is the tone quality. That is a question decided by the player's ear. And that is no different for the oboe than for any other instrument. A player acquires a good tone by hearing many others and selecting the good points of each one. I think the reputation of the French school of wind instrument playing arises from the fact that in the Paris conservatory so large a number of players are assembled. A beginner has many models to choose from and his taste is readily formed."

Ruminating a moment, Mr. Longy expressed regret that the oboe had developed less technical facility than the other high voices of the orchestra. "I have concluded," he said, "that oboe players spend so much of their careers in cargentry that they cannot find time to to raise their playing to the fluency in execution it ought to have. Mechanical problems have held the double-reed in- [illegible] unduly."

Chamber Music Record

The program books of the Boston Symphony orchestra have the name of Mr. Longy in the list of members from 1898. For the seventeenth winter, then, his melodies are giving the Symphony concerts their indispensable Arcadian gleam. The notebook which he opened at the beginning of the interview contains the record of his Boston work which pleases him most, the programs of chamber music concerts given by the Longy Club.

Entering on the fifteenth winter, the club is to present new works for woodwind instruments out of a list of pieces that Mr. Longy has collated from recent European concert programs and publishers' announcements. The pieces include a nonette by Lange, a suite by Amberg for solo woodwind instruments and piano, and a quintet, with a piano part in the score, by Blanc. Works which may be given if the club can obtain the music, are a septet by Kittl and a septet with which Joseph Holbrooke won the prize in a competition. Other possibilities are a Reger serenade for flute, and an unusual kind of piece, a quartet for flutes by Wouters. Mr. Longy has once performed this in an arrangement for two flutes, oboe and English horn, but never in its original form.

Count of Repertory

In Mr. Longy's bookcase are about 300 works for wind instrument combinations of various kinds. They are in the form of loose folio sheets, ready for distribution to the desks of the players, and take up less room than they would if bound in the form of scores. Of the two shelves that hold them, one is enough for the club's active repertory. There is a shelf of works that have been tried in rehearsal and put back as unavailable or that are waiting their turn to be tried.

The club this season, as heretofore, is composed of the leading men in the woodwind group of the Symphony orchestra, two horn players and a pianist. The oboists are Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom; the flutists, Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Brooke; [illegible] taking the place this year of Mr. Grisez, and Mr. Mimart; the bassoonists, Mr. Sadony and Mr. Mosbach; the horn players, Mr. Hain and Mr. Lorbeer; the [illegible] Mr. De Voto.

(Photo by Horner)

Georges Longy, first oboe player, Boston Symphony orchestra

DAILY ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 21

PROGRAMME IS EXCITING

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF MASQUERADE MUSIC

Works of Strauss, Ravel, Dvorak and Scheinpflug Played—Mr. Warnke Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.
Ravel. "Spanish Rhapsody."
Dvorak. Waldesruhe and Rondo, for violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Scheinpflug. Overture to a Shakespearian comedy.

Not only were several nations represented in this list of composers (German, French and Bohemian), but almost each one of the composers tried to masquerade in the costume of some other nation. Thus Richard Strauss endeavored to become Italian, Ravel Spanish, and Scheinpflug Old English. We do not always sympathize with this kind of musical Puss-in-the-corner, for the foreigner never writes as one to the manner born.

Thus Strauss' "From Italy" was a long way from Italy. The composer showed his ignorance when he mistook "Funicoli-Funicola" for an Italian folk-song. "Santa Lucia" is the folk-song of Naples, although Denza's song has been warbled from every Neapolitan throat. Possibly a third-of-a-century of such continual use may have made "Funicoli-Funicola" into a folk-song, but even then we do not enjoy having this thoroughly Neapolitan dish served up "A L'Allemande." Beer and Vino Vesuvio do not blend well. The Finale of the Italian symphony treats the street-song to progressions and developments that would astound anyone dwelling within a hundred miles of the volcano it celebrates.

But "Aus Italien" is interesting to the modern student as showing Ri[illegible]ard Strauss first setting out on the path which led him to the heights of modern orchestral composition. Before this he had kept pretty close to the Brahms fold, and his one symphony which preceded this was quite strait-laced and formal. That he went much further in "Don Quixote," in "Heldenleben," and most especially in orchestral mountain-peak "Death and Transfiguration," cannot be denied, but it is interesting to watch this vein in its inception.

And, after all, "From Italy" is a strong work in its own right, particularly when it is so superbly played as it was yesterday afternoon. The first movement, "On the Campagna," gains tremendously on closer acquaintance, but we cannot quite understand the explosions of the second movement, "Amid Rome's Ruins"; perhaps they were blasting among the ruins, or possibly they were bombarding them. The long reverie, "At Sorrento," showed that Debussy has not got a monopoly of delicacy in tone-painting.

But in the Finale, as above hinted, we could not find as much of the true Naples, as is discovered in the first act of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." After all, it takes an Italian to do this kind of [illegible] Yet we have never

MONITOR
NOVEMBER, 21.

QUIRKS AND DIFFICULTIES OF OBOE PLAYING SET FORTH BY GEORGES LONGY FOR MONITOR

To be a successful oboe player, a man must first of all be a good carpenter; next he must be a musician. Thus Georges Longy, the solo oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the leader of the Longy Club of wind instrument players, spoke of his craft to a Monitor man who went to see him about his plans for the winter and to ask him to tell some of his experiences.

The distinguished artist was in his library at his desk and had just summarized for the visitor the work of the Longy Club in the 14 seasons it has been giving concerts. That story was compact, all in evidence in a few pages of a notebook which he held open before him, and in two shelves of folio music, the instrumental parts of his repertory, standing in a bookcase beside him. Closing the notebook on the page of last year's programs and starting from the room, "I will show what I mean," he said, "when I call myself a carpenter."

He returned bringing a big drawer, which he set down on his study table. It was filled with tools, including pincers, files and blades. In one corner were thin, yellow strips of wood in three-inch lengths; in another were many cork-bound conical tubes, about equal in size to a goosequill below the plume. The outfit looked as though it belonged somewhere between a watchmaker's table and a joiner's bench.

Strips of Cane Used

Reaching in, Mr. Longy jogged the drawer. One of the yellow splinters slid under something that looked like itself turned to steel. One of the little tubes rolled with the uneven course of things that taper and was swallowed in the jaws of a pair of pliers. They were just the objects the oboist wanted to illustrate his point. Catching them up and pointing first to the sliver of wood, "That is one of a great number of strips of cane," he explained, "which I sawed and split from a stalk last summer when I was at leisure. It will take its turn sometime to be shaped into a reed for my oboe. It is dry and stiff now and cannot be bent double, as it must be. The bending is a difficult operation and can be done only by the use of water to soften the fibers."

From the drawer Mr. Longy picked a reed that had been through the bending process, doubled back on itself in the middle, across the grain, with the shiny side of the cane outward. It showed no sign of splitting down the grain. It showed no sign of a fiber strained to breaking. The half inch of edge where the bend came was straight and was square with the length. Moreover the halves did not spring back from the bend to an angle, but lay flat against each other.

Mr. Longy next inserted the little quill-like tube between the free ends and wound a string around them to indicate the process of tying reed and tube fast together.

Accurate Cutting Needed

In a compartment of the drawer were a number of tubes with reeds bent over one end and bound tight to the cork overlay. Anybody could see that they were tips for the oboe half way on the road to readiness. Mr. Longy picked out one of them. "Now the precarious part of the work begins," he noted. "This edge where the reed is bent has to be cut across accurately to make the opening through which I blow."

There was room for a question here, why two short reeds were not tied, end to end, to save all the trouble of the bending and the lateral cut. If two parallel strips of cane were required for the oboe mouthpiece, why were they not fitted on there to begin with? But further explanations implied that an exact parallel condition of the two vibrant planes was necessary and that it could be obtained only through the bending, tying and cutting processes.

Another inevitable question, of less obvious answer was asked. Why should the oboist not let some instrument maker do all this work for him?

"I only wish it could be so," was the reply. "But no instrument maker can shape an oboist's reeds for him. Neither can one oboe player do it for another. A player must do this himself, fitting the ends precisely to his mouth. What I have shown is only the start. After the reed is fastened to the tube, the bent edge has to be cut open with great care. Then the two strips have to be pared down just alike."

Here Mr. Longy illustrated by taking a tip that had been opened, placing it on a block and chafing off fine shavings with a thin knife blade. "In this way," he noted, the two halves are worked to about an equal thickness. After that they have to be changed a little here and there to suit the player's own mechanism of tone production, his lips."

Tone Production Secured

Mr. Longy repeated that unless he were a sufficient artisan to do the whole job, from splitting the cane from the stalk down to paring to the right thickness the two reeds through which he sends his breath in playing, he never could secure his tone production. He added that with all the skill he had acquired, he could not make tips that would be of more than indifferent service to anybody else. Where good work is done, he insisted, the oboist always prepares his own reeds.

A question which could not help intruding itself right here was why a reed job once done should not settle the oboist's difficulties for a good while.

"A new reed is needed," the artist replied, "for every important change of style in the oboe player's program. A reed that would do well in a symphony of Mozart would not do at all in a tone poem of Strauss. Whenever a new piece of music is announced to be played at the Symphony concerts I do not think, 'Well, now, how shall I play this?' Oh no! My first thought is, 'How shall make a reed that will be right for it?' cannot take the music home with me a begin practising it at once, as a violini a flute player or a horn player can. have to get out my tools and take p haps half a week perfecting a tip for m instrument. When that is done I c begin to practise my part."

Instrument Considered

After all this about the mere mout piece of the oboe, Mr. Longy made tw or three comments on the instrumen itself. It seems that the warmest tin of the orchestral color system is un conquerable for more than one reason The tone that comes from Arcadia i rare to obtain, simple though it is t the ear. The task of the modern music maker to tame the melody of Sicilian idyllic times has not been easy. His struggle to snatch the pastoral pip from the rude hands that first contrive it is far from being a victory. Neithe nineteenth nor twentieth century inven tion has helped him much to shake o the bucolic grasp.

"An oboist can use but one instrumen at a time," Mr. Longy resumed. "If anything should happen to put my oboe out of use while a concert is going on, I should not ask the second oboist to let me take his; for I could do nothing with it. If I leave the oboe I have played on all winter behind me when I go to Europe in the summer, and buy a new one over there and practise on it for three months, I must continue to play on the new one on my return, for I shall have forgotten all about the old one.

Pitch Corrected

"The reason why a player must stic to one instrument is because every obo built has certain spots in its scale wher its pitch is inaccurate, and no two ar alike in this respect. It takes me a lon time to master the inequalities of intona tion in an instrument so I can play it i tune."

As to the question of buying a satisfactory instrument, Mr. Longy said that there was no great difficulty on that point. And he remarked that the term of usefulness of an instrument was about five years. "The chief mechanical problem," he noted in review, "is in the reed, for unless that is right, no production of tone is possible. The chief artistic problem is the tone quality. That is a question decided by the player's ear. And that is no different for the oboe than for any other instrument. A player acquires a good tone by hearing many others and selecting the good points of each one. I think the reputation of the French school of wind instrument playing arises from the fact that in the Paris conservatory so large a number of players are assembled. A beginner has many models to choose from and his taste is readily formed."

Ruminating a moment, Mr. Longy expressed regret that the oboe had developed less technical facility than the other high voices of the orchestra. "I have concluded," he said, "that oboe players spend so much of their careers in cargentry that they cannot find time to to raise their playing to the fluency in execution it ought to have. Mechanical problems have held the double-reed in- [illegible] unduly."

Chamber Music Record

The program books of the Boston Symphony orchestra have the name of Mr. Longy in the list of members from 1898. For the seventeenth winter, then, his melodies are giving the Symphony concerts their indispensable Arcadian gleam. The notebook which he opened at the beginning of the interview contains the record of his Boston work which pleases him most, the programs of chamber music concerts given by the Longy Club.

Entering on the fifteenth winter, the club is to present new works for woodwind instruments out of a list of pieces that Mr. Longy has collated from recent European concert programs and publishers' announcements. The pieces include a nonette by Lange, a suite by Amberg for solo woodwind instruments and piano, and a quintet, with a piano part in the score, by Blanc. Works which may be given if the club can obtain the music, are a septet by Kittl and a septet with which Joseph Holbrooke won the prize in a competition. Other possibilities are a Reger serenade for flute, and an unusual kind of piece, a quartet for flutes by Wouters. Mr. Longy has once performed this in an arrangement for two flutes, oboe and English horn, but never in its original form.

Count of Repertory

In Mr. Longy's bookcase are about 300 works for wind instrument combinations of various kinds. They are in the form of loose folio sheets, ready for distribution to the desks of the players, and take up less room than they would if bound in the form of scores. Of the two shelves that hold them, one is enough for the club's active repertory. There is a shelf of works that have been tried in rehearsal and put back as unavailable or that are waiting their turn to be tried.

The club this season, as heretofore, is composed of the leading men in the woodwind group of the Symphony orchestra, two horn players and a pianist. The oboists are Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom; the flutists, Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Brooke; [illegible] taking the place this year of Mr. Grisez, and Mr. Mimart; the bassoonists, Mr. Sadony and Mr. Mosbach; the horn players, Mr. Hain and Mr. Lorbeer; the pianist, Mr. De Voto.

(Photo by Horner)

Georges Longy, first oboe player, Boston Symphony orchestra

DAILY ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 21

PROGRAMME IS EXCITING

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF MASQUERADE MUSIC

Works of Strauss, Ravel, Dvorak and Scheinpflug Played—Mr. Warnke Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.
Ravel. "Spanish Rhapsody."
Dvorak. Waldesruhe and Rondo, for violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Scheinpflug. Overture to a Shakespearian comedy.

Not only were several nations represented in this list of composers (German, French and Bohemian), but almost each one of the composers tried to masquerade in the costume of some other nation. Thus Richard Strauss endeavored to become Italian, Ravel Spanish, and Scheinpflug Old English. We do not always sympathize with this kind of musical Puss-in-the-corner, for the foreigner never writes as one to the manner born.

Thus Strauss' "From Italy" was a long way from Italy. The composer showed his ignorance when he mistook "Funicoli-Funicola" for an Italian folk-song. "Santa Lucia" is the folk-song of Naples, although Denza's song has been warbled from every Neapolitan throat. Possibly a third-of-a-century of such continual use may have made "Funicoli-Funicola" into a folk-song, but even then we do not enjoy having this thoroughly Neapolitan dish served up "A L'Allemande." Beer and Vino Vesuvio do not blend well. The Finale of the Italian symphony treats the street-song to progressions and developments that would astound anyone dwelling within a hundred miles of the volcano it celebrates.

But "Aus Italien" is interesting to the modern student as showing Richard Strauss first setting out on the path which led him to the heights of modern orchestral composition. Before this he had kept pretty close to the Brahms fold, and his one symphony which preceded this was quite strait-laced and formal. That he went much further in "Don Quixote," in "Heldenleben," and most especially in orchestral mountain-peak "Death and Transfiguration," cannot be denied, but it is interesting to watch this vein in its inception.

And, after all, "From Italy" is a strong work in its own right, particularly when it is so superbly played as it was yesterday afternoon. The first movement, "On the Campagna," gains tremendously on closer acquaintance, but we cannot quite understand the explosions of the second movement, "Amid Rome's Ruins"; perhaps they were blasting among the ruins, or possibly they were bombarding them. The long reverie, "At Sorrento," showed that Debussy has not got a monopoly of delicacy in tone-painting.

But in the Finale, as above hinted, we could not find as much of the true Naples, as is discovered in the first act of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." After all, it takes an Italian to do this kind of [illegible] Yet we have reve-been so [illegible] with "From Italy" as upon this occasion. That the audience shared this favorable impression was evident from the ensuing enthusiasm.

The concert was exciting almost from beginning to end. Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody needs a trifle more of garlic. It was not as thoroughly denationalized as Strauss' "Italy," but we did not find any Hidalgos or dark-eyed Senoritas concealed in its measures. Spain and Scotland seem to be the two countries whose music the outsiders try to appropriate chiefly. Scotland has been raided by Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch, Mendelssohn, Volkmann, and an entire band of Germans, while all the nations, as witness Rimski-Korsakoff, Chabrier, Dvorak, Ravel, Moszkowski, etc., etc., are descending upon Spain. We should prefer an occasional real Spanish composer upon the programme even though composers of Spain and Italy are as yet remarkably scarce in the orchestral field. But this little Suite of Ravel's had many merits. It was brief, and it might have been entitled "Some experiments in modern scoring." Almost all through the four movements there was a quaint reiteration of a four-noted figure in downward scale-progression. The fury of the Malaguena was supplemented with still greater fury at the final fair, in which xylophone, tamborine, and muted trumpets were heaped upon each other in wild dance rhythms. The work was a series of impressionist sketches, eccentric, but graphic. It was a very interesting exhibit of modern scoring, well worth playing and well worth studying, even if the Habanera did not obliterate Bizet.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke is always a welcome performer in these programmes. He has a pure and sympathetic tone and conquers all technical difficulties with a serenity that is classical. His two numbers were not of the most advanced type, but they were interesting and the first was romantic and well-contrasted with the second. The first, however, "Waldesruhe," came dangerously near the line of sentimentality, even if it served well to display Mr. Warnke's pure tones. The second had more technique, and at its end Mr. Warnke was recalled with much enthusiasm and then recalled again. But both pieces lost somewhat by being placed upon the spiciest programme that we have had for a long time.

Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" keeps one guessing. What comedy can it be? The brutal critic can answer off-hand—"Much Ado About Nothing," but the work really has something to say. Not every German composer is so conscientious about England's tunes as Scheinpflug shows himself to be. He goes back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and digs out an old Allemande by Giles Farnaby, and works this up in fine style; so that he deserves credit at least for historical accuracy. He makes good play with the deeper wood-wind instruments, especially bassoons and English horns, and here too there is some degree of historic purport, since the English horn was originally a shepherd's pipe in ante-Shakespearian days.

If we must saddle a particular comedy upon this overture we would choose "The Merry Wives of Windsor," whose prattling geniality and practical jokes seem in some degree reflected here. We fancy that we detect the burly Falstaff in more than one episode. The scoring is for a large modern orchestra, although we cannot find any startling effects of tone-color evolved; the best touches are in the old-fashioned bassoons, oboes and English horns. We are glad that the work is not one of the modern tone-puzzles. It would have seemed sad to have seen Shakespeare stretched upon the rack of 20th century dissonances.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 18,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FACTS AND FIGURES ABOUT THE PENSION FUND

The Symphony Orchestra's Own Charity and the Administration of It — Henry Russell on His Way to Boston — The Concert of the Apollo Club—Humperdinck's Wartime Opera—Items and Impressions

TWICE a year the Symphony Orchestra reminds the town that it has a Pension Fund, the income of which falls to retired or disabled members of the band. In this fashion the public of the Symphony Concerts and the community at large have come to realize, albeit rather hazily, that there is such a fund for such a purpose. More clearly both have learned out of long and pleasurable experience that the increase of the fund is the occasion of two concerts each year in which orchestra and conductor may be heard outside the regular course of their weekly works at Symphony Hall. Moreover, in these days of Dr. Muck's conductorship, they may be heard in music that seldom appears on the programmes of the regular concerts, viz.: overtures, preludes and other fragments from the operas and the music-dramas of Wagner. These, in Dr. Muck's convinced view, are intrinsically music of the theatre and so should have small place in symphony concerts. If he is to play them at all outside an opera house, he would keep them for some special and singular concert like those for the Pension Fund. Besides, these overtures, preludes and fragments at his hands and the hands of the orchestra usually win a numerous audience and the fund profits proportionally. Accordingly, the three overtures, the four preludes and the tonal apotheosis of Siegfried from "Götterdämmerung" are to be played once more next Sunday afternoon for the increase of the Pension Fund. Timely for a public that hardly knows the beginnings, the purpose and the workings of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution" comes this account of it from the pages of Mr. Howe's newly published sketch of the history of the orchestra:

"In the memorandum, 'In re the Boston Symphony Orchestra,' which Mr. Higginson wrote in 1881, before the first concert was given, it has been seen that the question of a Pension Fund was already presenting itself for consideration. The answer to it was deferred, but in 1903, at the instance of Mr. Gericke, it was definitely made in the establishment of the 'Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution.' The officers of this body are a board of seven directors elected annually by the members, and three trustees chosen by the directors. The members are divided into four classes, the first of which contains persons not employed as musicians, and not liable to dues or entitled to any financial benefits. Classes II., III. and IV. are made up of musicians who have joined the orchestra, respectively, when over thirty years of age, when between twenty-five and thirty, and when under twenty-five. Their annual dues are graded accordingly, between $37.50 and $30. All members pay an initiation fee of $50. The dues may be paid in weekly instalments deducted from their salaries and transferred directly to the treasurer of the Pension Institution.

"The maximum pension payable to retired members of the orchestra is $500. There are two funds, the permanent, in charge of the trustees, and the general, in charge of the directors. Out of these are paid, respectively, the benefits due to persons whose membership has terminated before ten years have elapsed, and all other benefits. The Pension-Fund Concerts given by the orchestra have been the chief source of income. One-third of the proceeds of all these concerts—the first of which occurred March 1, 1903—is paid to the permanent fund, two-thirds to the general. For the year ending Oct. 31, 1913, the total receipts from these concerts was $6639.70. In that year the income from securities of the permanent fund and invested general fund was $6976.07. In the same period the thirty-one pensions paid to members of the institution and their families, for whom careful provision is made in the bylaws, amounted, in sums from less than $100 to the maximum of $500, to $11,074.35.

"These are the bare facts, which are no more important than their implications. A background of security is none too common in the lives of those who depend upon one of the arts for their support. The advantage to the men of the orchestra in this regard has its parallel in the advantage to the orchestra. The early efforts to keep the musicians under a single conductor and thus to provide the continuity of standards and methods which was truly felt to be essential to the best results seem—in the light of present conditions—remote and primitive. The sense of permanence in the relations between the orchestral body and its individual members is an element of the highest value. In the results of it all, the public is an equal sharer with the men and the management. The orchestra is constantly better for the feeling of its members that their part in its work is no passing matter; and the brilliant concerts for the Pension Fund which now supplement the regular season are rare enrichments of each musical year."

EVENING RECORD.

NOVEMBER 21

STRAUSS' ITALY AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.
Ravel. "Spanish Rhapsody."
Dvorak. Waldesruhe and Rondo, for violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Scheinpflug. Overture to a Shakespearian comedy.

Not only were several nations represented in this list of composers (German, French and Bohemian), but almost each one of the composers tried to masquerade in the costume of some other nation. Thus Richard Strauss endeavored to become Italian, Ravel Spanish, and Scheinpflug Old English. We do not always sympathize with this kind of musical Puss-in-the-corner, for the foreigner never writes as one to the manner born, says Louis C. Elson in his Symphony review in The Advertiser.

Thus Strauss' "From Italy" was a long way from Italy. The composer showed his ignorance when he mistook "Funicoli-Funicola" for an Italian folk-song. "Santa Lucia" is the folk-song of Naples, although Denza's song has been warbled from every Neapolitan throat. Possibly a third-of-a-century of such continual use may have made "Funicoli-Funicola" into a folk-song, but even then we do not enjoy having this thoroughly Neapolitan dish served up "A L'Allemande." Beer and Vino Vesuvio do not blend well. The Finale of the Italian symphony treats the street-song to progressions and developments that would astound anyone dwelling within a hundred miles of the volcano it celebrates.

But "Aus Italien" is interesting to the modern student as showing Richard Strauss first setting out on the path which led him to the heights of modern orchestral composition. Before this he had kept pretty close to the Brahms fold, and his one symphony which preceded this was quite strait-laced and formal. That he went much further in "Don Quixote," in "Heldenleben," and most especially in orchestral mountain-peak "Death and Transfiguration," cannot be denied, but it is interesting to watch this vein in its inception.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke is always a welcome performer in these programmes. He has a pure and sympathetic tone and conquers all technical difficulties with a serenity that is classical. His two numbers were not of the most advanced type, but they were interesting and the first was romantic and well-contrasted with the second. The first, however, "Waldesruhe," came dangerously near the line of sentimentality, even if it served well to display Mr. Warnke's pure tones. The second had more technique, and at its end Mr. Warnke was recalled with much enthusiasm and then recalled again. But both pieces lost somewhat by being placed upon the spiciest programme that we have had for a long time.

Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" keeps one guessing. What comedy can it be? The brutal critic can answer off-hand—"Much Ado About Nothing," but the work really has something to say. Not every German composer is so conscientious about England's tunes as Scheinpflug shows himself to be. He goes back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and digs out an old Allemande by Giles Farnaby, and works this up in fine style; so that he deserves credit at least for historical accuracy. He makes good play with the deeper wood-wind instruments, especially bassoons and English horns, and here too there is some degree of historic purport, since the English horn was originally a shepherd's pipe in ante-Shakespearian days.

If we must saddle a particular comedy upon this overture we would choose "The Merry Wives of Windsor," whose prattling geniality and practical jokes seem in some degree reflected here. We fancy that we detect the burly Falstaff in more than one episode. The scoring is for a large modern orchestra, although we cannot find any startling effects of tone-color evolved; the best touches are in the old-fashioned bassoons, oboes and English horns. We are glad that the work is not one of the modern tone-puzzles. It would have seemed sad to have seen Shakespeare stretched upon the rack of 20th century dissonances.

BOSTON JOURNAL

NOVEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY PLAYS STRAUSS FINELY

Those who dodged last week's Symphony concerts, fearing Sibelius bearing gifts of acidulous themes and chaotic climaxes, returned yesterday to hear the more popular music to be found in Richard Strauss' youthful "Italian Symphony," in two Dvorak titbits for solo 'cello and orchestra and in Scheinpflug's vivacious "Overture to a Comedy in Shakespeare." They also heard Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" played for the first time at these concerts, and they rather liked the fourth movement of the suite. The other movements, which are of an ultra-modern character, suggested Mars or Saturn quite as much as Spain. There was faint applause for them from some revolutionary spirits in the back of the hall.

Strauss' fantasy on Italian impressions contains some of the Bavarian genius' finest tone painting. The first movement, "On the Campagna," is especially vivid and poetical. Dr. Muck and the orchestra received an ovation for their beautiful interpretation of the work. Warm applause also rewarded Mr. Warnke for his skilful and sympathetic playing of Dvorak's 'cello pieces, "Waldesruhe" and the "Rondo," both of which have been absent from Symphony program for many years.

The same program will be given again tonight.

Next week the soloist will be Harold Bauer. The program will comprise Reznicek's "Schlemihl," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's G major concerto for piano and orchestra.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 23

ADD HUNDREDS TO SYMPHONY FUND

Wagner Concert in Aid of Pension Attracts Big Audience.

Many hundreds of dollars were added yesterday to the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—exactly how many no one would say for publication—through the Wagner concert given by the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

On this occasion everything is contributed gratis. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, contributes the hall. Saturday night, when Maj. Higginson went to his seat at the regular Symphony concert, he was greetd by a fanfare from the orchestra, which took this way of publicly testifying to his generosity and also of taking part in the major's numerous 80th birthday celebrations.

The audience yesterday filled all but a comparatively few seats down front on the floor. Such an outpouring in what is generally regarded as an off year was quite remarkable. But there was an extraordinarily attractive all-Wagner program, to be conducted by Dr. Muck, one of the foremost Wagner interpreters of the day, and to be played by the finest orchestra in the land. These preludes and overtures to the Wagner operas miss some of their atmospheric effects when performed outside of the Opera House; but, just as Henry Irving and Ellen Terry gave one of their most effective performances of "The Merchant of Venice" at West Point in ordinary traveling dress, so these excerpts from the great music-dramas gave great pleasure yesterday, even without coryphees dancing to the music of the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," and without a stage spectacle to go with the titanic funeral music accompanying Siegfried to the pyre in "The Dusk of

Dr. Muck does not favor performing Wagner music outside the Opera House, but without such concessions as he made yesterday there would be scant opportunity to hear this wonderful music in Boston. This is what made the concert so rare a treat to the music-lover.

The program included the "Rienzi" and "Flying Dutchman" overtures, the prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde" and "Parsifal" preludes and the dirge from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."

BOSTON GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 23,

PENSION FUND AIDED.

Symphony Orchestra the Host at Symphony Hall.

Wagnerian Program Evokes Warm Applause From Large Audiance.

Symphony Hall was comfortably filled yesterday afternoon at the concert given by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. It was a wholly enjoyable occasion, the audience being promptly, enthusiastically responsive, and the orchestra very evidently enjoyed the afternoon.

The program was uncompromisingly Wagnerian, nothing else being even looked at, but it was Wagner in his more merciful moods, when an occasional lapse into melody gave average human nature a chance; glimpses of Parnassus.

The list included: Overture to "Reinzi"; overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version); prelude to "Lohengrin"; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Siegfried funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude to "Parsifal."

Of the performance of the orchestra, conducted as it was by Dr Karl Muck, there is, of course, no occasion now to speak. The foregoing are undoubtedly among the things the players have "by heart" and the playing of which comes as nearly to being a real pleasure to the executants as any music can be.

Under these circumstances the, at times, let us say "profound" passages were given with an ease and swing that on a lower musical plane are given to a marching tune by regiments en route. It was an occasion where the ordinary music lover can revel, hearing something done with the highest artistry that is somewhat short of the full-fledged "Symphony" program and yet far above the effervescent "Pops" confections.

As has been said, the audience was most enthusiastic, the "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" and "Mastersingers" particularly evoking warm, delighted applause.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 23.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra's Program Made Up of Overtures and Preludes by Wagner.

The first of the two annual concerts for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, as several times in previous years, was made up of overtures and preludes from the music dramas of Wagner. It has come to be well understood in Boston that Dr. Muck, the conductor, holds that these works, if performed at all outside the opera house, should be reserved for some special occasion, such as is afforded by these semi-annual concerts.

The audience yesterday was large and warmly responsive. Many were present who hear the orchestra only at intervals, but far the greater number were regular Symphony attendants who availed themselves of the opportunity to hear the orchestra in a Wagner program. Although the Pension Institution, established in 1903, has a system of graded dues and initiation fees, these concerts are the chief source of income. The public profits from the stable relations which the fund helps the players to maintain with the orchestra, and the enthusiasm yesterday was both a tribute to the quality of the performance and a demonstration of loyalty to the musicians.

The numbers were arranged in chronological sequence, beginning with the overture to "Rienzi," and continuing with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," using the Paris version. This ended the first part, and the conductor called the entire orchestra to their feet to acknowledge the applause.

In the second part were the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," the Siegfried funeral music from the "Dusk of the Gods" (the third day of "The Ring of the Nibelungs"), and the prelude to "Parsifal."

been so highly impressed with "From Italy" as upon this occasion. That the audience shared this favorable impression was evident from the ensuing enthusiasm.

The concert was exciting almost from beginning to end. Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody needs a trifle more of garlic. It was not as thoroughly denationalized as Strauss' "Italy," but we did not find any Hidalgos or dark-eyed Senoritas concealed in its measures. Spain and Scotland seem to be the two countries whose music the outsiders try to appropriate chiefly. Scotland has been raided by Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch, Mendelssohn, Volkmann, and an entire band of Germans, while all the nations, as witness Rimski-Korsakoff, Chabrier, Dvorak, Ravel, Moszkowski, etc., etc., are descending upon Spain. We should prefer an occasional real Spanish composer upon the programme even though composers of Spain and Italy are as yet remarkably scarce in the orchestral field. But this little Suite of Ravel's had many merits. It was brief, and it might have been entitled "Some experiments in modern scoring." Almost all through the four movements there was a quaint reiteration of a four-noted figure in downward scale-progression. The fury of the Malaguena was supplemented with still greater fury at the final fair, in which xylophone, tamborine, and muted trumpets were heaped upon each other in wild dance rhythms. The work was a series of impressionist sketches, eccentric, but graphic. It was a very interesting exhibit of modern scoring, well worth playing and well worth studying, even if the Habanera did not obliterate Bizet.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke is always a welcome performer in these programmes. He has a pure and sympathetic tone and conquers all technical difficulties with a serenity that is classical. His two numbers were not of the most advanced type, but they were interesting and the first was romantic and well-contrasted with the second. The first, however, "Waldesruhe," came dangerously near the line of sentimentality, even if it served well to display Mr. Warnke's pure tones. The second had more technique, and at its end Mr. Warnke was recalled with much enthusiasm and then recalled again. But both pieces lost somewhat by being placed upon the spiciest programme that we have had for a long time.

Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" keeps one guessing. What comedy can it be? The brutal critic can answer off-hand—"Much Ado About Nothing," but the work really has something to say. Not every German composer is so conscientious about England's tunes as Scheinpflug shows himself to be. He goes back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and digs out an old Allemande by Giles Farnaby, and works this up in fine style; so that he deserves credit at least for historical accuracy. He makes good play with the deeper wood-wind instruments, especially bassoons and English horns, and here too there is some degree of historic purport, since the English horn was originally a shepherd's pipe in ante-Shakespearian days.

If we must saddle a particular comedy upon this overture we would choose "The Merry Wives of Windsor," whose prattling geniality and practical jokes seem in some degree reflected here. We fancy that we detect the burly Falstaff in more than one episode. The scoring is for a large modern orchestra, although we cannot find any startling effects of tone-color evolved; the best touches are in the old-fashioned bassoons, oboes and English horns. We are glad that the work is not one of the modern tone-puzzles. It would have seemed sad to have seen Shakespeare stretched upon the rack of 20th century dissonances.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 18,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FACTS AND FIGURES ABOUT THE PENSION FUND

The Symphony Orchestra's Own Charity and the Administration of It — Henry Russell on His Way to Boston — The Concert of the Apollo Club—Humperdinck's Wartime Opera—Items and Impressions

TWICE a year the Symphony Orchestra reminds the town that it has a Pension Fund, the income of which falls to retired or disabled members of the band. In this fashion the public of the Symphony Concerts and the community at large have come to realize, albeit rather hazily, that there is such a fund for such a purpose. More clearly both have learned out of long and pleasurable experience that the increase of the fund is the occasion of two concerts each year in which orchestra and conductor may be heard outside the regular course of their weekly works at Symphony Hall. Moreover, in these days of Dr. Muck's conductorship, they may be heard in music that seldom appears on the programmes of the regular concerts, viz.: overtures, preludes and other fragments from the operas and the music-dramas of Wagner. These, in Dr. Muck's convinced view, are intrinsically music of the theatre and so should have small place in symphony concerts. If he is to play them at all outside an opera house, he would keep them for some special and singular concert like those for the Pension Fund. Besides, these overtures, preludes and fragments at his hands and the hands of the orchestra usually win a numerous audience and the fund profits proportionally. Accordingly, the three overtures, the four preludes and the tonal apotheosis of Siegfried from "Götterdämmerung" are to be played once more next Sunday afternoon for the increase of the Pension Fund. Timely for a public that hardly knows the beginnings, the purpose and the workings of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution" comes this account of it from the pages of Mr. Howe's newly published sketch of the history of the orchestra:

"In the memorandum, 'In re the Boston Symphony Orchestra,' which Mr. Higginson wrote in 1881, before the first concert was given, it has been seen that the question of a Pension Fund was already presenting itself for consideration. The answer to it was deferred, but in 1903, at the instance of Mr. Gericke, it was definitely made in the establishment of the 'Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution.' The officers of this body are a board of seven directors elected annually by the members, and three trustees chosen by the directors. The members are divided into four classes, the first of which contains persons not employed as musicians, and not liable to dues or entitled to any financial benefits. Classes II., III. and IV. are made up of musicians who have joined the orchestra, respectively, when over thirty years of age, when between twenty-five and thirty, and when under twenty-five. Their annual dues are graded accordingly, between $37.50 and $30. All members pay an initiation fee of $50. The dues may be paid in weekly instalments deducted from their salaries and transferred directly to the treasurer of the Pension Institution.

"The maximum pension payable to retired members of the orchestra is $500. There are two funds, the permanent, in charge of the trustees, and the general, in charge of the directors. Out of these are paid, respectively, the benefits due to persons whose membership has terminated before ten years have elapsed, and all other benefits. The Pension-Fund Concerts given by the orchestra have been the chief source of income. One-third of the proceeds of all these concerts—the first of which occurred March 1, 1903—is paid to the permanent fund, two-thirds to the general. For the year ending Oct. 31, 1913, the total receipts from these concerts was $6639.70. In that year the income from securities of the permanent fund and invested general fund was $6976.07. In the same period the thirty-one pensions paid to members of the institution and their families, for whom careful provision is made in the bylaws, amounted, in sums from less than $100 to the maximum of $500, to $11,074.35.

"These are the bare facts, which are no more important than their implications. A background of security is none too common in the lives of those who depend upon one of the arts for their support. The advantage to the men of the orchestra in this regard has its parallel in the advantage to the orchestra. The early efforts to keep the musicians under a single conductor and thus to provide the continuity of standards and methods which was truly felt to be essential to the best results seem—in the light of present conditions—remote and primitive. The sense of permanence in the relations between the orchestral body and its individual members is an element of the highest value. In the results of it all, the public is an equal sharer with the men and the management. The orchestra is constantly better for the feeling of its members that their part in its work is no passing matter; and the brilliant concerts for the Pension Fund which now supplement the regular season are rare enrichments of each musical year."

EVENING RECORD.

NOVEMBER 21

STRAUSS' ITALY AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia.
Ravel. "Spanish Rhapsody."
Dvorak. Waldesruhe and Rondo, for violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Scheinpflug. Overture to a Shakespearian comedy.

Not only were several nations represented in this list of composers (German, French and Bohemian), but almost each one of the composers tried to masquerade in the costume of some other nation. Thus Richard Strauss endeavored to become Italian, Ravel Spanish, and Scheinpflug Old English. We do not always sympathize with this kind of musical Puss-in-the-corner, for the foreigner never writes as one to the manner born, says Louis C. Elson in his Symphony review in The Advertiser.

Thus Strauss' "From Italy" was a long way from Italy. The composer showed his ignorance when he mistook "Funicoli-Funicola" for an Italian folk-song. "Santa Lucia" is the folk-song of Naples, although Denza's song has been warbled from every Neapolitan throat. Possibly a third-of-a-century of such continual use may have made "Funicoli-Funicola" into a folk-song, but even then we do not enjoy having this thoroughly Neapolitan dish served up "A L'Allemande." Beer and Vino Vesuvio do not blend well. The Finale of the Italian Symphony treats the street-song to progressions and developments that would astound anyone dwelling within a hundred miles of the volcano it celebrates.

But "Aus Italien" is interesting to the modern student as showing Richard Strauss first setting out on the path which led him to the heights of modern orchestral composition. Before this he had kept pretty close to the Brahms fold, and his one symphony which preceded this was quite strait-laced and formal. That he went much further in "Don Quixote," in "Heldenleben," and most especially in orchestral mountain-peak "Death and Transfiguration," cannot be denied, but it is interesting to watch this vein in its inception.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke is always a welcome performer in these programmes. He has a pure and sympathetic tone and conquers all technical difficulties with a serenity that is classical. His two numbers were not of the most advanced type, but they were interesting and the first was romantic and well-contrasted with the second. The first, however, "Waldesruhe," came dangerously near the line of sentimentality, even if it served well to display Mr. Warnke's pure tones. The second had more technique, and at its end Mr. Warnke was recalled with much enthusiasm and then recalled again. But both pieces lost somewhat by being placed upon the spiciest programme that we have had for a long time.

Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" keeps one guessing. What comedy can it be? The brutal critic can answer off-hand—"Much Ado About Nothing," but the work really has something to say. Not every German composer is so conscientious about England's tunes as Scheinpflug shows himself to be. He goes back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and digs out an old Allemande by Giles Farnaby, and works this up in fine style; so that he deserves credit at least for historical accuracy. He makes good play with the deeper wood-wind instruments, especially bassoons and English horns, and here too there is some degree of historic purport, since the English horn was originally a shepherd's pipe in ante-Shakespearian days.

If we must saddle a particular comedy upon this overture we would choose "The Merry Wives of Windsor," whose prattling geniality and practical jokes seem in some degree reflected here. We fancy that we detect the burly Falstaff in more than one episode. The scoring is for a large modern orchestra, although we cannot find any startling effects of tone-color evolved; the best touches are in the old-fashioned bassoons, oboes and English horns. We are glad that the work is not one of the modern tone-puzzles. It would have seemed sad to have seen Shakespeare stretched upon the rack of 20th century dissonances.

BOSTON JOURNAL

NOVEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY PLAYS STRAUSS FINELY

Those who dodged last week's Symphony concerts, fearing Sibelius bearing gifts of acidulous themes and chaotic climaxes, returned yesterday to hear the more popular music to be found in Richard Strauss' youthful "Italian Symphony," in two Dvorak titbits for solo 'cello and orchestra and in Scheinpflug's vivacious "Overture to a Comedy in Shakespeare." They also heard Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" played for the first time at these concerts, and they rather liked the fourth movement of the suite. The other movements, which are of an ultra-modern character, suggested Mars or Saturn quite as much as Spain. There was faint applause for them from some revolutionary spirits in the back of the hall.

Strauss' fantasy on Italian impressions contains some of the Bavarian genius' finest tone painting. The first movement, "On the Campagna," is especially vivid and poetical. Dr. Muck and the orchestra received an ovation for their beautiful interpretation of the work. Warm applause also rewarded Mr. Warnke for his skilful and sympathetic playing of Dvorak's 'cello pieces, "Waldesruhe" and the "Rondo," both of which have been absent from Symphony program for many years.

The same program will be given again tonight.

Next week the soloist will be Harold Bauer. The program will comprise Reznicek's "Schlemihl," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's G major concerto for piano and orchestra.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

NOVEMBER 23

ADD HUNDREDS TO SYMPHONY FUND

Wagner Concert in Aid of Pension Attracts Big Audience.

Many hundreds of dollars were added yesterday to the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—exactly how many no one would say for publication—through the Wagner concert given by the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

On this occasion everything is contributed gratis. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, contributes the hall. Saturday night, when Maj. Higginson went to his seat at the regular Symphony concert, he was greetd by a fanfare from the orchestra, which took this way of publicly testifying to his generosity and also of taking part in the major's numerous 80th birthday celebrations.

The audience yesterday filled all but a comparatively few seats down front on the floor. Such an outpouring in what is generally regarded as an off year was quite remarkable. But there was an extraordinarily attractive all-Wagner program, to be conducted by Dr. Muck, one of the foremost Wagner interpreters of the day, and to be played by the finest orchestra in the land. These preludes and overtures to the Wagner operas miss some of their atmospheric effects when performed outside of the Opera House; but, just as Henry Irving and Ellen Terry gave one of their most effective performances of "The Merchant of Venice" at West Point in ordinary traveling dress, so these excerpts from the great music-dramas gave great pleasure yesterday, even without coryphees dancing to the music of the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," and without a stage spectacle to go with the titanic funeral music accompanying Siegfried to the pyre in "The Dusk of

Dr. Muck does not favor performing Wagner music outside the Opera House, but without such concessions as he made yesterday there would be scant opportunity to hear this wonderful music in Boston. This is what made the concert so rare a treat to the music-lover.

The program included the "Rienzi" and "Flying Dutchman" overtures, the prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde" and "Parsifal" preludes and the dirge from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."

BOSTON GLOBE-

NOVEMBER 23,

PENSION FUND AIDED.

Symphony Orchestra the Host at Symphony Hall.

Wagnerian Program Evokes Warm Applause From Large Audience.

Symphony Hall was comfortably filled yesterday afternoon at the concert given by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. It was a wholly enjoyable occasion, the audience being promptly, enthusiastically responsive, and the orchestra very evidently enjoyed the afternoon.

The program was uncompromisingly Wagnerian, nothing else being even looked at, but it was Wagner in his more merciful moods, when an occasional lapse into melody gave average human nature a chance; glimpses of Parnassus.

The list included: Overture to "Reinzi"; overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version); prelude to "Lohengrin"; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Siegfried funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude to "Parsifal."

Of the performance of the orchestra, conducted as it was by Dr Karl Muck, there is, of course, no occasion now to speak. The foregoing are undoubtedly among the things the players have "by heart" and the playing of which comes as nearly to being a real pleasure to the executants as any music can be.

Under these circumstances the, at times, let us say "profound" passages were given with an ease and swing that on a lower musical plane are given to a marching tune by regiments en route. It was an occasion where the ordinary music lover can revel, hearing something done with the highest artistry that is somewhat short of the full-fledged "Symphony" program and yet far above the effervescent "Pops" confections.

As has been said, the audience was most enthusiastic, the "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" and "Mastersingers" particularly evoking warm, delighted applause.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 23.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra's Program Made Up of Overtures and Preludes by Wagner.

The first of the two annual concerts for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, as several times in previous years, was made up of overtures and preludes from the music dramas of Wagner. It has come to be well understood in Boston that Dr. Muck, the conductor, holds that these works, if performed at all outside the opera house, should be reserved for some special occasion, such as is afforded by these semi-annual concerts.

The audience yesterday was large and warmly responsive. Many were present who hear the orchestra only at intervals, but far the greater number were regular Symphony attendants who availed themselves of the opportunity to hear the orchestra in a Wagner program. Although the Pension Institution, established in 1903, has a system of graded dues and initiation fees, these concerts are the chief source of income. The public profits from the stable relations which the fund helps the players to maintain with the orchestra, and the enthusiasm yesterday was both a tribute to the quality of the performance and a demonstration of loyalty to the musicians.

The numbers were arranged in chronological sequence, beginning with the overture to "Rienzi," and continuing with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," using the Paris version. This ended the first part, and the conductor called the entire orchestra to their feet to acknowledge the applause.

In the second part were the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," the Siegfried funeral music from the "Dusk of the Gods" (the third day of "The Ring of the Nibelungs"), and the prelude to "Parsifal."

ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 23

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAMME

SPLENDID PERFORMANCE AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Conductor and Orchestra Repeatedly Applauded, Yet Hall Was Not Filled.

Now that opera in Boston is suffering from financial debility and nervous prostration it becomes less a duty toward that fine body of musicians who form our Symphony Orchestra than a rare privilege, to attend the Pension Fund Concert (for some time it seemed as if we were to be denied all opportunity this season). It offers to many their only opportunity of hearing—outside the regular Symphony concerts—Wagner's orchestral music given in so complete and illuminating a manner as by our unsurpassed conductor and orchestra. Dr. Muck, in such a programme as yesterday's, at Symphony Hall, gave more orchestral numbers from Wagner's operas than he has given during any one of his Symphony seasons of twenty-four concerts. The great enthusiasm of the audience explains and confirms the choice of Wagner programmes for so large a percentage of the Pension Fund concerts!

Yesterday's music presented in a condensed form, we might say, the life history of Wagner as composer, and the quintessence of his music. The long drawn trumpet calls in "Rienzi," which opened the concert, not only serve as a summons to the attendant Romans, but call before our waiting imagination a vision of the superbly varied array of the characters to follow. The Flying Dutchman with his ominous phrases and Senta aglow with the love and exaltation of her sacrifice; Tannhauser craving the delirium of sensual joy in the Venusberg—saved by the saintly Elizabeth; Lohengrin enveloped in the mystic atmosphere of the grail; the pomp and ceremony, the good cheer, of the Meistersingers; the fated passion of Tristan and Isolde; the fearless Siegfried and noble Brunhilde, engulfed in the shadows of the Gotterdamerung; the spiritual yearning and love of Parsifal—these, and many more that are to take substance in the glowing sonorities of the orchestra, flash before the mind's eye: a marvelous array that lives clothed in musical tones of joy, grace, or grim tragedy; the creatures of the wonderful fecundity of Wagner's creative powers.

How gloriously our orchestra enters into the spirit of the work under the inspired guidance of Dr. Muck, master of rhythm and climax! Where else may we hear, rising and falling like the movement of the sea, the noble cantilena of the andante in "Rienzi"—that little considered work—given with such unity and purity of tone? What rare loveliness of the violins in the high positions of the Lohengrin Prelude; how the woodwind choir of the "Dusk of the Gods" colors the thought of the composer with tones of sadness or portent and the brass resounds strength without harshness in its sonorous "klang"; with what incomparable virtuosity the whole orchestra whirls through the frenzied intricacies of the "Bacchanale"!

So perfectly blended and balanced were these excellences that we could forget them in the rarer pleasure of absorption in the spiritual atmosphere of "Parsifal." It has been said that here Wagner shows signs of failing mentality—would that others might "fail" as gloriously and have such a conductor and orchestra as interpreter!

Nowhere in the world could Sunday's performance be surpassed, and yet—must we say it—the hall was not filled!

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 23,

THE ROUND OF CONCERTS

WAGNER AND DR. MUCK FOR THE PENSION FUND

The Overtures and Preludes from "Rienzi" Through "Parsifal" Played Again and in the Usual Eloquent Fashion by the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Lerner Reappears with Her Familiar Distinctions—The Pachmann-Like Quality in Her Touch and Tone—Week-End Episodes

TWICE a year the public of Greater Boston is asked to contribute to the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, and upon these occasions programmes designed to attract others than subscribers to the regular season must and should be offered. In spite of the statement by a New York critic several seasons ago that the Wagner "wave" had passed, Greater Boston is still ready once a year to hear not only a Wagner programme, but one particular Wagner programme—that in which all his preludes and two dramatic excerpts are assembled and presented in chronological order.

It is to be taken for granted that at the Pension Fund concerts the men of the orchestra outdo themselves; it is to be taken for granted that at Dr. Muck's hands the works of Wagner receive an incomparable interpretation. Many wish that Dr. Muck were willing to play Wagnerian excerpts at the regular concerts of the orchestra; in the face of his expressed opinion that operatic music h[illegible] no place in the concert hall, [illegible] that since Wagnerian excerpts are freely placed on concert programmes by other conductors, and since adequate operatic performances of Wagner's later works take place in Boston seldom or never, it would be better to hear excerpts carefully selected and artistically rendered by Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra than to hear random excerpts under less favorable circumstances. Be that as it may, surely the cleverly arranged programme which has become a familiar feature of the Pension Fund concerts sets forth Wagner and his music in a favorable and very special way.

An ordinary performance of the "Rienzi" overture gives an impression as flat and banal as that caused by much of the language in Bulwer-Lytton's romance on the same subject. Years ago Dr. Muck showed us that a slower tempo and more care as to details of expression and phrasing could transform an old bugbear of the concert-room into an artistic composition. Is this result wholly Wagner, or has Dr. Muck read into a childish work greater depth of thought than the composer's development was capable of when he wrote this overture? There is no question but that Wagner was deeply moved by the character and ideals of Rienzi, and that in his opera he sincerely sought adequately to express his feelings; therefore, despite some crudity of treatment, Wagner is entitled to the benefit of what ever doubt may arise concerning his power to compose "deep" music during that youthful period.

On the other hand, how immature in many details the "Rienzi" overture is, becomes evident with the opening bars of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Externally pleasing but under-expressive themes have given way to bare but characterizing motives, brilliant "treatment" in the conventional sense to still more brilliant tone-painting, noise to power, melodrama to drama. The growth from the earlier work to the later is enormous.

In the overture to "Tannhäuser" there is in part a return to pleasing but inexpressive music, in part to dramatically highly suggestive music. The popular "Pilgrims' Chorus" is deservedly liked for its lyrically attractive melody, and later, when this melody peters out, harmonic interest comes to the rescue; but what word does it suggest, what emotion does it arouse? Immediately afterward, the opening measures of the Venusberg are graphically suggestive, but the "hymn to Venus" can hardly be called significant music. Yesterday, fortunately, the return of the Pilgrims' Chorus, with its unhappy suggestion of a psalm-tune at a camp-meeting, was omitted to make way for the Bacchanale (Paris version).

Everyone knows that the Paris Bacchanale was composed by Wagner seventeen years after the completion of "Tannhäuser"; it dates from about the same period as "Tristan and Isolde." Upon the germ of sensual suggestiveness present in the early Venusberg music, Wagner built up a wild orgy of sustained horror and feverish restlessness. In the extraordinary close, the fury seems to have spent itself, and in the torpid silence which ensues the curious insistence of C-sharp followed by B over a descending bass recalls (intentionally or not—who knows?) the Pilgrims' Chorus like a faint memory of the world outside to the infatuated minstrel in the Venusberg.

An intermission divided the concert, perhaps designedly, into two periods: The first, that of the young Wagner, bursting with new ideas, unable to restrain himself from healthy demonstrativeness; the second, that of the mature composer, with still greater ideas his servants not his masters, no longer "showing off" because he no longer needed to do so.

London critics once called the "Lohengrin" prelude "meaningless noise"; nowadays it is played at "pop" concerts to gather a crowd when wine and beer prove insufficiently attractive. In sixty years a piece of music may thus change mightily; happy its composer if the change is for the better.

The "Meistersinger" prelude is in itself a great work; as the creation of a composer addicted to the gloomy philosophy of Schopenhauer it is a "give-away." The remark of a well known musician that "Meistersinger" is the only opera in good repute in which nobody gets killed, has point. This sunny and whole-hearted work, as expansive and radiant as the good Sachs himself, is almost our only modern example of sustained cheerfulness and manly optimism.

Many would have enjoyed hearing the "Love-Death" appended to the "Tristan" prelude, but the "Love-Death" demands the last word of a concert. Wagner's concert close for the "Tristan" prelude usually seems perfunctory, a sudden letting-down of the tension; in these days of free tonality, an audience ought not to be shocked at a conductor's ending this prelude with the pizzicato G's which lead into the first act. Yesterday, however, Dr. Muck succeeded in warming the concert close to its task in such a manner that the customary bathos was pleasantly absent.

To some of us, the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung," from the moment when Brünnhilde enters the stage, is the sublimest passage in all music, and the funeral music of Siegfried is its close second. Nowhere else is sombre grandeur so eloquently yet concisely expressed. Yesterday the tubas were somewhat lacking in tone; the players, who are regularly hornists, used horn mouthpieces, evidently fearing that tuba mouthpieces would hurt their embouchure for their usual duties. This unfortunate circumstance is nobody's fault, since special players of Wagner tubas are not to be had. In all other respects, the performance was exceptionally fine.

After Wagner the fighter, Wagner the amorist, Wagner the pessimist—and even Wagner the optimist—then Wagner the mystic. Who could have prophecised of the stormy youth or the passionate man that in his old age he would produce this serene, tender, dispassionate "Parsifal?" It was a fittingly peaceful ending to a tragic and intense life; the presence at the end of yesterday's programme of the "Parsifal" prelude well symbolized this last stage of its composer's career, and sent the thoughtful to their homes reflecting, as was fitting, upon this out of all of Wagner's many phases.

Mr. Gericke once gave an agreeable programme consisting wholly of Dvorak's works. Programmes wholly of Brahms, of Strauss and others have also given pleasure. With almost all of the men whom one can enjoy for a whole afternoon or evening one nevertheless soon becomes conscious of mannerisms, of the limitations which are the seamy side of individuality. Even with Beethoven a programme consisting wholly of his works, however delightful, however inspiring, over-emphasizes Beethoven's virtues at the expense of others which are missed. With Bach and Wagner alone is one perpetually conscious not merely of a great individual, but of a whole man; their personalities are complete, if they have limitations they do not bring them to our attention. In truth, they are great not because of, rather in spite of, their powerful individuality; they master us because they are universal.

P. G. C.

RECORD.
NOVEMBER 23

MAJ. HIGGINSON HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

An unusual but most effective tribute to Maj. Henry L. Higginson, in honor of his 80th birthday, was that at Symphony Hall.

Frederick P. Cabot had suggested that it would be an appropriate and graceful thing to have some recognition of the anniversary at the concerts founded by Maj. Higginson, and the idea was seconded with enthusiasm by their conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

No sooner had the hall filled and the doors closed for Saturday night's performance than Dr. Muck rapped for silence and Mr. Cabot stepped to the front. Addressing Mr. Higginson, who sits in the centre aisle, he said:—

"Mr. Higginson, in these concerts you have given to each of us a wonderful revelation of beauty and joy, and we, the listeners, join with the orchestra in this greeting and expression of love and gratitude."

Dr. Muck then signalled the drummer, and the orchestra expressed their feelings with the time honored German "tusch."

The whole audience immediately rose to their feet, applauding vociferously. Maj. Higginson contented himself with repeatedly bowing his acknowledgments.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 1 [illegible]

HAROLD BAUER, PIANIST, TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Famous Artist to be Soloist at Second Concert.

Harold Bauer, one of the greatest pianists in America this year, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. He is no stranger to Providence; in fact, the greater part of his artistic career in the last 12 years has been spent in America, where his superb playing has been thoroughly appreciated. He has won popular fame as an interpreter of the later classical writers and the early romanticists, particularly Beethoven and Schumann, and at this concert he is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G-major. The fourth and fifth concertos are imperishable monuments to the genius of the composer, and they demand the highest type of artist, such as Bauer is, to do them justice.

The Symphony will be Brahms's Second in D-major. The time has long since past when the public looked askance at Brahms as the most austere figure in modern music. His four symphonies are played continually to ever-increasing appreciation. In the Second, which Dr. Muck will play here there is no element of austerity. It is all sunshine and green fields; a succession of lovely melodies worked out with masterful art. Such a keen critic of music as Felix Weingartner says that he regards this as the best of Brahms's Symphonies. At any rate, the work is one of great beauty and has always brought great success to the Symphony Orchestra.

There will be only three numbers on the programme, the Symphony, the Concerto and finally the magnificent Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. Beethoven wrote a considerable amount of incidental music to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont." He was urged to this task largely by his desire to bring himself to the notice of the great poet, who was to Beethoven nothing less than a demigod. The songs are often sung and are the most successful that Beethoven wrote. The Overture is a superb masterpiece of the expression of the tragic in music. The programme in its proper order is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in D-major No. 2; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte in G-major, No. 4; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

THE principal musical event of this week will be the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, at which the soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist, who is well and favorably known here.

The following evening the Cathedral Glee Club will give a concert in Memorial Hall, and there will also be the usual church programmes and meetings of musical clubs to interest a large number.

The opening of the Steinert Course the past week was most successful, and a concert by Sousa's Band pleased the popular taste, so that while the musical season is not so crowded as in some years, it is fairly well under way and promises to hold a good deal of interest for several weeks to come.

It is regrettable that the veteran Arion Club, after so long and honorable a career, should be facing the alternative of suspension or disbandment, unless popular support is forthcoming. The city has too few of such assets as the Arion Club to be able to afford to lose such an organization.

* * *

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will be devoted to Beethoven and Brahms. The latter will be represented by his Symphony in D-major No. 2, and Beethoven by his Fourth Concerto in G-major and his "Egmont" Overture. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist.

Brahms's Symphony in D-major is familiar to patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, for it has been played here a number of times. It is, without a doubt, the most popular of the four symphonies that Brahms wrote and is now one of the most popular works in symphonic literature. The symphony was composed probably in the summer of 1877 and it had its first performance in December of that year. Fourteen months later it was played in Boston. It is a work which shows Brahms in one of his most congenial moods, making free use of melodic ideas, without the web of polyphony which characterized his first symphony. Brahms's first symphony has been called an epic, and this, his second, a fairy tale.

The Concerto in G-major by Beethoven, which Bauer will play, was written in 1806 and was performed by the composer at a private subscription concert in Vienna in March, 1807. The first public performance was the following year. By many it is preferred to the Concerto in E-flat major, so-called the "Emperor."

The final number, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," stands among the three or four really great overtures that the world possesses.

Harold Bauer

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

[6]

ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 23

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAMME

SPLENDID PERFORMANCE AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Conductor and Orchestra Repeatedly Applauded, Yet Hall Was Not Filled.

Now that opera in Boston is suffering from financial debility and nervous prostration it becomes less a duty toward that fine body of musicians who form our Symphony Orchestra, than a rare privilege, to attend the Pension Fund Concert (for some time it seemed as if we were to be denied all opportunity this season). It offers to many their only opportunity of hearing—outside the regular Symphony concerts—Wagner's orchestral music given in so complete and illuminating a manner as by our unsurpassed conductor and orchestra. Dr. Muck, in such a programme as yesterday's, at Symphony Hall, gave more orchestral numbers from Wagner's operas than he has given during any one of his Symphony seasons of twenty-four concerts. The great enthusiasm of the audience explains and confirms the choice of Wagner programmes for so large a percentage of the Pension Fund concerts!

Yesterday's music presented in a condensed form, we might say, the life history of Wagner as composer, and the quintessence of his music. The long drawn trumpet calls in "Rienzi," which opened the concert, not only serve as a summons to the attendant Romans, but call before our waiting imagination a vision of the superbly varied array of the characters to follow. The Flying Dutchman with his ominous phrases and Senta aglow with the love and exaltation of her sacrifice; Tannhauser craving the delirium of sensual joy in the Venusberg—saved by the saintly Elizabeth; Lohengrin enveloped in the mystic atmosphere of the grail; the pomp and ceremony, the good cheer, of the Meistersingers; the fated passion of Tristan and Isolde; the fearless Siegfried and noble Brunhilde, engulfed in the shadows of the Gotterdamerung; the spiritual yearning and love of Parsifal—these, and many more that are to take substance in the glowing sonorities of the orchestra, flash before the mind's eye: a marvelous array that lives clothed in musical tones of joy, grace, or grim tragedy; the creatures of the wonderful fecundity of Wagner's creative powers.

How gloriously our orchestra enters into the spirit of the work under the inspired guidance of Dr. Muck, master of rhythm and climax! Where else may we hear, rising and falling like the movement of the sea, the noble cantilena of the andante in "Rienzi"—that little considered work—given with such unity and purity of tone? What rare loveliness of the violins in the high positions of the Lohengrin Prelude; how the woodwind choir of the "Dusk of the Gods" colors the thought of the composer with tones of sadness or portent and the brass resounds strength without harshness in its sonorous "klang"; with what incomparable virtuosity the whole orchestra whirls through the frenzied intricacies of the "Bacchanale"!

So perfectly blended and balanced were these excellences that we could forget them in the rarer pleasure of absorption in the spiritual atmosphere of "Parsifal." It has been said that here Wagner shows signs of failing mentality—would that others might "fail" as gloriously and have such a conductor and orchestra as interpreter!

Nowhere in the world could Sunday's performance be surpassed, and yet—must we say it—the hall was not filled!

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 23,

THE ROUND OF CONCERTS

WAGNER AND DR. MUCK FOR THE PENSION FUND

The Overtures and Preludes from "Rienzi" Through "Parsifal" Played Again and in the Usual Eloquent Fashion by the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Lerner Reappears with Her Familiar Distinctions—The Pachmann-Like Quality in Her Touch and Tone—Week-End Episodes

TWICE a year the public of Greater Boston is asked to contribute to the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, and upon these occasions programmes designed to attract others than subscribers to the regular season must and should be offered. In spite of the statement by a New York critic several seasons ago that the Wagner "wave" had passed, Greater Boston is still ready once a year to hear not only a Wagner programme, but one particular Wagner programme—that in which all his preludes and two dramatic excerpts are assembled and presented in chronological order.

It is to be taken for granted that at the Pension Fund concerts the men of the orchestra outdo themselves; it is to be taken for granted that at Dr. Muck's hands the works of Wagner receive an incomparable interpretation. Many wish that Dr. Muck were willing to play Wagnerian excerpts at the regular concerts of the orchestra; in the face of his expressed opinion that operatic music has no place in the concert hall, [illegible] that, since Wagnerian excerpts are freely placed on concert programmes by other conductors, and since adequate operatic performances of Wagner's later works take place in Boston seldom or never, it would be better to hear excerpts carefully selected and artistically rendered by Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra than to hear random excerpts under less favorable circumstances. Be that as it may, surely the cleverly arranged programme which has become a familiar feature of the Pension Fund concerts sets forth Wagner and his music in a favorable and very special way.

An ordinary performance of the "Rienzi" overture gives an impression as flat and banal as that caused by much of the language in Bulwer-Lytton's romance on the same subject. Years ago Dr. Muck showed us that a slower tempo and more care as to details of expression and phrasing could transform an old bugbear of the concert-room into an artistic composition. Is this result wholly Wagner, or has Dr. Muck read into a childish work greater depth of thought than the composer's development was capable of when he wrote this overture? There is no question but that Wagner was deeply moved by the character and ideals of Rienzi, and that in his opera he sincerely sought adequately to express his feelings; therefore, despite some crudity of treatment, Wagner is entitled to the benefit of what ever doubt may arise concerning his power to compose "deep" music during that youthful period.

On the other hand, how immature in many details the "Rienzi" overture is, becomes evident with the opening bars of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Externally pleasing but under-expressive themes have given way to bare but characterizing motives, brilliant "treatment" in the conventional sense to still more brilliant tone-painting, noise to power, melodrama to drama. The growth from the earlier work to the later is enormous.

In the overture to "Tannhäuser" there is in part a return to pleasing but inexpressive music, in part to dramatically highly suggestive music. The popular "Pilgrims' Chorus" is deservedly liked for its lyrically attractive melody, and later, when this melody peters out, harmonic interest comes to the rescue; but what word does it suggest, what emotion does it arouse? Immediately afterward, the opening measures of the Venusberg are graphically suggestive, but the "hymn to Venus" can hardly be called significant music. Yesterday, fortunately, the return of the Pilgrims' Chorus, with its unhappy suggestion of a psalm-tune at a camp-meeting, was omitted to make way for the Bacchanale (Paris version).

Everyone knows that the Paris Bacchanale was composed by Wagner seventeen years after the completion of "Tannhäuser"; it dates from about the same period as "Tristan and Isolde." Upon the germ of sensual suggestiveness present in the early Venusberg music, Wagner built up a wild orgy of sustained horror and feverish restlessness. In the extraordinary close, the fury seems to have spent itself, and in the torpid silence which ensues the curious insistence of C-sharp followed by B over a descending bass recalls (intentionally or not—who knows?) the Pilgrims' Chorus like a faint memory of the world outside to the infatuated minstrel in the Venusberg.

An intermission divided the concert, perhaps designedly, into two periods: The first, that of the young Wagner, bursting with new ideas, unable to restrain himself from healthy demonstrativeness; the second, that of the mature composer, with still greater ideas his servants not his masters, no longer "showing off" because he no longer needed to do so.

London critics once called the "Lohengrin" prelude "meaningless noise"; nowadays it is played at "pop" concerts to gather a crowd when wine and beer prove insufficiently attractive. In sixty years a piece of music may thus change mightily; happy its composer if the change is for the better.

The "Meistersinger" prelude is in itself a great work; as the creation of a composer addicted to the gloomy philosophy of Schopenhauer it is a "give-away." The remark of a well known musician that "Meistersinger" is the only opera in good repute in which nobody gets killed, has point. This sunny and whole-hearted work, as expansive and radiant as the good Sachs himself, is almost our only modern example of sustained cheerfulness and manly optimism.

Many would have enjoyed hearing the "Love-Death" appended to the "Tristan" prelude, but the "Love-Death" demands the last word of a concert. Wagner's concert close for the "Tristan" prelude usually seems perfunctory, a sudden letting-down of the tension; in these days of free tonality, an audience ought not to be shocked at a conductor's ending this prelude with the pizzicato G's which lead into the first act. Yesterday, however, Dr. Muck succeeded in warming the concert close to its task in such a manner that the customary bathos was pleasantly absent.

To some of us, the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung," from the moment when Brünnhilde enters the stage, is the sublimest passage in all music, and the funeral music of Siegfried is its close second. Nowhere else is sombre grandeur so eloquently yet concisely expressed. Yesterday the tubas were somewhat lacking in tone; the players, who are regularly hornists, used horn mouthpieces, evidently fearing that tuba mouthpieces would hurt their embouchure for their usual duties. This unfortunate circumstance is nobody's fault, since special players of Wagner tubas are not to be had. In all other respects, the performance was exceptionally fine.

After Wagner the fighter, Wagner the amorist, Wagner the pessimist—and even Wagner the optimist—then Wagner the mystic. Who could have prophecised of the stormy youth or the passionate man that in his old age he would produce this serene, tender, dispassionate "Parsifal?" It was a fittingly peaceful ending to a tragic and intense life; the presence at the end of yesterday's programme of the "Parsifal" prelude well symbolized this last stage of its composer's career, and sent the thoughtful to their homes reflecting, as was fitting, upon this out of all of Wagner's many phases.

Mr. Gericke once gave an agreeable programme consisting wholly of Dvorak's works. Programmes wholly of Brahms, of Strauss and others have also given pleasure. With almost all of the men whom one can enjoy for a whole afternoon or evening one nevertheless soon becomes conscious of mannerisms, of the limitations which are the seamy side of individuality. Even with Beethoven a programme consisting wholly of his works, however delightful, however inspiring, over-emphasizes Beethoven's virtues at the expense of others which are missed. With Bach and Wagner alone is one perpetually conscious not merely of a great individual, but of a whole man; their personalities are complete, if they have limitations they do not bring them to our attention. In truth, they are great not because of, rather in spite of, their powerful individuality; they master us because they are universal.

P. G. C.

RECORD.
NOVEMBER 23

MAJ. HIGGINSON HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

An unusual but most effective tribute to Maj. Henry L. Higginson, in honor of his 80th birthday, was that at Symphony Hall.

Frederick P. Cabot had suggested that it would be an appropriate and graceful thing to have some recognition of the anniversary at the concerts founded by Maj. Higginson, and the idea was seconded with enthusiasm by their conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

No sooner had the hall filled and the doors closed for Saturday night's performance than Dr. Muck rapped for silence and Mr. Cabot stepped to the front. Addressing Mr. Higginson, who sits in the centre aisle, he said:—

"Mr. Higginson, in these concerts you have given to each of us a wonderful revelation of beauty and joy, and we, the listeners, join with the orchestra in this greeting and expression of love and gratitude."

Dr. Muck then signalled the drummer, and the orchestra expressed their feelings with the time honored German "tusch."

The whole audience immediately rose to their feet, applauding vociferously. Maj. Higginson contented himself with repeatedly bowing his acknowledgments.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

HAROLD BAUER, PIANIST, TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Famous Artist to be Soloist at Second Concert.

Harold Bauer, one of the greatest pianists in America this year, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. He is no stranger to Providence: in fact, the greater part of his artistic career in the last 12 years has been spent in America, where his superb playing has been thoroughly appreciated. He has won popular fame as an interpreter of the later classical writers and the early romanticists, particularly Beethoven and Schumann, and at this concert he is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G-major. The fourth and fifth concertos are imperishable monuments to the genius of the composer, and they demand the highest type of artist, such as Bauer is, to do them justice.

The Symphony will be Brahms's Second in D-major. The time has long since past when the public looked askance at Brahms as the most austere figure in modern music. His four symphonies are played continually to ever-increasing appreciation. In the Second, which Dr. Muck will play here there is no element of austerity. It is all sunshine and green fields; a succession of lovely melodies worked out with masterful art. Such a keen critic of music as Felix Weingartner says that he regards this as the best of Brahms's Symphonies. At any rate, the work is one of great beauty and has always brought great success to the Symphony Orchestra.

There will be only three numbers on the programme, the Symphony, the Concerto and finally the magnificent Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. Beethoven wrote a considerable amount of incidental music to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont." He was urged to this task largely by his desire to bring himself to the notice of the great poet, who was to Beethoven nothing less than a demigod. The songs are often sung and are the most successful that Beethoven wrote. The Overture is a superb masterpiece of the expression of the tragic in music. The programme in its proper order is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in D-major No. 2; Beethoven, Concerto for piano forte in G-major, No. 4; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont,"

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

THE principal musical event of this week will be the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, at which the soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist, who is well and favorably known here.

The following evening the Cathedral Glee Club will give a concert in Memorial Hall, and there will also be the usual church programmes and meetings of musical clubs to interest a large number.

The opening of the Steinert Course the past week was most successful, and a concert by Sousa's Band pleased the popular taste, so that while the musical season is not so crowded as in some years, it is fairly well under way and promises to hold a good deal of interest for several weeks to come.

It is regrettable that the veteran Arion Club, after so long and honorable a career, should be facing the alternative of suspension or disbandment, unless popular support is forthcoming. The city has too few of such assets as the Arion Club to be able to afford to lose such an organization.

* * *

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will be devoted to Beethoven and Brahms. The latter will be represented by his Symphony in D-major No. 2, and Beethoven by his Fourth Concerto in G-major and his "Egmont" Overture. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist.

Brahms's Symphony in D-major is familiar to patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, for it has been played here a number of times. It is, without a doubt, the most popular of the four symphonies that Brahms wrote and is now one of the most popular works in symphonic literature. The symphony was composed probably in the summer of 1877 and it had its first performance in December of that year. Fourteen months later it was played in Boston. It is a work which shows Brahms in one of his most congenial moods, making free use of melodic ideas, without the web of polyphony which characterized his first symphony. Brahms's first symphony has been called an epic, and this, his second, a fairy tale.

The Concerto in G-major by Beethoven, which Bauer will play, was written in 1806 and was performed by the composer at a private subscription concert in Vienna in March, 1807. The first public performance was the following year. By many it is preferred to the Concerto in E-flat major, so-called the "Emperor."

The final number, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," stands among the three or four really great overtures that the world possesses.

Harold Bauer

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date
Establi

Knitting to Music.

All industrious old ladies who have become addicted to one of the traditional pastimes of later life will probably have a keen desire to emigrate to Boston, for it is said that in recent days in that centre of culture and industry "a number of women have been noticed knitting during the musical performances in Symphony Hall and elsewhere." Perhaps nowhere but in Boston would this unique combination be possible. Let the habit once become popular and it is easy to imagine the women of Boston putting on their galoshes and starting for the concert with their knitting, with keen premonitory thrills of doubled pleasure.

It is said that the musical-knitting practice has been encouraged by zealous philanthropists who have urged that not a moment be wasted which might be spent in doing work for the war sufferers of Europe. This is all praiseworthy, no doubt, but there is another side to the question. Real music lovers have their rights, and these rights are already sufficiently violated by various unavoidable conditions and the inconsiderate behavior of selfish individuals. Should the annoyances be increased by scattering indefatigable knitters throughout every audience? Forsooth, there is a place for knitting, and knitting should be kept in its place, which is distinctly not a concert hall.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
NOV 15 1914
Date

Chief among the musical events of the coming week will be the second in the course of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Harold Bauer, by all odds the greatest pianist in America this year, will be the soloist. Bauer is no stranger to Providence; in fact, the greater part of his artistic career in the last 12 years has been spent in America, where his superb playing has been thoroughly appreciated. His modesty of demeanor and the lack of all the sensational elements in his playing and actions have won for him a huge body of warm friends and admirers. Bauer's playing is characterized by continence and fine taste. He has won popular fame as an interpreter of the laten classical writers and the early romanticists, particularly Beethoven and Schumann, and at this concert he is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G-major. The Fourth and Fifth Concertos are imperishable monuments to the genius of the composer and they demand the highest type of artist, such as Bauer is, to do them justice.

The Symphony will be Brahms's Second in D-major. The time has long since past when the public looked askance at Brahms as the most austere figure in modern music. His four symphonies are played continually to ever increasing appreciation. Certainly in the Second, which Dr. Muck will play here, there is no element of austerity. It is all sunshine and green fields; a succession of lovely melodies worked out with masterful art. Such a keen critic of music as Felix Weingartner says that he regards this as the best of Brahms's symphonies and much better than any of Schumann's symphonies. At any rate, the work is one of great beauty and has always brought great success to the Symphony Orchestra. A week ago in New York it was played and few soloists receive such applause as the orchestra had from its New York audience when it had finished playing it.

There will be only three numbers on the programme, the Symphony, the Concerto and finally the magnificent overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven. Beethoven wrote a considerable amount of incidental music to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont." He was urged to this task largely by his desire to bring himself to the notice of the great poet who was to Beethoven nothing less than a demigod. The songs are often sung and are among the most successful that Beethoven wrote. The overture is a superb masterpiece of the expression of the tragic in music. The programme in its proper orden is as follows:

Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in G-major, No. 4, Beethoven; overture to "Egmont," Beethoven.

From JOURNAL
Address: Provide
Date

BAUER'S PLAY
FEATURES CO

Symphony Programme Devoted to Well-Known Masterpieces.

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Brahms and Beethoven Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with Famous Pianist as Assisting Feature of Finely Rendered Offerings. Many Encores Demanded.

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84..... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgmen to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long ap plied to Providence audiences needs to b removed from the musical part of th community, for it is almost too generou with its appreciation of musical star One could wish that at least the las notes of a composition might be per mitted to die away before their beauty i destroyed by the clattering resonance ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciatio was well-deserved and one music-love voiced the general feeling, when she re marked that it seemed as if "the pian had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has bee heard here many times and oft, complete the programme with brilliancy, an brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT SATISFACTORY

Boston Orchestra Rendered Familiar Slections Admirably and Bauer, the Pianist, Better Than Ever.

Another large audience filled Infantry Hall last evening for the second concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was entirely instrumental, the soloist being Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist. There were only three numbers and each was of considerable length and yet the arangement was far from tiresome and there was no lack of variety. There is, of course, a certain virtue in a programme that is diversified by vocal music as a change from the purely instrumental, and yet such an arrangement as that of last evening is very enjoyable because of the excellence of every number and the wide difference in the character of the selections.

Some criticism might be made that Dr. Muck repeats his selections too often, but there are works that will bear almost infinite repetition and besides there are always new hearers every year and these should be given the opportunity to enjoy these masterpieces of great composers which old timers may have had often. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op 73.. .... Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58..................Beethoven
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo; Vivace.
Overture to Gotehe's "Egmont," Op. 84 ....Beethoven

There was a time when Brahms was considered the most austere among his fellows, but that time has long since passed and it is recognized now that that opinion was based upon false premises. This second symphony especially shows how wrong was that belief for this music is full of beauty and awakens thoughts of the sunny and bright things of life. It is full of melody that lingers in the ears and charms the sensibilities. It is by no means new to symphony patrons in this city for it has been played here several times and always with full appreciation and marked enjoyment. It ranks high among the symphonies of musical literature and is to many the most enjoyable of the four that he wrote. It has been called a fairy tale and if it is not quite light and airy enough to merit that term it is certainly full of beauty and wins enthusiastic recognition whenever it is played.

The music is of a quiet kind, meditative at times and at others joyous in its nature, but throughout of a refreshing rather than an exciting quality. There is a graceful movement and even the finale, though more lively, is not as fiery and stormy as is the case in most instrumental selections. The themes are smooth and melodious and the development natural and graceful. It was rendered with entire sympathy and complete conception of the motive of the composer.

The other selection by the orchestra was the overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. This ranks among the best pieces of tragic music. It stands easily among the greatest overtures in the history of music and it was rendered with masterly skill and delicacy of interpretation by the orchestra. It formed an appropriate close to an evening of pleasure.

Dr. Muck showed once more his thorough control over his musicians, conducting in a masterly manner and bringing out all the values of his orchestra.

The soloist, Harold Bauer, has often been heard in this city and is always welcome. His admirers are legion and he has won them not alone by his skill that passes unchallenged, but also by the absence of anything akin to sensationalism in his manner and his method of playing. He ever exhibits the most excellent taste and freedom from mannerisms in his playing while his interpretation of a wide variety of musical selections is beyond criticism.

His number last night, the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, is a selection which only the best of musical artists would attempt to play but which was rendered with ease and characteristic expression by Bauer. He received the applause he deserved at the conclusion of his work and responded with becoming modesty but marked evidence of pleasure at the enthusiastic approval of the audience.

The third concert will be given Dec. 29 when Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
D

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME

Harold Bauer's Playing Features Entertainment.—Brahms and Beethoven Are Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84..... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgment to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long applied to Providence audiences needs to be removed from the musical part of the community, for it is almost too generous with its appreciation of musical stars. One could wish that at least the last notes of a composition might be permitted to die away before their beauty is destroyed by the clattering resonance of ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciation was well-deserved and one music-lover voiced the general feeling, when she remarked that it seemed as if "the piano had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has been heard here many times and oft, completed the programme with brilliancy, and brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From BULLETIN

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Knitting to Music.

All industrious old ladies who have become addicted to one of the traditional pastimes of later life will probably have a keen desire to emigrate to Boston, for it is said that in recent days in that centre of culture and industry "a number of women have been noticed knitting during the musical performances in Symphony Hall and elsewhere." Perhaps nowhere but in Boston would this unique combination be possible. Let the habit once become popular and it is easy to imagine the women of Boston putting on their galoshes and starting for the concert with their knitting, with keen premonitory thrills of doubled pleasure.

It is said that the musical-knitting practice has been encouraged by zealous philanthropists who have urged that not a moment be wasted which might be spent in doing work for the war sufferers of Europe. This is all praiseworthy, no doubt, but there is another side to the question. Real music lovers have their rights, and these rights are already sufficiently violated by various unavoidable conditions and the inconsiderate behavior of selfish individuals. Should the annoyances be increased by scattering indefatigable knitters throughout every audience? Forsooth, there is a place for knitting, and knitting should be kept in its place, which is distinctly not a concert hall.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Chief among the musical events of the coming week will be the second in the course of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Harold Bauer, by all odds the greatest pianist in America this year, will be the soloist. Bauer is no stranger to Providence; in fact, the greater part of his artistic career in the last 12 years has been spent in America, where his superb playing has been thoroughly appreciated. His modesty of demeanor and the lack of all the sensational elements in his playing and actions have won for him a huge body of warm friends and admirers. Bauer's playing is characterized by continence and fine taste. He s won popular fame as an interpreter of the laten classical writers and the early romanticists, particularly Beethoven and Schumann, and at this concert he is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G-major. The Fourth and Fifth Concertos are imperishable monuments to the genius of the composer and they demand the highest type of artist, such as Bauer is, to do them justice.

The Symphony will be Brahms's Second in D-major. The time has long since past when the public looked askance at Brahms as the most austere figure in modern music. His four symphonies are played continually to ever increasing appreciation. Certainly in the Second, which Dr. Muck will play here, there is no element of austerity. It is all sunshine and green fields; a succession of lovely melodies worked out with masterful art. Such a keen critic of music as Felix Weingartner says that he regards this as the best of Brahms's symphonies and much better than any of Schumann's symphonies. At any rate, the work is one of great beauty and has always brought great success to the Symphony Orchestra. A week ago in New York it was played and few soloists receive such applause as the orchestra had from its New York audience when it had finished playing it.

There will be only three numbers on the programme, the Symphony, the Concerto and finally the magnificent overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven. Beethoven wrote a considerable amount of incidental music to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont." He was urged to this task largely by his desire to bring himself to the notice of the great poet who was to Beethoven nothing less than a demigod. The songs are often sung and are among the most successful that Beethoven wrote. The overture is a superb masterpiece of the expression of the tragic in music. The programme in its proper orden is as follows:

Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in G-major, No. 4, Beethoven; overture to "Egmont," Beethoven.

From JOURNAL

Address: Provide

Date

BAUER'S PLAY FEATURES CO

Symphony Programme Devoted to Well-Known Masterpieces.

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Brahms and Beethoven Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with Famous Pianist as Assisting Feature of Finely Rendered Offerings. Many Encores Demanded.

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84...... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgmen to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long ap plied to Providence audiences needs to b removed from the musical part of th community, for it is almost too generou with its appreciation of musical star One could wish that at least the las notes of a composition might be per mitted to die away before their beauty i destroyed by the clattering resonance o ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciatio was well-deserved and one music-love voiced the general feeling, when she re marked that it seemed as if "the pian had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has bee heard here many times and oft, complete the programme with brilliancy, an brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

[62]

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Established

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT SATISFACTORY

Boston Orchestra Rendered Familiar Slections Admirably and Bauer, the Pianist, Better Than Ever.

Another large audience filled Infantry Hall last evening for the second concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was entirely instrumental, the soloist being Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist. There were only three numbers and each was of considerable length and yet the arangement was far from tiresome and there was no lack of variety. There is, of course, a certain virtue in a programme that is diversified by vocal music as a change from the purely instrumental, and yet such an arrangement as that of last evening is very enjoyable because of the excellence of every number and the wide difference in the character of the selections.

Some criticism might be made that Dr. Muck repeats his selections too often, but there are works that will bear almost infinite repetition and besides there are always new hearers every year and these should be given the opportunity to enjoy these masterpieces of great composers which old timers may have had often. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op 73.. ....Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58...................Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo; Vivace.
Overture to Gotehe's "Egmont," Op. 84 ....Beethoven

There was a time when Brahms was considered the most austere among his fellows, but that time has long since passed and it is recognized now that that opinion was based upon false premises. This second symphony especially shows how wrong was that belief for this music is full of beauty and awakens thoughts of the sunny and bright things of life. It is full of melody that lingers in the ears and charms the sensibilities. It is by no means new to symphony patrons in this city for it has been played here several times and always with full appreciation and marked enjoyment. It ranks high among the symphonies of musical literature and is to many the most enjoyable of the four that he wrote. It has been called a fairy tale and if it is not quite light and airy enough to merit that term it is certainly full of beauty and wins enthusiastic recognition whenever it is played.

The music is of a quiet kind, meditative at times and at others joyous in its nature, but throughout of a refreshing rather than an exciting quality. There is a graceful movement and even the finale, though more lively, is not as fiery and stormy as is the case in most instrumental selections. The themes are smooth and melodious and the development natural and graceful. It was rendered with entire sympathy and complete conception of the motive of the composer.

The other selection by the orchestra was the overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. This ranks among the best pieces of tragic music. It stands easily among the greatest overtures in the history of music and it was rendered with masterly skill and delicacy of interpretation by the orchestra. It formed an appropriate close to an evening of pleasure.

Dr. Muck showed once more his thorough control over his musicians, conducting in a masterly manner and bringing out all the values of his orchestra.

The soloist, Harold Bauer, has often been heard in this city and is always welcome. His admirers are legion and he has won them not alone by his skill that passes unchallenged, but also by the absence of anything akin to sensationalism in his manner and his method of playing. He ever exhibits the most excellent taste and freedom from mannerisms in his playing while his interpretation of a wide variety of musical selections is beyond criticism.

His number last night, the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, is a selection which only the best of musical artists would attempt to play but which was rendered with ease and characteristic expression by Bauer. He received the applause he deserved at the conclusion of his work and responded with becoming modesty but marked evidence of pleasure at the enthusiastic approval of the audience.

The third concert will be given Dec. 29 when Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From BULLETIN

Address Providence, R. I.

D

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME

Harold Bauer's Playing Features Entertainment.—Brahms and Beethoven Are Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with Eminent Pi

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Baner, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84...... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgment to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long applied to Providence audiences needs to be removed from the musical part of the community, for it is almost too generous with its appreciation of musical stars. One could wish that at least the last notes of a composition might be permitted to die away before their beauty is destroyed by the clattering resonance of ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciation was well-deserved and one music-lover voiced the general feeling, when she remarked that it seemed as if "the piano had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has been heard here many times and oft, completed the programme with brilliancy, and brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

7

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Knitting to Music.

All industrious old ladies who have become addicted to one of the traditional pastimes of later life will probably have a keen desire to emigrate to Boston, for it is said that in recent days in that centre of culture and industry "a number of women have been noticed knitting during the musical performances in Symphony Hall and elsewhere." Perhaps nowhere but in Boston would this unique combination be possible. Let the habit once become popular and it is easy to imagine the women of Boston putting on their galoshes and starting for the concert with their knitting, with keen premonitory thrills of doubled pleasure.

It is said that the musical-knitting practice has been encouraged by zealous philanthropists who have urged that not a moment be wasted which might be spent in doing work for the war sufferers of Europe. This is all praiseworthy, no doubt, but there is another side to the question. Real music lovers have their rights, and these rights are already sufficiently violated by various unavoidable conditions and the inconsiderate behavior of selfish individuals. Should the annoyances be increased by scattering indefatigable knitters throughout every audience? Forsooth, there is a place for knitting, and knitting should be kept in its place, which is distinctly not a concert hall.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
V 15 191
Date

Chief among the musical even coming week will be con course of six conc Symphony Orchest

Harold Bauer, by pianist in America thi soloist. Bauer is no s dence; in fact, the gre artistic career in the last been spent in America, whe superb playing has been thoroughly appreciated. His modesty of demeanor and the lack of all the sensational elements in his playing and actions have won for him a huge body of warm friends and admirers. Bauer's playing is characterized by continence and fine taste. He s won popular fame as an interpreter of the laten classical writers and the early romanticists, particularly Beethoven and Schumann, and at this concert he is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G-major. The Fourth and Fifth Concertos are imperishable monuments to the genius of the composer and they demand the highest type of artist, such as Bauer is, to do them justice.

The Symphony will be Brahms's Second in D-major. The time has long since past when the public looked askance at Brahms as the most austere figure in modern music. His four symphonies are played continually to ever increasing appreciation. Certainly in the Second, which Dr. Muck will play here, there is no element of austenity. It is all sunshine and green fields; a succession of lovely melodies worked out with masterful art. Such a keen critic of music as Felix Weingartner says that he regards this as the best of Brahms's symphonies and much better than any of Schumann's symphonies. At any rate, the work is one of great beauty and has always brought great success to the Symphony Orchestra. A week ago in New York it was played and few soloists receive such applause as the orchestra had from its New York audience when it had finished playing it.

There will be only three numbers on the programme, the Symphony, the Concerto and finally the magnificent overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven. Beethoven wrote a considerable amount of incidental music to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont." He was urged to this task largely by his desire to bring himself to the notice of the great poet who was to Beethoven nothing less than a demigod. The songs are often sung and are among the most successful that Beethoven wrote. The overture is a superb masterpiece of the expression of the tragic in music. The programme in its proper orden is as follows:

Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in G-major, No. 4, Beethoven; overture to "Egmont," Beethoven.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

BAUER'S PLAYING FEATURES CONCERT

Symphony Programme Devoted to Well-Known Masterpieces.

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Brahms and Beethoven Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with Famous Pianist as Assisting Featu e of Finely Rendered Offerings. Many Encores Demanded.

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84...... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgment to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long applied to Providence audiences needs to be removed from the musical part of the community, for it is almost too generous with its appreciation of musical stars. One could wish that at least the last notes of a composition might be permitted to die away before their beauty is destroyed by the clattering resonance of ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciation was well-deserved and one music-lover voiced the general feeling, when she remarked that it seemed as if "the piano had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has been heard here many times and oft, completed the programme with brilliancy, and brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

---

ections
Bauer, the Pian-etter Than Ever.

large audience filled Infantry last evening for the second con of the present season by the Bosto. Symphony Orchestra. The programme was entirely instrumental, the soloist being Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist. There were only three numbers and each was of considerable length and yet the arangement was far from tiresome and there was no lack of variety. There is, of course, a certain virtue in a programme that is diversified by vocal music as a change from the purely instrumental, and yet such an arrangement as that of last evening is very enjoyable because of the excellence of every number and the wide difference in the character of the selections.

Some criticism might be made that Dr. Muck repeats his selections too often, but there are works that will bear almost infinite repetition and besides there are always new hearers every year and these should be given the opportunity to enjoy these masterpieces of great composers which old timers may have had often. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op 73.. .... Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58..................Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo; Vivace.
Overture to Gotehe's "Egmont," Op. 84 ....Beethoven

There was a time when Brahms was considered the most austere among his fellows, but that time has long since passed and it is recognized now that that opinion was based upon false premises. This second symphony especially shows how wrong was that belief for this music is full of beauty and awakens thoughts of the sunny and bright things of life. It is full of melody that lingers in the ears and charms the sensibilities. It is by no means new to symphony patrons in this city for it has been played here several times and always with full appreciation and marked enjoyment. It ranks high among the symphonies of musical literature and is to many the most enjoyable of the four that he wrote. It has been called a fairy tale and if it is not quite light and airy enough to merit that term it is certainly full of beauty and wins enthusiastic recognition whenever it is played.

The music is of a quiet kind, meditative at times and at others joyous in its nature, but throughout of a refreshing rather than an exciting quality. There is a graceful movement and even the finale, though more lively, is not as fiery and stormy as is the case in most instrumental selections. The themes are smooth and melodious and the development natural and graceful. It was rendered with entire sympathy and complete conception of the motive of the composer.

The other selection by the orchestra was the overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. This ranks among the best pieces of tragic music. It stands easily among the greatest overtures in the history of music and it was rendered with masterly skill and delicacy of interpretation by the orchestra. It formed an appropriate close to an evening of pleasure.

Dr. Muck showed once more his thorough control over his musicians, conducting in a masterly manner and bringing out all the values of his orchestra.

The soloist, Harold Bauer, has often been heard in this city and is always welcome. His admirers are legion and he has won them not alone by his skill that passes unchallenged, but also by the absence of anything akin to sensationalism in his manner and his method of playing. He ever exhibits the most excellent taste and freedom from mannerisms in his playing while his interpretation of a wide variety of musical selections is beyond criticism.

His number last night, the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, is a selection which only the best of musical artists would attempt to play but which was rendered with ease and characteristic expression by Bauer. He received the applause he deserved at the conclusion of his work and responded with becoming modesty but marked evidence of pleasure at the enthusiastic approval of the audience.

The third concert will be given Dec. 29 when Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist.

---

per Cutting Bureau

BULLETIN
Providence, R. I.

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME

Harold Bauer's Playing Features Entertainment.—Brahms and Beethoven Are Represented in Two Orchestral Numbers with

With a programme of well-known masterpieces and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Karl Muck, gave its second concert the season last evening in Infantry Hall.

It is vastly to the credit of any orchestra to be able to infuse such interest into a programme, the numbers of which have been played again and again during its career, that the audience in leaving the hall should be enthusiastic over the concert, and speak with pleasure of the beauty of the programme.

Such was the case last evening, so it is fair to say that the concert was a success. And yet the Symphony Orchestra has shown a curious tendency to travel in circles, and Brahms and Beethoven have been repeatedly represented here by the two orchestral numbers on last evening's programme.

And there has also been a curious likeness in the programmes in which the second symphony by Brahms has figured. Both in 1910 and in 1913, the last two times it has been played here, it has been accompanied by the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" (which, by the way, was played at the last concert here) and a pianist has been the assisting soloist; Ernest Hutcheson at the earlier and Norman Wilks at the later concert. Both those concerts were somewhat overlong by the addition of a prelude, eliminated by the management wisely in the programme last evening, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73......Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto in G-major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ....Beethoven
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Rondo: Vivace.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84...... ....Beethoven

The second symphony by Brahms seems bound to live indefinitely, since it grows in favor with each hearing, and in the beauty of its themes, worked out in strength of contrast to an artistic unity, is one of the most interesting masterpieces of the composer.

It is doubtful if it has often received a finer interpretation than was given last evening from the opening notes of the wind instruments to the vigor and spirit of the brilliant close.

The marked contrast of the four movements; the pastoral repose of the first allegro; the mystery of the adagio; the elfin beauty and vivacity of the allegretto and the reminiscent beauty of the final allegro, were handled with a skill that made one feel that Brahms builded better than his contemporaries realized when he finished the symphony in 1877.

Separated from the symphony by a short intermission came the concerto in G-major for piano, played by Harold Bauer, who has before this won the favor of Providence audiences.

Never, however, has he played with greater insight or more rhythmical beauty than he displayed in his presentation of the concerto that is as full of fascination as when it was first given to the public over a century ago.

Since Mr. Bauer's last appearance here, he has gained in maturity and control, and lost nothing in technical brilliancy. The rippling delicacy of his touch where delicacy was required, the clarity of his chords and the beauty of his tone-color, together with his sympathy with the orchestra made his performance especially enjoyable, and the applause that marked the ending of the first movement, was as nothing compared to the outburst that greeted him before the last note died away. Again and again he was forced to return and bow his acknowledgment to the plaudits of the audience.

The stigma of coldness for so long applied to Providence audiences needs to be removed from the musical part of the community, for it is almost too generous with its appreciation of musical stars. One could wish that at least the last notes of a composition might be permitted to die away before their beauty is destroyed by the clattering resonance of ill-timed approbation.

Last night, however, the appreciation was well-deserved and one music-lover voiced the general feeling, when she remarked that it seemed as if "the piano had a special beauty of tone."

The Egmont overture, which has been heard here many times and oft, completed the programme with brilliancy, and brought the concert to a timely close.

At the third concert on Dec. 29, Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist.

A. W. C.

[62]

STORY OF MAJOR HIGGINS

Few Know Details of Famous Bostonian's Gallant Part in Desperate

Tribute paid by General Stephen M. Weld to Major Henry Lee Higginson on the occasion of the recent birthday dinner given in the latter's honor.

"I would give five years of my life to carry on my face the distinguishing mark of bravery and personal contact with the enemy that he bears. It is a badge of courage which everyone must envy him. Since the war his life has shown that the man was the duplicate of the young man with ability, tenacity and courage."

How Major Henry L. Higginson Received the Red Badge of Courage

"How did Major Henry Lee Higginson receive the sabre cut on his face?"

Few people know the story—for the modesty of the gallant soldier prevents his allusion to his own deeds.

The Sunday Post tells today the tale—the thrilling tale of how Boston's eminent banker, patron of music and philanthropist practically fought his way through desperate cavalry charges and proved his courage and his sterling worth years before he took his place as one of the first citizens of Boston.

The war record of Major Higginson reveals the young manhood of as dashing an officer as ever wore the blue uniform of Uncle Sam.

And it was not merely one engagement that proved Higginson a valiant soldier but at least a half-dozen hand-to-hand encounters.

It was June 17, 1863, that Henry Lee Higginson and companions received a baptism of fire from the hands of the Confederates that will long live in the history of the First Massachusetts Cavalry. This regiment served in so many engagements that it only once assembled as a unit, and that was at Readville, where it entrained for the front.

At the village of Aldie in Virginia the regiment had halted on the outskirts of the town to water their horses in a small stream. Firing was heard shortly after the men had stopped.

The fire was located as coming from behind a stone wall in the village. General Kilpatrick, riding up to the regiment, ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Curtis to send men up towards the wall to find out how much of a force of the enemy was located there.

Captain Lucius M. Sargent's squadron was the force that was designated to perform the duty, and he sent Lieutenant George M. Fillebrown, now a messenger in the Massachusetts State House, and his platoon in skirmishing order against the enemy.

Captain Sargent followed with the rest of the command to drive the enemy from the wall, but with instructions not to go beyond a certain house that General Kilpatrick pointed out to him.

Lieutenant Fillebrown's platoon advanced under heavy fire and obliqued across a road to the stone wall and drove the Confederates from this cover.

There appeared to be a force of about 30 men that were doing the firing. After they fled the platoon commenced to retire to the regiment.

Ordered to Warn Curtis

As they retired the Confederates received reinforcements from the Second Virginia Cavalry, which had been posted at Aldie to watch for the coming of Federal cavalry.

Captain Sargent's squadron came up with Lieutenant Fillebrown's platoon and the two bodies at once charged the enemy.

In the heat of the charge Captain Sargent forgot to stop at the house pointed out by his general and pursued the enemy beyond.

Colonel Curtis, commanding the regiment, seeing this, ordered Major Higginson to ride to him and stop him from going further. Major Chamberlain (afterwards warden of the Charlestown State prison), who had just returned from sick leave but had not reported for duty, was present with the regiment and went with Major Higginson.

These two officers reached the head of Captain Sargent's squadron and were carried forward in the rush.

The squadron had driven the enemy back on its reserves and returned to rally their scattered men when the enemy suddenly advanced in considerable force.

In the confusion of the charge the men of Captain Sargent's squadron could not present a solid front, as they had been pursuing scattered parties of the enemy. In the retreat Major Higginson, Captain Sargent, Lieutenant Fillebrown, Sergeant Martin and one private were isolated from the rest of their men and a bloody fight at close quarters with the enemy resulted.

Fought Hand to Hand

The retired slowly, firing as they went, and when their ammunition was exhausted, sabres were drawn and a hand to hand encounter ensued. It was dozens against one and the little band was charged time and time again by the enemy, but the party, barely a corporal's guard, drove them off each time.

The smoke hung heavy and Major Higginson's group was successfully escaping, when Major Higginson's horse was so badly wounded that it could carry him no further, and the little band stopped to fight the enemy at close quarters.

The Confederates were instantly upon them. Sabres flashed and pistols were fired point blank into their faces.

Almost immediately every man was wounded, Major Higginson in three places by pistol shot and sabre wounds, one cruel blow laying open his cheek and a pistol ball lodging near his spine.

Captain Sargent dropped apparently dead, lying upon his side, the blood streaming from his mouth, quite unconscious. Lieutenant Fillebrown was shot through the body, as was also the private, and Sergeant Martin had his head cut open by a sabre.

The rest of the squadron in the meanwhile, hearing the firing of the little party, rallied and charged the woods where they were in the heat of the duel. Their move was successful and they dispersed the enemy, who were practically riding over the bodies of Higginson and his comrades.

Escape as Squadron Charged

Again the squadron was surrounded by the enemy and while they were fighting, the wounded officers, singly and in twos, made their escape into the Union lines, practically falling into the arms of their comrades more dead than alive.

Every man recovered, although none of them became well men. All suffered from the old wounds in after years.

While this was the fight that gave Major Higginson the scar that he will carry to his grave, and was probably the hottest that he had engaged in in the entire year, he had won his shoulder straps for being under fire long before this.

He had participated in many skirmishes and engagements, but perhaps his bravery that proclaimed him as "Higginson, the Soldier," was best attained at Pocotaligo, S. C., on May 28, 1862.

Drawn Up Prepared for a "Forlorn Hope" Charge

Major Higginson and one company of his command formed part of a column that had crossed from Beaufort island and reconnoitered towards Pocotaligo. This was the first real field duty of this company and the excitement was intense. They knew that the enemy were in much superior numbers and the outcome every man well knew meant death for the majority of them.

The command was advanced by the road to the town and was drawn up expecting to charge into a settlement called Sardon's Corner.

Major Gleason, now the boarding officer at the Long wharf office of the customs service in Boston, told a Sunday Post reporter the story this way:

"I was drawn up at the side of Major Higginson at the head of the column. He never looked right —but the men with sabres draw awaiting his command to charge sensed that not a man would back from that charge. I nev such exhilaration in my life. man we felt as if we could have the whole Confederacy.

"We awaited the word, a bloo gagement was before us. Th pense was awful, but not a ma ered.

"Then came the awakening. derly galloped to us with an countermanding the movement general had learned the place well protected that a charge not succeed."

Still this was a victory fo ginson and his men. They had that they did not lack courage; the soldier of '61 these men ha credited as having stood the made good.

A Strict Disciplinarian, But Always at the

The secret of the men of son's command being ready t and dare all for their comma not come from flattery and words showered on them.

Higginson was rated as on sternest disciplinarians th served under the American fl than one soldier who did not in his saddle when on parade flat of Higginson's sabre on

Just as quickly would the s light on the breast of an of Charles Francis Adams, Jr., and brother officers who served with Major Henry Lee Higginson in the Massachusetts Cavalry in the Civil war.

On left is Lieutenant G. H. Teague, in centre Charles Francis Adams, Jr., and on right Captain E. A.

(A Brady photograph. Copyright, 1911, Patriot Pub. Co. Reproduced from "The Photographic History of the Civil War" by mission of the Review of Reviews Co.)

Captain Charles Francis Adams is the eminent Massachusetts citizen and historian, son of the former minister to England and a descendent of President Adams. His squadron was in the fight when Major Higginson was wounded.

Colonel Lowell, in his letter to Major Crowninshield of June 20, 1863, as quoted in his "Life and Letters," wrote of that fight:

"The First Massachusetts Cavalry had a severe fight at Aldie on Wednesday afternoon. Captain Sargent and Lieutenant Davis (not Henry) reported killed—Major Higginson wounded in four places, not seriously—Lieutenant Fillibrown wounded—Jim Higginson captured—loss killed, wounded and missing, 160 out of 320, according to Major Hig son, who is at Alexandria— this is evidently a mistake. loss in prisoners is great, beca Adams' squadron was dismoun and was supposed to be ported by the Fourth New Y which neglected to support at proper moment and left our lows unprotected." "Jim" ginson was the brother of He

War-time picture of Major Henry L. Higginson.

1914

ON'S SABRE CUT

Cavalry Charge Described Here Today

he did not dress up on the guide of the company if his captain caught him out of the line.

Yet there was not a man of Higginson's command but what respected him, for he would not send a man where he would not go himself.

Famous Boston Associates of Major Higginson

Originally serving in the Second Massachusetts Infantry shortly after Sumter was fired upon, Higginson left that as a lieutenant to acept a captaincy in the First Massachusetts Cavalry.

In the latter regiment he saw practically all of his severe war service and rose to the rank of major and retired with the rank of brevet lieutenant-colonel.

Probably no other regiment that left this State contained so many sons of illustrious families that were known in the financial, literary and commercial world in the United States as did the First Massachusetts Cavalry.

Old Boston families sent their sons by the dozen. Higginson had for companions among the officers alone such men as these:

Horace Binney Sargent of Harvard College, prominent as an author.

Samuel Emory Chamberlain, for many years after the war a warden of the Charlestown State prison.

Lucius Manley Sargent, a brother to Horace Binney Sargent.

Thomas Lawrence Motley, a nephew of the historian Motley.

Benjamin W. Crowninshield of the old Salem family who in later years came into fame as yacht designers.

James Holland of Springfield, one of the most noted surgeons of his time.

Dr. Samuel Durgin, who was chairman of the Boston Board of Health a number of years.

Arnold A. Rand, who was afterwards rated as the wealthiest man in Dedham.

Chauncey Clapp, afterwards vice-president of the Calumet & Hecla Copper Company.

Charles Francis Adams, son of the minister to England.

Dr. Henry Pickering Bowditch, dean of Harvard Medical School for a long time.

William Hathaway Forbes, a brother of J. Malcolm Forbes.

Charles A. Longfellow, son of Henry W. Longfellow, the famous American poet.

Travers Washburn, of a prominent Boston wartime family.

Henry Pelham Curtis, afterwards judge advocate-general U. S. army.

George Blagden, son of Dr. Blagden, a famous Boston preacher.

Charles Chauncey Parson, son of the famous professor of mathematics at Harvard University.

Lawrence N. Duchesney, who afterwards made popular the Light Battery arm of the Massachusetts volunteer militia.

Louis Cabot, who afterwards amassed millions in Boston real estate, and was a descendant of the old Boston family whose name he bears.

It was with regret that Higginson had to leave the most of these officers fighting with the First Cavalry until the close of the war. His wounds were very painful and horseback work became out of the question for him.

Letters of Gallant Col. Lowell to His Friend the Major

One of Major Higginson's dearest friends was Colonel Charles Russell Lowell, nephew of the poet, and admired as one of the greatest cavalry leaders of the war, a soldier who was born for great command but died in battle close to the end of the war.

When Major Higginson, through wounds, was obliged to retire, Colonel Lowell wrote him:

> "I feel very sorry, old fellow, at your being finally obliged to give up, for I know you would like to see it out; however, there is work enough for a public spirited cove everywhere. Labor for recruits and for Linkum, and you will do more than by sabering six confederates."

Lowell well knew of the danger of his friend Higginson on the firing lines, as he himself had received his baptism of fire in the service. Lowell was of the same type of commander as Higginson, but he never came back from the war; he was shot in the engagement at Cedar Creek.

Major Henry L. Higginson as he looks today, showing the sabre cut on his right cheek.

How Higginson, the Youth, Saw Civil Strife Coming

Perhaps the one incident that actuated both Higginson and Lowell to take up arms against the South was the outcome of the Dred Scott decision. The story is told in Edward W. Emerson's very interesting life of Colonel Lowell.

Dred Scott, the escaped slave, was intercepted on his way to Canada to gain his freedom by getting from without the boundary of the United States. He had almost reached his goal when he was arrested and brought to Boston for trial.

Lowell and Higginson, then just graduated from Harvard College, were aroused by the seeming injustice and tried to get speech with the United States judge who was to try the case, to plead with him against the shame.

Major Henry L. Higginson. A portrait of him when he was appointed a major in the First Massachusetts Cavalry. This picture was taken before he was wounded with three sabre cuts and two pistol balls.

And when the slave, guarded by soldiers, was led down historic State street, where already one black man had died for freedom for the very fathers of the men that were sending him to the ship to take him back to bondage on a Southern vessel, Higginson broke the silence between himself and Lowell, and with burning cheeks and blazing eyes he addressed his friend and said: "Charley, it will come to us to set it right."

It was set right. But one of these heroes laid down his life on a Southern battlefield and the other carries on his face the distinguishing mark of bravery and personal contact—an ugly sabre cut.

And yet Higginson never alludes to his injuries, although ever ready to praise his old comrades in arms and to eulogize those who received the cuts and wounds from Confederate weapons.

The Beautiful Tribute Paid by Major Higginson to His Friends

At the opening of Soldiers Field, which Major Higginson gave to Harvard University, the donor spoke feelingly of his "friends, comrades, kinsmen, who died for their country." After speaking of five of them he said:

"Those friends were of unusual powers, but they all bowed down to the goodness and purity of one other—James Savage. He also was an enthusiast, who had little health and no words, but ate himself up with his thoughts and his his fiery wishes; sometimes as gay as a lark, and then depressed from ill-health and disappointment with himself very fond of his books and of nature; much given to games, and a great rusher at football from pure will power and enthusiasm, courageous to the last degree.

"We two fellows went to Fitchburg, just after the war was declared, to recruit a company for the Second Massachusetts Infantry, and when our regiment was ready to start, the colors were intrusted to us.

"This recruiting was strange work to us all, and the men who came to our little recruiting office asked many new questions, which I did my best to answer, but often these recruits would turn to the 'Captain,' as they called him, listen to his replies, and then swear allegiance, as it were, to him.

"He, the quietest and most modest of men, was immensely impressive, for he was a real knight, just and gentle to all friends, defiant to the enemies of his country, and to all wrongdoers.

"He also fell wounded in that most foolish battle where his regiment was sacrificed to the good of the army. He died in the hands of the enemy, who tended him kindly, and were deeply moved by his patience and his fortitude.

"Another fine, handsome fellow, great oarsman, charming companion, wit, philosopher, who delighted in intellectual pursuits, and in his fellow creatures, whom he watched with his keen eyes, and well understood, was killed in a foolish bloody battle while stemming the tide of defeat.

"He was at this time too ill to march, but with other sick officers left the ambulances because he was needed in this fight. I well remember almost our last day together, sitting on a log in a sluggish stream in Maryland . . . and his wonderful talk of the delights of an intellectual life. That was his realm, and no one in our young days did more to mould his mates than Stephen Perkins did."

First lint.
ernut he ise ed ip-
rk,
he elig-y.
or left were
. We come r felt
To a licked dy ene suswav-
An or-order
. The
was so could Hig-proved and to ve been est and

Front

Higgin-do all der had honeyed of the ever
g. More sit erect felt the
is back.
bre also ender if

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City,
Date NOV 22 1914

Est , 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, will offer two works new to New York. These are Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," which will be played on Thursday evening, and Ropartz's fourth symphony in C major, which will be played on Saturday afternoon. Of both of these works Dr. Muck gave the first performances in America—of the "Schlemihl" last April and of Ropartz's symphony last month.

Reznicek, who for a number of years has played a more or less important role in music in Austria and Germany, is best known in this country as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which is often found on orchestral programmes. He has composed other works, some of which have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but up to the writing of his "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," "Schlemihl" was quite the most important piece he had written for orchestra. It was first performed at the third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Oskar Fried, in Berlin, December 18, 1912. Since then it has been played in Munich and Vienna and last April in Boston. Reznicek has obviously taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading, in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis, and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. In the course of the work the composer portrays the man at his best and at his worst, carries him through a fantastical orgy in the trio, of which the figures of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures, "A Comedy of Marionettes," enter; the female dancer, the mad flute player, the leader and the marionette orchestra, the humpbacked dwarf and the singing woman. Then he is restored to respectability. He has a wife; there is a love scene, a wedding, and a child appears, and then the old struggle begins over again. The character of the haughty man, disdainful of outside help, relying upon himself, is not suited to the contemporaneous bustle. Desperate struggles and exhaustion. A short breathing spell. Recollections of happy hours. Sickness, forebodings of death. The only consolation. Disaster has the upper hand. Then from abysmal depths arises the voice of Fate and there is a prayer. Once more, for the last time, the vanquished raises himself to a superhuman height, and then, seized with disgust, lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

The work is played without pause and is divided into four sections.

Sibelius's fourth symphony in A minor and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" complete the Thursday night programme, while on Saturday afternoon, besides the Ropartz symphony, which is in one movement, Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "In Italy," and Beethoven's "Egmont" will be played.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Est 4

CAPITAL AND UNIONISM.

(From the New Bedford Mercury.)

Several months ago we held the Musicians' union to account for a sneering aspersion upon Major Henry L. Higginson, one of the most gallant gentlemen of this day. The Musicians' union was seeking to take Major Higginson to task on the ground that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not a union organization. In an interview which Major Higginson gave on his eightieth birthday, which we are reprinting in a neighboring column, he touched upon the relations between labor and capital and he said: "What both sides, laborer and capitalist need to remember is that we are all in this thing together and that neither can get along without the other. We're all going in the same procession and whether we go to heaven or to smash, we'll all go together. Let each make the best use of the chance he has and do the best he can in the circumstances in which he is placed. Better them if he can, but remember that the only asset anybody has is character. No single person amounts to much. I don't amount to much and you don't amount to much. We are only little pebbles on a great beach where there are plenty more. It is all together that we count."

"Un-American," was the way in which the Musicians' union characterized Major Higginson. If the things Major Higginson stands for are "Un-American" there is honor in the epithet.

1914

ON'S SABRE CUT

Cavalry Charge Described Here Today

he did not dress up on the guide of the company if his captain caught him out of the line.

Yet there was not a man of Higginson's command but what respected him, for he would not send a man where he would not go himself.

Famous Boston Associates of Major Higginson

Originally serving in the Second Massachusetts Infantry shortly after Sumter was fired upon, Higginson left that as a lieutenant to acept a captaincy in the First Massachusetts Cavalry.

In the latter regiment he saw practically all of his severe war service and rose to the rank of major and retired with the rank of brevet lieutenant-colonel.

Probably no other regiment that left this State contained so many sons of illustrious families that were known in the financial, literary and commercial world in the United States as did the First Massachusetts Cavalry.

Old Boston families sent their sons by the dozen. Higginson had for companions among the officers alone such men as these:

Horace Binney Sargent of Harvard College, prominent as an author.
Samuel Emory Chamberlain, for many years after the war a warden of the Charlestown State prison.
Lucius Manley Sargent, a brother to Horace Binney Sargent.
Thomas Lawrence Motley, a nephew of the historian Motley.
Benjamin W. Crowninshield of the old Salem family who in later years came into fame as yacht designers.
James Holland of Springfield, one of the most noted surgeons of his time.
Dr. Samuel Durgin, who was chairman of the Boston Board of Health a number of years.
Arnold A. Rand, who was afterwards rated as the wealthiest man in Dedham.
Chauncey Clapp, afterwards vice-president of the Calumet & Hecla Copper Company.
Charles Francis Adams, son of the minister to England.
Dr. Henry Pickering Bowditch, dean of Harvard Medical School for a long time.
William Hathaway Forbes, a brother of J. Malcolm Forbes.
Charles A. Longfellow, son of Henry W. Longfellow, the famous American poet.
Travers Washburn, of a prominent Boston war-time family.
Henry Pelham Curtis, afterwards judge advocate-general U. S. army.
George Blagden, son of Dr. Blagden, a famous Boston preacher.
Charles Chauncey Parson, son of the famous professor of mathematics at Harvard University.
Lawrence N. Duchesney, who afterwards made popular the Light Battery arm of the Massachusetts volunteer militia.
Louis Cabot, who afterwards amassed millions in Boston real estate, and was a descendant of the old Boston family whose name he bears.

It was with regret that Higginson had to leave the most of these officers fighting with the First Cavalry until the close of the war. His wounds were very painful and horseback work became out of the question for him.

Letters of Gallant Col. Lowell to His Friend the Major

One of Major Higginson's dearest friends was Colonel Charles Russell Lowell, nephew of the poet, and admired as one of the greatest cavalry leaders of the war, a soldier who was born for great command but died in battle close to the end of the war.

When Major Higginson, through wounds, was obliged to retire, Colonel Lowell wrote him:

> "I feel very sorry, old fellow, at your being finally obliged to give up, for I know you would like to see it out; however, there is work enough for a public spirited cove everywhere. Labor for recruits and for Linkum, and you will do more than by sabering six confederates."

Lowell well knew of the danger of his friend Higginson on the firing lines, as he himself had received his baptism of fire in the service. Lowell was of the same type of commander as Higginson, but he never came back from the war; he was shot in the engagement at Cedar Creek.

Major Henry L. Higginson as he looks today, showing the sabre cut on his right cheek.

How Higginson, the Youth, Saw Civil Strife Coming

Perhaps the one incident that actuated both Higginson and Lowell to take up arms against the South was the outcome of the Dred Scott decision. The story is told in Edward W. Emerson's very interesting life of Colonel Lowell.

Dred Scott, the escaped slave, was intercepted on his way to Canada to gain his freedom by getting from without the boundary of the United States. He had almost reached his goal when he was arrested and brought to Boston for trial.

Lowell and Higginson, then just graduated from Harvard College, were aroused by the seeming injustice and tried to get speech with the United States judge who was to try the case, to plead with him against the shame.

Major Henry L. Higginson. A portrait of him when he was appointed a major in the First Massachusetts Cavalry. This picture was taken before he was wounded with three sabre cuts and two pistol balls.

And when the slave, guarded by soldiers, was led down historic State street, where already one black man had died for freedom for the very fathers of the men that were sending him to the ship to take him back to bondage on a Southern vessel, Higginson broke the silence between himself and Lowell, and with burning cheeks and blazing eyes he addressed his friend and said: "Charley, it will come to us to set it right."

It was set right. But one of these heroes laid down his life on a Southern battlefield and the other carries on his face the distinguishing mark of bravery and personal contact—an ugly sabre cut.

And yet Higginson never alludes to his injuries, although ever ready to praise his old comrades in arms and to eulogize those who received the cuts and wounds from Confederate weapons.

The Beautiful Tribute Paid by Major Higginson to His Friends

At the opening of Soldiers Field, which Major Higginson gave to Harvard University, the donor spoke feelingly of his "friends, comrades, kinsmen, who died for their country." After speaking of five of them he said:

> "Those friends were of unusual powers, but they all bowed down to the goodness and purity of one other—James Savage. He also was an enthusiast, who had little health and no words, but ate himself up with his thoughts and his his fiery wishes; sometimes as gay as a lark, and then depressed from ill-health and disappointment with himself very fond of his books and of nature; much given to games, and a great rusher at football from pure will power and enthusiasm, courageous to the last degree.
>
> "We two fellows went to Fitchburg, just after the war was declared, to recruit a company for the Second Massachusetts Infantry, and when our regiment was ready to start, the colors were intrusted to us.
>
> "This recruiting was strange work to us all, and the men who came to our little recruiting office asked many new questions, which I did my best to answer, but often these recruits would turn to the 'Captain,' as they called him, listen to his replies, and then swear allegiance, as it were, to him.
>
> "He, the quietest and most modest of men, was immensely impressive, for he was a real knight, just and gentle to all friends, defiant to the enemies of his country, and to all wrongdoers.
>
> "He also fell wounded in that most foolish battle where his regiment was sacrificed to the good of the army. He died in the hands of the enemy, who tended him kindly, and were deeply moved by his patience and his fortitude.
>
> "Another fine, handsome fellow, great oarsman, charming companion, wit, philosopher, who delighted in intellectual pursuits, and in his fellow creatures, whom he watched with his keen eyes, and well understood, was killed in a foolish bloody battle while stemming the tide of defeat.
>
> "He was at this time too ill to march, but with other sick officers left the ambulances because he was needed in this fight. I well remember almost our last day together, sitting on a log in a sluggish stream in Maryland . . . and his wonderful talk of the delights of an intellectual life. That was his realm, and no one in our young days did more to mould his mates than Stephen Perkins did."

First

lint.
ernut he ise

ed ip-
rk,
he elig-ry.

or left were
. We come r felt
To a licked

dy ene suswav-

An or-order
. The was so could r Hig-proved and to ve been est and

Front

Higgin-do all der had honeyed

of the ever
g. More sit erect felt the his back.
abre also ender if

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date

Est , 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, will offer two works new to New York. These are Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," which will be played on Thursday evening, and Ropartz's fourth symphony in C major, which will be played on Saturday afternoon. Of both of these works Dr. Muck gave the first performances in America of the "Schlemihl" last April and of Ropartz's symphony last month.

Reznicek, who for a number of years has played a more or less important role in music in Austria and Germany, is best known in this country as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which is often found on orchestral programmes. He has composed other works, some of which have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but up to the writing of his "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," "Schlemihl" was quite the most important piece he had written for orchestra. It was first performed at the third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Oskar Fried, in Berlin, December 18, 1912. Since then it has been played in Munich and Vienna and last April in Boston. Reznicek has obviously taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading, in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis, and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. In the course of the work the composer portrays the man at his best and at his worst, carries him through a fantastical orgy in the trio, of which the figures of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures, "A Comedy of Marionettes," enter; the female dancer, the mad flute player, the leader and the marionette orchestra, the humpbacked dwarf and the singing woman. Then he is restored to respectability. He has a wife; there is a love scene, a wedding, and a child appears, and then the old struggle begins over again. The character of the haughty man, disdainful of outside help, relying upon himself, is not suited to the contemporaneous bustle. Desperate struggles and exhaustion. A short breathing spell. Recollections of happy hours. Sickness, forebodings of death. The only consolation. Disaster has the upper hand. Then from abysmal depths arises the voice of Fate and there is a prayer. Once more, for the last time, the vanquished raises himself to a superhuman height, and then, seized with disgust, lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

The work is played without pause and is divided into four sections.

Sibelius's fourth symphony in A minor and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" complete the Thursday night programme, while on Saturday afternoon, besides the Ropartz symphony, which is in one movement, Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "In Italy," and Beethoven's "Egmont" will be played.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....
Address ....
Date ....

Est 4

CAPITAL AND UNIONISM.

(From the New Bedford Mercury.)

Several months ago we held the Musicians' union to account for a sneering aspersion upon Major Henry L. Higginson, one of the most gallant gentlemen of this day. The Musicians' union was seeking to take Major Higginson to task on the ground that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not a union organization. In an interview which Major Higginson gave on his eightieth birthday, which we are reprinting in a neighboring column, he touched upon the relations between labor and capital and he said: "What both sides, laborer and capitalist need to remember is that we are all in this thing together and that neither can get along without the other. We're all going in the same procession and whether we go to heaven or to smash, we'll all go together. Let each make the best use of the chance he has and do the best he can in the circumstances in which he is placed. Better them if he can, but remember that the only asset anybody has is character. No single person amounts to much. I don't amount to much and you don't amount to much. We are only little pebbles on a great beach where there are plenty more. It is all together that we count."

"Un-American," was the way in which the Musicians' union characterized Major Higginson. If the things Major Higginson stands for are "Un-American" there is honor in the epithet.

SUNDAY HERALD, NOVEMBER 29, 1914.

FRITZ KREISLER TELLS OF FIGHTING IN TH

Wounded Violinist Says Horrors of the War Call Forth Man's Nobility as Well as His Brutality.

PHOTO © AIMÉ DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER

SHORTLY after the outbreak of the European war news was received in this country that Fritz Kreisler, one of the world's greatest violinists, had joined the Austrian regiment of which he was a member and had gone to the front. Kreisler is well known in Boston and the news was received with great regret, which was intensified when a report came that he had been killed. Although this was only in the form of a rumor, there were many people who believed it, and the thousands of music lovers who did not quite credit it were nevertheless confirmed in their anxiety for the safety of the artist. Later came the definite news that he had been wounded before Lemberg and removed to a hospital, which, under the circumstances, was good news.

Fritz Kreisler and his American wife walked down the gangplank of a Dutch steamer last Tuesday and landed safe in America.

As nearly as it can be pieced together, this is what Fritz Kreisler told of his experiences as a soldier and his resulting reflections:

"After having given concerts in France and Germany during the summer, I was on my way from Switzerland with Mrs. Kreisler when I learned of the declaration of war between Austria and Servia. As I am an officer in the 3d infantry regiment of the landsturm, I immediately went to Vienna and reported. We spent two weeks there and at Gratz in preparation and then my regiment was ordered to the neighborhood of Lemberg, in Galicia. We got to the fighting line about Aug. 16.

"Our orders here were to hold our positions at any cost—and you know what that means. We were two army corps to seven of the Russians, and our task was to hold them back until our re-enforcements came up. That means fighting day and night without rest.

"It is all a vague, blurred impression in my mind. I cannot call it even a nightmare, for it lacks the definite impression that a nightmare sometimes creates. You will see what I mean shortly. For instance, when you hear the first shell burst, it is a terrible thing; the whining in the air, the deafening crash, and the death it spreads around it. That is what you think of your first shell. But you think less of the second and third and after that they pass out of your mind.

"The first man you see die affects you terribly. I shall not forget mine. He sat in a trench and suddenly he began to cough—two or three times—like an old man. A little blood showed at his month and then he toppled over and lay quietly. That was all.

"Very shortly none of these things affect you. It has made me mournful when I have thought how quickly we all threw over everything the centuries have taught us. One day we were all ordinary civilized men. Two or three days later our 'culture' had dropped aside like a cloak and we were brutal and primeval.

"A certain fierceness arises in you, an absolute indifference to anything the world holds except your job of fighting. You are eating a crust of bread and a man is shot dead in the trench next to you. You look at him calmly for a moment and then go on eating your bread. Why not? There is nothing to do. In the end you get to talking of your own death in the trench with as much excitement as you could get up over a luncheon engagement.

"It becomes terribly dreary waiting in the trenches, with no incident but the occasional wounding or killing of a man near enough to see. Actual fighting is, under these conditions, welcomed by the soldiers as a great relief.

"For the officers there is perhaps a little more variety, since they must keep thinking about the safeguarding their responsibility. It began to get very hard for us to hold back our men, for instance. We had been in a trench in a swamp for three days. The water gradually drained in and finally reached our knees. We resorted to bailing with our hats, but that did not help much. Under these circumstances it became difficult to convince our men that it was wise to stay entrenched, rather than try a charge.

"On the modern field of battle the soldier of infantry is a small unit. We could look out and see the clouds of smoke and hear the thunder of the guns, but there was little else except now and then the sight of an aeroplane. You could hear the whirr of the motor, but they generally flew so high we dared not fire at them for fear that the hail of bullets would fall back among our own men.

"Amid this absence of all signs of life it was hard to convince our boys that their time had not yet come. As I have said, we were then outnumbered by the Russians about three to one and our aim was to hold our positions until the reinforcing troops could be brought up in the rear and form permanent lines.

"In the trenches we were generally without food, several times for three days at a stretch. I have more than once licked the dew from the grass to moisten my throat because I could get nothing to drink. The roads were impassable and the supply trains moved only with great difficulty at the outset of the war. Now and then a cow would be found, shot, butchered on the spot, and then we could roast portions in the trenches and eat where we were. In the night time they would bring the field kitchens up, when they were available, and then we would have soup.

"From the moment war was declared all ranks disappeared in my country. No one knew who the other was. He was satisfied that they were brothers in their devotion to their country. That is why it has made me angry sometimes when people have said, 'How could they take an artist and let him fight?' They should rather not think it worthy of any comment. I am an Austrian. As soon as war began the last thing I thought of was a violin or that I had ever played one.

"Next to me in the trenches were a prince, a sculptor, a mathematician and a professor, and nobody asked them who they were or cared. We forgot everything except the work we had to do. Why should I claim immunity as an artist?

"I have seen people whose houses stood in the way of our artillery fire and therefore had to be razed, put the torch to the houses cheerfully themselves. I, too, lost everything I had invested in the regions touched by the fighting.

"Before the war we thought the human race had deteriorated. We often said so. We thought it had gone tango mad and destroyed itself in frivolities. But the war proved among all the nations engaged that the race is just as sturdy as it ever was. There is that side to it.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date NOV 18 1914
Estab

HIGGINSON TO YOUNG MEN

BOSTON'S "FIRST CITIZEN" GIVES BIRTHDAY TALK AT 80.

"The Only Lasting Satisfaction Any One Gets Out of Life," He Says, "Is What He Does for Other People"—To Govern Ourselves Big Job—The Real Value of Money.

To-day is the eightieth birthday of Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston. Gallant fighter in the Civil War; benefactor of Harvard; founder of the Symphony Orchestra; builder of business; administrator of charitable funds; contributor to innumerable good causes which the world in general knows nothing of; and tireless server of his country and his community—such are the six decades, says the Boston Post, which have been given to the service of his fellows by the "first citizen of Boston."

What word for the young men of today has this veteran who has been through it all; war and peace; good times and bad; public life and private life; business career and cultivation of the arts?

A bright fire is snapping on the hearth under the pink-marble chimney-piece in the private office on State Street. The major sits (in the posture which the painter Sargent has made memorable in a famous portrait), one arm hooked over the chair back, head thrown back at a military tilt. He ruminates for a minute or two, then replies:

"My message to young men is this: "First, think of your job and not of yourself, and, second, remember that the only lasting satisfaction any one gets out of life is what he does for other people.

"It is a question, I know, whether young people ever learn these things except in the school of experience. They have their way to make and their livings to earn, and the years of getting started are not easy. But everything which young men have to go through to-day I think had to be gone through by the young men of any time.

BURNS TAKEN TO SLAVERY.

"The first incident I remember as consciously shaping my life was a remark made by my mother when I was a very little boy; she said that slavery was a crime. The words stuck and stung. She died when I was fifteen. But those words lived on.

"Then came the Fugitive Slave law and Daniel Webster's great speech. I had always venerated him and it made a most painful impression. It was almost as if he had been a renegade.

"I was down on Central Wharf the day they took away that poor negro, Burns. His main escort was about all the prize-fighters in town, assisted by a few soldiers.

"A small party of us young men looked on at what was happening and said to one another, 'We have got to square this thing somehow, some day.' We knew then that it meant war; and that was in the early '50s.

"But black slavery wasn't the only ferment at work then. We were asking ourselves why one man should have a good coat to his back and another man, just as good, should have none.

"Not one of this group I speak of, of which I alone am left, belonged to a church, but we thought a great deal about religious questions in their practical applications. I knew another young man and I talked of buying a farm and going to live on it in order to get away from the muddle and the compromises and the combinations of life, and 'earn,' as we said, 'an honest living.'

"I realize these things as showing that the things the young men of to-day are saying and thinking we were saying and thinking then, and I dare say young people always speak and think so. Challenge was in the air. We set little store by conventions—too little, probably. Conventions can be very useful; but we had little use for them.

DURING THE WAR, AND AFTER.

"Then came the war, and hooked up all this odd lot of ideals; gave them something to do. To go was no sacrifice. It was a joy. Men couldn't help going. If they didn't the ground burned under their feet. We felt that this country was a tremendously fine thing and that we had got to see it through.

"I remember how thankful I was that there was nobody who would be particularly worse off if I got put out of the game. Well, there was my father; he would feel it; but no woman. No woman could have had me at that time; I belonged to a cause.

"I think my army service was as happy a time as I ever spent in my life. Here we were, a party of friends, comrades, sleeping anywhere, mostly on the ground; getting enough to eat generally; with horses; and nothing in the world, nor sure of having anything, even our lives.

"And a merry crew we were. If we ran out of clothes, somebody would send us some more. . . . There was one time when I went for six weeks without having a chance to change my garments. Nobody cared. We were on a bigger errand. This feeling about our country amounted to a passion with us.

"Of that band, one other fellow and I survived, and I am sure I had, naturally, the least ability of any of them. That time I made the speech at the dedication of Soldiers' Field I tried to tell what talents were in those brave fellows who died.

"When the questions of the Union and of slavery were settled, I went South and tried cotton-growing with a few other men. We went down there with about $80,000, and came back with $5,000.

"Later I came here. I wasn't wanted; times were bad. But I did my share; and by and by they improved. Then came two or three wonderfully good years, and my peaceful business of life began.

MONEY ONLY FOR WHAT IT CAN DO.

"I have never cared about accumulating money. I have cared about making it—because of what one can do with it.

"Suppose a man accumulates a fortune of $30,000,000. He dies. What good is it to him? If people would only realize that what pays the highest return is the human dividend!

"I think Mr. Carnegie is getting something out of his money—some durable satisfactions.

"The notion of the Symphony Orchestra was with me vaguely in the 50's, when I was in Europe, with no very clear idea of what I was going to do. I saw Europe enjoying all its art and music, and felt my own country to be pretty poor in such things.

"And it was. It was pretty barren of enjoyments in those days; dull. Meeting Mrs. Kemble in London one time, she remarked to me: 'You have planted a flower in a cornfield,' which was about my intention.

"It was not until after those two good business years that I saw myself in a position to do the thing I had had in mind so long before.

"Since then, one thing has led to another. The great thing about doing one thing well is that it gets you a chance to do something else—the same way. Facts have come up which had to be faced, and I have been called to help face them. It is at such times that you learn the importance and the unimportance of money.

"I remember we had a particularly difficult situation to face here in the city a number of years ago, to relieve which involved spending a great deal of money. 'What shall we do?' they asked. 'Spend it,' said I, 'In Heaven's name, spend it. What is money for?

[65]

SUNDAY HERALD, NOVEMBER 29, 1914.

FRITZ KREISLER TELLS OF FIGHTING IN TH

Wounded Violinist Says Horrors of the War Call Forth Man's Nobility as Well as His Brutality.

PHOTO © AIMÉ DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER

SHORTLY after the outbreak of the European war news was [illegible] ritz Kreisler, one of the world's greatest violinists, had joined the Austrian regiment of which he was a member and had gone to the front. Kreisler is well known in Boston and the news was received with great regret, which was intensified when a report came that he had been killed. Although this was only in the form of a rumor, there were many people who believed it, and the thousands of music lovers who did not quite credit it were nevertheless confirmed in their anxiety for the safety of the artist. Later came the definite news that he had been wounded before Lemberg and removed to a hospital, which, under the circumstances, was good news.

Fritz Kreisler and his American wife walked down the gangplank of a Dutch steamer last Tuesday and landed safe in America.

As nearly as it can be pieced together, this is what Fritz Kreisler told of his experiences as a soldier and his resulting reflections:

"After having given concerts in France and Germany during the summer, I was on my way from Switzerland with Mrs. Kreisler when I learned of the declaration of war between Austria and Servia. As I am an officer in the 3d infantry regiment of the landsturm, I immediately went to Vienna and reported. We spent two weeks there and at Gratz in preparation and then my regiment was ordered to the neighborhood of Lemberg, in Galicia. We got to the fighting line about Aug. 16.

"Our orders here were to hold our positions at any cost—and you know what that means. We were two army corps to seven of the Russians, and our task was to hold them back until our re-enforcements came up. That means fighting day and night without rest.

"It is all a vague, blurred impression in my mind. I cannot call it even a nightmare, for it lacks the definite impression that a nightmare sometimes creates. You will see what I mean shortly. For instance, when you hear the first shell burst, it is a terrible thing; the whining in the air, the deafening crash, and the death it spreads around it. That is what you think of your first shell. But you think less of the second and third and after that they pass out of your mind.

"The first man you see die affects you terribly. I shall not forget mine. He sat in a trench and suddenly he began to cough—two or three times—like an old man. A little blood showed at his mouth and then he toppled over and lay quietly. That was all.

"Very shortly none of these things affect you. It has made me mournful when I have thought how quickly we all threw over everything the centuries have taught us. One day we were all ordinary civilized men. Two or three days later our 'culture' had dropped aside like a cloak and we were brutal and primeval.

"A certain fierceness arises in you, an absolute indifference to anything the world holds except your job of fighting. You are eating a crust of bread and a man is shot dead in the trench next to you. You look at him calmly for a moment and then go on eating your bread. Why not? There is nothing to do. In the end you get to talking of your own death in the trench with as much excitement as you could get up over a luncheon engagement.

"It becomes terribly dreary waiting in the trenches, with no incident but the occasional wounding or killing of a man near enough to see. Actual fighting is, under these conditions, welcomed by the soldiers as a great relief.

"For the officers there is perhaps a little more variety, since they must keep thinking about the safeguarding their responsibility. It began to get very hard for us to hold back our men, for instance. We had been in a trench in a swamp for three days. The water gradually drained in and finally reached our knees. We resorted to bailing with our hats, but that did not help much. Under these circumstances it became difficult to convince our men that it was wise to stay entrenched, rather than try a charge.

"On the modern field of battle the soldier of infantry is a small unit. We could look out and see the clouds of smoke and hear the thunder of the guns, but there was little else except now and then the sight of an aeroplane. You could hear the whirr of the motor, but they generally flew so high we dared not fire at them for fear that the hail of bullets would fall back among our own men.

"Amid this absence of all signs of life it was hard to convince our boys that their time had not yet come. As I have said, we were then outnumbered by the Russians about three to one and our aim was to hold our positions until the reinforcing troops could be brought up in the rear and form permanent lines.

"In the trenches we were generally without food, several times for three days at a stretch. I have more than once licked the dew from the grass to moisten my throat because I could get nothing to drink. The roads were impassable and the supply trains moved only with great difficulty at the outset of the war. Now and then a cow would be found, shot, butchered on the spot, and then we could roast portions in the trenches and eat where we were. In the night time they would bring the field kitchens up, when they were available, and then we would have soup.

"From the moment war was declared all ranks disappeared in my country. No one knew who the other was. He was satisfied that they were brothers in their devotion to their country. That is why it has made me angry sometimes when people have said, 'How could they take an artist and let him fight?' They should rather not think it worthy of any comment. I am an Austrian. As soon as war began the last thing I thought of was a violin or that I had ever played one.

"Next to me in the trenches were a prince, a sculptor, a mathematician and a professor, and nobody asked them who they were or cared. We forgot everything except the work we had to do. Why should I claim immunity as an artist?

"I have seen people whose houses stood in the way of our artillery fire and therefore had to be razed, put the torch to the houses cheerfully themselves. I, too, lost everything I had invested in the regions touched by the fighting.

"Before the war we thought the human race had deteriorated. We often said so. We thought it had gone tango mad and destroyed itself in frivolities. But the war proved among all the nations engaged that the race is just as sturdy as it ever was. There is that side to it.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date NOV 18 1914

Estab

HIGGINSON TO YOUNG MEN

BOSTON'S "FIRST CITIZEN" GIVES BIRTHDAY TALK AT 80.

"The Only Lasting Satisfaction Any One Gets Out of Life," He Says, "Is What He Does for Other People"—To Govern Ourselves Big Job—The Real Value of Money.

To-day is the eightieth birthday of Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston. Gallant fighter in the Civil War; benefactor of Harvard; founder of the Symphony Orchestra; builder of business; administrator of charitable funds; contributor to innumerable good causes which the world in general knows nothing of; and tireless server of his country and his community—such are the six decades, says the Boston Post, which have been given to the service of his fellows by the "first citizen of Boston."

What word for the young men of today has this veteran who has been through it all; war and peace; good times and bad; public life and private life; business career and cultivation of the arts?

A bright fire is snapping on the hearth under the pink-marble chimney-piece in the private office on State Street. The major sits (in the posture which the painter Sargent has made memorable in a famous portrait), one arm hooked over the chair back, head thrown back at a military tilt. He ruminates for a minute or two, then replies:

"My message to young men is this:

"First, think of your job and not of yourself, and, second, remember that the only lasting satisfaction any one gets out of life is what he does for other people.

"It is a question, I know, whether young people ever learn these things except in the school of experience. They have their way to make and their livings to earn, and the years of getting started are not easy. But everything which young men have to go through to-day I think had to be gone through by the young men of any time.

BURNS TAKEN TO SLAVERY.

"The first incident I remember as consciously shaping my life was a remark made by my mother when I was a very little boy; she said that slavery was a crime. The words stuck and stung. She died when I was fifteen. But those words lived on.

"Then came the Fugitive Slave law and Daniel Webster's great speech. I had always venerated him and it made a most painful impression. It was almost as if he had been a renegade.

"I was down on Central Wharf the day they took away that poor negro, Burns. His main escort was about all the prize-fighters in town, assisted by a few soldiers.

"A small party of us young men looked on at what was happening and said to one another, 'We have got to square this thing somehow, some day,' We knew then that it meant war; and that was in the early '50s.

"But black slavery wasn't the only ferment at work then. We were asking ourselves why one man should have a good coat to his back and another man, just as good, should have none.

"Not one of this group I speak of, of which I alone am left, belonged to a church, but we thought a great deal about religious questions in their practical applications. I knew another young man and I talked of buying a farm and going to live on it in order to get away from the muddle and the compromises and the combinations of life, and 'earn,' as we said, 'an honest living.'

"I realize these things as showing that the things the young men of to-day are saying and thinking we were saying and thinking then, and I dare say young people always speak and think so. Challenge was in the air. We set little store by conventions—too little, probably. Conventions can be very useful; but we had little use for them.

DURING THE WAR, AND AFTER.

"Then came the war, and hooked up all this odd lot of ideals; gave them something to do. To go was no sacrifice. It was a joy. Men couldn't help going. If they didn't the ground burned under their feet. We felt that this country was a tremendously fine thing and that we had got to see it through.

"I remember how thankful I was that there was nobody who would be particularly worse off if I got put out of the game. Well, there was my father; he would feel it; but no woman. No woman could have had me at that time; I belonged to a cause.

"I think my army service was as happy a time as I ever spent in my life. Here we were, a party of friends, comrades, sleeping anywhere, mostly on the ground; getting enough to eat generally; with horses; and nothing in the world, nor sure of having anything, even our lives.

"And a merry crew we were. If we ran out of clothes, somebody would send us some more. . . . There was one time when I went for six weeks without having a chance to change my garments. Nobody cared. We were on a bigger errand. This feeling about our country amounted to a passion with us.

"Of that band, one other fellow and I survived, and I am sure I had, naturally, the least ability of any of them. That time I made the speech at the dedication of Soldiers' Field I tried to tell what talents were in those brave fellows who died.

"When the questions of the Union and of slavery were settled, I went South and tried cotton-growing with a few other men. We went down there with about $80,000, and came back with $5,000.

"Later I came here. I wasn't wanted; times were bad. But I did my share; and by and by they improved. Then came two or three wonderfully good years, and my peaceful business of life began.

MONEY ONLY FOR WHAT IT CAN DO.

"I have never cared about accumulating money. I have cared about making it—because of what one can do with it.

"Suppose a man accumulates a fortune of $30,000,000. He dies. What good is it to him? If people would only realize that what pays the highest return is the human dividend!

"I think Mr. Carnegie is getting something out of his money—some durable satisfactions.

"The notion of the Symphony Orchestra was with me vaguely in the 50's, when I was in Europe, with no very clear idea of what I was going to do. I saw Europe enjoying all its art and music, and felt my own country to be pretty poor in such things.

"And it was. It was pretty barren of enjoyments in those days; dull. Meeting Mrs. Kemble in London one time, she remarked to me: 'You have planted a flower in a cornfield,' which was about my intention.

"It was not until after those two good business years that I saw myself in a position to do the thing I had had in mind so long before.

"Since then, one thing has led to another. The great thing about doing one thing well is that it gets you a chance to do something else—the same way. Facts have come up which had to be faced, and I have been called to help face them. It is at such times that you learn the importance and the unimportance of money.

"I remember we had a particularly difficult situation to face here in the city a number of years ago, to relieve which involved spending a great deal of money. 'What shall we do?' they asked. 'Spend it,' said I, 'In Heaven's name, spend it. What is money for?'

GHTING IN THE AUSTRIAN TRENCHES

Finds That Bitter Hatred for Enemy Is Tempered When Meeting Face to Face in Battle.

PHOTO © AIMÉ DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER

"I have seen acts of the most tender sympathy and kindness, and real heroism, with my own eyes, go hand-in-hand with grim, stalking war.

"For instance, it was good to see that the hatred of one foe for another was only an impersonal thing. In the mass we hated our enemy, but as soon as we were confronted with him in person, all was kindness to the individual. I have seen emaciated Austrian soldiers—and I well know how long it had been since they had had enough to eat—hand a crust of bread to a Russian prisoner.

"Then there were innumerable little incidents of the honoring of bravery in a foe. We took one trench, for instance, after the enemy had put up a gallant fight. The first act was a salute to the foe in acknowledgment of his bravery. And there were the little things like returning the arms of an officer who had fought well but been forced to surrender by the fortunes of war.

"There were all those fine flowers of courtesy to show that, perhaps, after all, it was not utterly brutal and primeval, but that finer feelings had survived and been culivated.

"I remember once that a Russian officer tottered out of one of their trenches waving a rag on the end of his sword. The firing ceased. He came to our lines. Under his arm was a bottle of wine. He said he had had nothing to eat for five days and could stand it no longer, and proposed that we exchange some bread for his wine. We scraped together some mildewed pieces of bread and gave them to him. He stumbled back to his lines. He had spoken to us and we to him, and I remember we gave him a handful of cigarettes for his comrades. When he got back to his trenches the firing was resumed, but there had been an unofficial truce for twenty minutes.

"The next morning, I am sorry to say, I stumbled across his dead body.

"The acts of heroism were innumerable, of course. I remember a case where three soldiers were sent with a very important message to the division commander, in the hope that one of them would get through. They had to cross an open space where they were exposed to a heavy fire, and progress was impeded by barbed-wire entanglements charged with electricity. They had to cut their way through this with insulated wire cutters. Two of them were shot dead. The third found himself nearly through when his arm, which had been shot badly, caught in the entanglement and he could not get it out. Thereupon the soldier drew his bayonet and finished the work the enemy's fire had begun, amputating his arm himself. He got clear and delivered his message.

Saved by His Orderly.

"I have seen artillery caught in an exposed place and the horses killed. The men who tried to work the guns were shot down; then the non-commissioned officers went, and, finally, there were none left but the officers to fire the guns. But they kept at it. The instances of devotion of soldiers to officers under fire were numerous.

"Without doubt, I owe my life to my orderly. The trenches my regiment was holding were rushed by the Cossacks on the night of Sept. 6. The cavalry only dares attack intrenched infantry at night, when they have some protection from rifle fire. It was about 11:30 when they attacked us.

"I can remember being hit by one horse and knocked down. While I lay I saw a second Cossack reach down to finish me. He got me in the hip, but as he struck me I fired my revolver. I remember seeing him fall and the riderless horse gallop on. Then I became unconscious.

"My orderly retired with the rest of the company. After the fighting had moved on he came back and started to look for me, using a pocket flash lamp to examine the faces of the dead and wounded. He says that several times he was nearly caught by Cossack patrols, but escaped by dropping to the ground, where he was taken for wounded or dead. He found me about 3 A. M., so I must have been lying there about nine hours.

Vienna's War-Time Mood.

"The report of my death originated through a mistake of the surgeon. Next to me in the hospital was lying a man who was dying. After the surgeon had looked at him an officer in the hospital said, 'Did you know that was Kreisler, the violinist?' The surgeon thought he referred to my neighbor, and when he unfortunately died, reported my death.

"I was in the hospital three weeks after reaching Vienna. Then I took the cure at the sulphur springs near Carlsbad. After this a commission of surgeons examined me and pronounced me unfit for further military duty. My trampled shoulder has healed and does not bother me much now. I suppose I will always retain at least a stiffness in my leg, however."

At the doorway the interviewer, who had caught Mrs. Kreisler alone, endeavored to find out how her husband had distinguished himself.

"He didn't do anything more than anyone else," she said: "just what they were all doing, their duty. But there was one thing. The men of his company, before he left, expressed their gratitude for his special consideration of them. It seems he had a habit of doing outpost duty for some of them. There were several other sick ones who ate at his dinner at his own request, and on the march he carried the equipment of another. He argued that they were under a disadvantage in having heavy knapsacks to carry, and he was stronger and better able to bear fatigue anyway."

All of which adds something to the picture of the great violinist as a soldier.

eir devotion to is why it has times when peocould they take m fight?" They nk it worthy of an Austrian. As the last thing I in or that I had

e trenches were mathematician nobody asked or cared. We ept the work we uld I claim immunity as an artist?

"I have seen people whose houses stood in the way of our artillery fire and therefore had to be razed, put the torch to the houses cheerfully themselves. I, too, lost everything I had invested in the regions touched by the fighting.

"Before the war we thought the human race had deteriorated. We often said so. We thought it had gone tango mad and destroyed itself in frivolities. But the war proved among all the nations engaged that the race is just as sturdy as it ever was. There is that side to it.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An early work of Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. This is the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," in which Strauss gives the first real evidence of what afterwards was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. After its first performance in Munich in 1887, Strauss wrote to his uncle:

E, 1884

"The performance of my Italian fantasia has evoked a great uproar here—general stupefaction and rage—because I now begin to go my own way, provide my own form and cause lazy persons mental perplexity." The last movement, which is a bit wild, and is built on the Neapolitan folk life, called forth some sharp hissing, which pleased Strauss tremendously, for he wrote to von Bulow, "it marked the first step toward independence." But this was twenty-seven years ago, and what displeased the conservatives then is "milk for babes" now.

The soloist will be Harold Bauer, pianist, who then makes his first appearance of the season. He will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 9 1914

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will be unusually generous in novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme and Thursday evening's symphony has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The

Es, 1884

Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4 .... Sibelius
Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl" .... Reznicek
(First time in New York.)
Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare, Scheinpflug

The incidental tenor role in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy." Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 4, in C major (in one movement) .... Ropartz
(First time in New York.)
Overture, "Edmont" .... Beethoven

Jan Sickesz, the Dutch pianist, will play in Aeolian Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 17.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 9 1914

Reznicek's "Schlemihl."

Dr. Muck at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, will offer two works new to New York. These are Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," which will be played on Thursday evening, and Ropartz's fourth symphony in C major, which will be played Saturday afternoon. Of both of these works Dr. Muck gave the first performances in America—of the "Schlemihl" last April and of Ropartz's symphony last month. Of the two the "Schlemihl" is the more important.

1884

Reznicek, who for a number of years has played a more or less important role in music in Austria and Germany, is best known in this country as the composer of the successful opera, "Donna Diana," the overture of which is often found on orchestral programmes. He has composed other works, some of which have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but up to the writing of his "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," "Schlemihl" was quite the most important piece he had written for orchestra. It was first performed at the third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Oskar Fried, in Berlin, December 18, 1912. Since then it has been played in Munich and Vienna, and last April in Boston. Reznicek has obviously taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice, and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and material existence.

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 29 1914

An early work by Richard Strauss will be the principal number in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert this season, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday at 8:15 o'clock, under the joint auspices of the Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The composition is his Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy." It is very melodious, and, according to modern standards, very simple. The titles of the four parts are "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." In his work he records musically his deep impressions in 1886, when he first visited Italy. There he sketched out the "Fantasia," and it had its first performance at a subscription concert in the Odeon, Munich, on March 2, 1887. Regarding the performance, Strauss wrote to his uncle: "The performance of my Italian Fantasia has evoked a great uproar here—general stupefaction and rage; because I now begin to go my own way, provide my own form and cause lazy persons mental perplexity." The last movement, which is a bit wild and is built on the Neapolitan folk-life, called forth some sharp hissing, which pleased Strauss tremendously.

k, 1884

The soloist will be the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, who then makes his first appearance of the season here. He will play the "Fourth Concerto" of Beethoven, in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Later I came here. I wasn't wanted; es were bad. But I did my share; by and by they improved. Then e two or three wonderfully good years, my peaceful business of life began.

MONEY ONLY FOR WHAT IT CAN DO.

I have never cared about accumulating money. I have cared about making because of what one can do with it. Suppose a man accumulates a fortune of $30,000,000. He dies. What good t to him? If people would only real-that what pays the highest return the human dividend!

"I think Mr. Carnegie is getting something out of his money—some durable satisfactions.

"The notion of the Symphony Orches- was with me vaguely in the 50's, hen I was in Europe, with no very clear ea of what I was going to do. I saw urope enjoying all its art and music, d felt my own country to be pretty or in such things.

"And it was. It was pretty barren of enjoyments in those days; dull. Meeting Mrs. Kemble in London one time, she remarked to me: 'You have planted a ower in a cornfield,' which was about y intention.

"It was not until after those two good usiness years that I saw myself in a osition to do the thing I had had in ind so long before.

"Since then, one thing has led to another. The great thing about doing one hing well is that it gets you a chance o do something else—the same way. Facts have come up which had to be aced, and I have been called to help ace them. It is at such times that you earn the importance and the unimportance of money.

"I remember we had a particularly difficult situation to face here in the city a number of years ago, to relieve which involved spending a great deal of money. What shall we do?' they asked. 'Spend t,' said I, 'In Heaven's name, spend it. What is money for?'

"And thus, as the years go on, one feels that the time is growing short, and, if he is going to get things done, he must be about it. Bad economy; but it does get things done.

"Was the country more democratic when I was a young man? I do not think it can be doubted that it was. Things were simpler then—complicated as they looked to young eyes.

"I have spoken of how earnestly we thought and felt about the questions which were confronting the country then; there is just as much and more for us to think of to-day. We have said that we can get along without kings and emperors and dukes to rule us; that we can govern ourselves. Well, let's do it.

"That is a job which is going to require enormous thought and patience and effort, and even sacrifice. Democracy is anything but simple, and if you young men can see a way out of our labor difficulties, you will be cleverer fellows than we have been.

"When I wrote that article which appeared in the Survey last winter, to ask that people try to get the other fellow's point of view, it was misunderstood; no wilfully, I think, but misconstrued. Wha I said was that, in such a world a this at present we could not expect jus tice.

"That remark was interpreted to mea that I did not want justice. Everybo wants justice, for others as well as f himself, unless he is a dunce. But doubt if he invariably gets it.

"We get things that we don't deser and we deserve things that we don't ge

"What I said was that we cannot 'expect' justice, and what I meant to convey was that the most any of us can do is the best we can in those circumstances in which we find ourselves.

CHARACTER THE ONLY ASSET.

"For myself, I look for a way out of the difficulty by profit-sharing. What both sides, laborer and capitalist, need to remember is that we are all in this thing together, and that neither can get along without the other. We're all going in the same procession, and whether we go to heaven or to smash, we'll all go together."

Major Higginson is asked, in conclusion, what word he has for the plain, work-a-day young men who have their way to make and their livings to earn to-day—to the men who, in short, make up the Boston of which he is accounted the leading citizen.

"Just this," replies the major: "Let each make the best use of the chance he has, and do the best he can in the circumstances in which he is placed. Better them if he can; but remember that the only asset anybody has is character.

"No single person amounts to much. I don't amount to much, and you don't amount to much. We are only little pebbles on a great beach where there are plenty more. It is all together that we count."

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2

Here's a how-d'ye-do such as Julius Cæsar never fancied when he found all Gaul divided in "partes tres." A symphony No. 4, in C major, by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, announced at to-day's Philharmonic "for the first time in America," is reannounced at next week's Boston Symphony matinee here "for the first time in New York." If the one statement is in error, so is the other. Ropartz's work was played as a novelty in Boston on Oct. 23 last.

E

GHTING IN THE AUSTRIAN TRENCHES

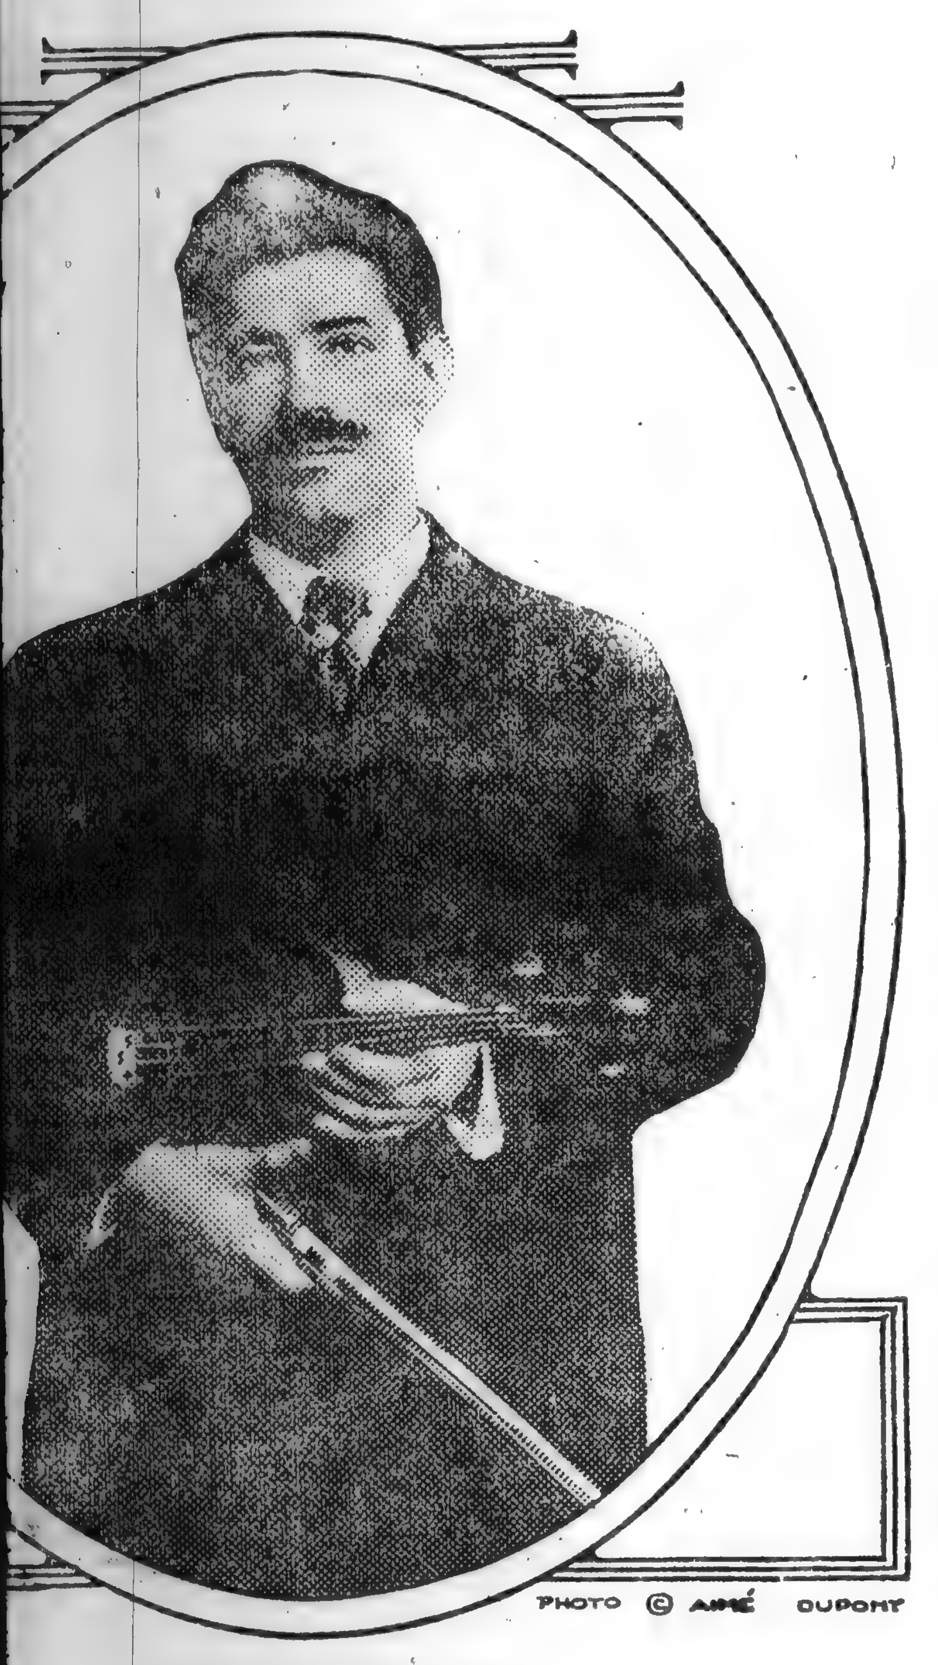

PHOTO © AIMÉ DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER

Finds That Bitter Hatred for Enemy Is Tempered When Meeting Face to Face in Battle.

ieir devotion to
is why it has times when peocould they take m fight?" They ink it worthy of an Austrian. As the last thing I lin or that I had

e trenches were a mathematician
d nobody asked e or cared. We ept the work we uld I claim immunity as an artist?

"I have seen people whose houses stood in the way of our artillery fire and therefore had to be razed, put the torch to the houses cheerfully themselves. I, too, lost everything I had invested in the regions touched by the fighting.

"Before the war we thought the human race had deteriorated. We often said so. We thought it had gone tango mad and destroyed itself in frivolities. But the war proved among all the nations engaged that the race is just as sturdy as it ever was. There is that side to it.

"I have seen acts of the most tender sympathy and kindness, and real heroism, with my own eyes, go hand-in-hand with grim, stalking war.

"For instance, it was good to see that the hatred of one foe for another was only an impersonal thing. In the mass we hated our enemy, but as soon as we were confronted with him in person, all was kindness to the individual. I have seen emaciated Austrian soldiers—and I well know how long it had been since they had had enough to eat—hand a crust of bread to a Russian prisoner.

"Then there were innumerable little incidents of the honoring of bravery in a foe. We took one trench, for instance, after the enemy had put up a gallant fight. The first act was a salute to the foe in acknowledgment of his bravery. And there were the little things like returning the arms of an officer who had fought well but been forced to surrender by the fortunes of war.

"There were all those fine flowers of courtesy to show that, perhaps, after all, it was not utterly brutal and primeval, but that finer feelings had survived and been culivated.

"I remember once that a Russian officer tottered out of one of their trenches waving a rag on the end of his sword. The firing ceased. He came to our lines. Under his arm was a bottle of wine. He said he had had nothing to eat for five days and could stand it no longer, and proposed that we exchange some bread for his wine. We scraped together some mildewed pieces of bread and gave them to him. He stumbled back to his lines. He had spoken to us and we to him, and I remember we gave him a handful of cigarettes for his comrades. When he got back to his trenches the firing was resumed, but there had been an unofficial truce for twenty minutes.

"The next morning, I am sorry to say, I stumbled across his dead body.

"The acts of heroism were innumerable, of course. I remember a case where three soldiers were sent with a very important message to the division commander, in the hope that one of them would get through. They had to cross an open space where they were exposed to a heavy fire, and progress was impeded by barbed-wire entanglements charged with electricity. They had to cut their way through this with insulated wire cutters. Two of them were shot dead. The third found himself nearly through when his arm, which had been shot badly, caught in the entanglement and he could not get it out. Thereupon the soldier drew his bayonet and finished the work the enemy's fire had begun, amputating his arm himself. He got clear and delivered his message.

Saved by His Orderly.

"I have seen artillery caught in an exposed place and the horses killed. The men who tried to work the guns were shot down; then the non-commissioned officers went, and, finally, there were none left but the officers to fire the guns. But they kept at it. The instances of devotion of soldiers to officers under fire were numerous.

"Without doubt, I owe my life to my orderly. The trenches my regiment was holding were rushed by the Cossacks on the night of Sept. 6. The cavalry only dares attack intrenched infantry at night, when they have some protection from rifle fire. It was about 11:30 when they attacked us.

"I can remember being hit by one horse and knocked down. While I lay I saw a second Cossack reach down to finish me. He got me in the hip, but as he struck me I fired my revolver. I remember seeing him fall and the riderless horse gallop on. Then I became unconscious.

"My orderly retired with the rest of the company. After the fighting had moved on he came back and started to look for me, using a pocket flash lamp to examine the faces of the dead and wounded. He says that several times he was nearly caught by Cossack patrols, but escaped by dropping to the ground, where he was taken for wounded or dead. He found me about 3 A. M., so I must have been lying there about nine hours.

Vienna's War-Time Mood.

"The report of my death originated through a mistake of the surgeon. Next to me in the hospital was lying a man who was dying. After the surgeon had looked at him an officer in the hospital said, 'Did you know that was Kreisler, the violinist?' The surgeon thought he referred to my neighbor, and when he unfortunately died, reported my death.

"I was in the hospital three weeks after reaching Vienna. Then I took the cure at the sulphur springs near Carlsbad. After this a commission of surgeons examined me and pronounced me unfit for further military duty. My trampled shoulder has healed and does not bother me much now. I suppose I will always retain at least a stiffness in my leg, however."

At the doorway the interviewer, who had caught Mrs. Kreisler alone, endeavored to find out how her husband had distinguished himself.

"He didn't do anything more than anyone else," she said: "just what they were all doing, their duty. But there was one thing. The men of his company, before he left, expressed their gratitude for his special consideration of them. It seems he had a habit of doing outpost duty for some of them. There were several other sick ones who ate at his dinner at his own request, and on the march he carried the equipment of another. He argued that they were under a disadvantage in having heavy knapsacks to carry, and he was stronger and better able to bear fatigue anyway."

All of which adds something to the picture of the great violinist as a soldier.

Later I came here. I wasn't wanted;
es were bad. But I did my share;
by and by they improved. Then e two or three wonderfully good years, my peaceful business of life began.

MONEY ONLY FOR WHAT IT CAN DO.

I have never cared about accumulatmoney. I have cared about making because of what one can do with it.
Suppose a man accumulates a fore of $30,000,000. He dies. What good t to him? If people would only real-that what pays the highest return the human dividend!

'I think Mr. Carnegie is getting some-ng out of his money—some durable isfactions.

"The notion of the Symphony Orches-was with me vaguely in the 50's, en I was in Europe, with no very clear a of what I was going to do. I saw rope enjoying all its art and music, d felt my own country to be pretty or in such things.

"And it was. It was pretty barren of joyments in those days; dull. Meet-g Mrs. Kemble in London one time, she marked to me: 'You have planted a ower in a cornfield,' which was about y intention.

"It was not until after those two good usiness years that I saw myself in a osition to do the thing I had had in ind so long before.

"Since then, one thing has led to an-ther. The great thing about doing one hing well is that it gets you a chance o do something else—the same way.
Facts have come up which had to be aced, and I have been called to help ace them. It is at such times that you earn the importance and the unimpor-ance of money.

"I remember we had a particularly dif-icult situation to face here in the city a number of years ago, to relieve which involved spending a great deal of money.
'What shall we do?' they asked. 'Spend it,' said I, 'In Heaven's name, spend it.
What is money for?'

"And thus, as the years go on, one feels that the time is growing short, and, if he is going to get things done, he must be about it. Bad economy; but it does get things done.

"Was the country more democratic when I was a young man? I do not think it can be doubted that it was. Things were simpler then—complicated as they looked to young eyes.

"I have spoken of how earnestly we thought and felt about the questions which were confronting the country then; there is just as much and more for us to think of to-day. We have said that we can get along without kings and emperors and dukes to rule us; that we can govern ourselves. Well, let's do it.

"That is a job which is going to require enormous thought and patience and effort, and even sacrifice. Democracy is anything but simple, and if you young men can see a way out of our labor difficulties, you will be cleverer fellows than we have been.

"When I wrote that article which appeared in the Survey last winter, to ask that people try to get the other fellow's point of view, it was misunderstood; not wilfully, I think, but misconstrued. What I said was that, in such a world as this at present we could not expect justice.

"That remark was interpreted to mean that I did not want justice. Everybody wants justice, for others as well as for himself, unless he is a dunce. But I doubt if he invariably gets it.

"We get things that we don't deserve, and we deserve things that we don't get.

"What I said was that we cannot 'expect' justice, and what I meant to convey was that the most any of us can do is the best we can in those circumstances in which we find ourselves.

CHARACTER THE ONLY ASSET.

"For myself, I look for a way out of the difficulty by profit-sharing. What both sides, laborer and capitalist, need to remember is that we are all in this thing together, and that neither can get along without the other. We're all going in the same procession, and whether we go to heaven or to smash, we'll all go together."

Major Higginson is asked, in conclusion, what word he has for the plain, work-a-day young men who have their way to make and their livings to earn to-day—to the men who, in short, make up the Boston of which he is accounted the leading citizen.

"Just this," replies the major: "Let each make the best use of the chance he has, and do the best he can in the circumstances in which he is placed. Better them if he can; but remember that the only asset anybody has is character.

"No single person amounts to much. I don't amount to much, and you don't amount to much. We are only little pebbles on a great beach where there are plenty more. It is all together that we count."

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV [illegible]

Here's a how-d'ye-do such as Julius Cæsar never fancied when he found all Gaul divided in "partes tres." A symphony No. 4, in C major, by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, announced at to-day's Philharmonic "for the first time in America," is reannounced at next week's Boston Symphony matinee here "for the first time in New York." If the one statement is in error, so is the other. Ropartz's work was played as a novelty in Boston on Oct. 23 last.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An early work of Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. This is the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," in which Strauss gives the first real evidence of what afterwards was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. After its first performance in Munich in 1887, Strauss wrote to his uncle:

"The performance of my Italian fantasia has evoked a great uproar here—general stupefaction and rage—because I now begin to go my own way, provide my own form and cause lazy persons mental perplexity." The last movement, which is a bit wild, and is built on the Neapolitan folk life, called forth some sharp hissing, which pleased Strauss tremendously, for he wrote to von Bulow, "it marked the first step toward independence." But this was twenty-seven years ago, and what displeased the conservatives then is "milk for babes" now.

The soloist will be Harold Bauer, pianist, who then makes his first appearance of the season. He will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

E, 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 29 1914

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will be unusually generous in novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme and Thursday evening's symphony has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The

Es, 1884

Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4 .... Sibelius
Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl" .... Reznicek
(First time in New York.)
Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare, ... Scheinpflug

The incidental tenor role in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy." .... Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 4, in C major (in one movement) .... Ropartz
(First time in New York.)
Overture, "Edmont" .... Beethoven

Jan Sickesz, the Dutch pianist, will play in Aeolian Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 17.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date NOV 29 1914

Reznicek's "Schlemihl."

Dr. Muck at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, will offer two works new to New York. These are Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," which will be played on Thursday evening, and Ropartz's fourth symphony in C major, which will be played Saturday afternoon. Of both of these works Dr. Muck gave the first performances in America—of the "Schlemihl" last April and of Ropartz's symphony last month. Of the two the "Schlemihl" is the more important.

Reznicek, who for a number of years has played a more or less important role in music in Austria and Germany, is best known in this country as the composer of the successful opera, "Donna Diana," the overture of which is often found on orchestral programmes. He has composed other works, some of which have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but up to the writing of his "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," "Schlemihl" was quite the most important piece he had written for orchestra. It was first performed at the third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Oskar Fried, in Berlin, December 18, 1912. Since then it has been played in Munich and Vienna, and last April in Boston. Reznicek has obviously taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice, and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued misfortune, who goes to destructio the conflict between his ideal and material existence

1884

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 29 1914

An early work by Richard Strauss will be the principal number in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert this season, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday at 8:15 o'clock, under the joint auspices of the Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The composition is his Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy." It is very melodious, and, according to modern standards, very simple. The titles of the four parts are "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." In his work he records musically his deep impressions in 1886, when he first visited Italy. There he sketched out the "Fantasia," and it had its first performance at a subscription concert in the Odeon, Munich, on March 2, 1887. Regarding the performance, Strauss wrote to his uncle: "The performance of my Italian Fantasia has evoked a great uproar here—general stupefaction and rage; because I now begin to go my own way, provide my own form and cause lazy persons mental perplexity." The last movement, which is a bit wild and is built on the Neapolitan folk-life, called forth some sharp hissing, which pleased Strauss tremendously.

The soloist will be the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, who then makes his first appearance of the season here. He will play the "Fourth Concerto" of Beethoven, in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

k, 1884

BOSTO[illegible] DECEMBER 6

HOW GREAT WAR HITS FA

Eugene Ysaye, With Three Sons at Front, Loses Home in Fall of Ostend, but Saves

Eugene Ysaye, Belgian violinist, driven out of Ostend when the Germans invaded the territory.

Efrem Zimbalist, Russion violinist, who is forced to stay in New York because of the war.

The European war has demanded a heavy toll of world-famous violinists.

Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian master of the violin, has three sons in the war, and he himself has lost a $50,000 home in the fall of Ostend.

Jacques Thibaut, premier violinist of France, is in the French army, and not a word has come from his regiment, which is known to have been in the thickest of the fighting.

Fritz Kreisler is in America with his wife, after being wounded, but he still can play the violin as well as ever.

Mischa Elman and Efrem Zimbalist, two Russian boys who are in the front rank as violinists, are both held in New York by reason of the war.

Elman is living luxuriously during a $100,000 vacation of seven months, afforded because of the inability of people abroad to keep their contract with him.

Zimbalist is now playing in New York and probably will continue until the war is over.

The hardest sort of an experience fell to the lot of Ysaye.

A short time before the war the famous virtuoso purchased a villa at Knocke, near Ostend, and remained there even after the fall of Antwerp. It was not until the Germans etablished themselves at Ostend that he decided to leave his new home.

In telling of Ysaye's flight, some friends say that he and two companions managed to secure a small fishing boat to take them to Dunkirk. They spent the night in their little craft without food and with no protection from the weather.

Ysaye was able to bring away only a few belongings, but these included his priceless violin. He was forced to leave many beautiful objects of art and some unique mementoes collected during his triumphal appearances in every country of the world.

Jacques Thibaut, the greatest violinist in all France, seems to have been lost entirely. His regiment was known to have become engaged with the Germans about 250 miles from Paris and heavy losses have been reported from the section they were in when last heard from.

Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian artist, seems to have struck it luckiest from the war. All told the struggle will mean about $100,000 easy money for him and a long vacation.

Just now he is spending his time playing chess in New York and going to hear the masters. He plans to hear Kreisler next week and already has played the part of audience many times for his bosom friend, Efrem Zimbalist.

Elman Burning the Candle

Elman has sent for his relatives and will put them in a beautiful "up-town" residence, while he himself continues to occupy expensive bachelor quarters in a "down-town" hotel.

Fritz Kreisler, famous violinist, and wife, who tell of service on the Austrian battlefields. Kreisler was injured in battle with the Cossacks and his wife went along as nurse. From a recent photo taken at the front.

Although but 18 years old he has money to burn and is burning it.

Every morning sees him up early for a constitutional. Every afternoon he goes for a horseback ride in Central Park and then retires to his quarters for a game of chess. In musical circles these chess games have become famous.

WORLD

Address: New York City

Date NOV 29 1914

Establi

Boston Symphony.

An orchestral work new to this city will be on each of the concert programmes to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck's direction. In addition to this bit of generosity there will be a symphony at the Thursday concert, which has been so little heard here as to constitute a novelty. The first programme entire is as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4..........Sibelius
Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl"....Reznicek
(First time in New York.)
Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare..Scheinpflug
(The incidental tenor solo in "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.)

The Saturday afternoon programme is this:

Symphony Fantasy, "From Italy"..Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 4 in C major (in one movement), Ropartz
(First time in New York.)
Overture, "Egmont"..............Beethoven

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date NOV 29 1914

Es

884

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, respectively. Dr. Muck will be unusually generous in the matter of novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme and on Thursday evening the symphony which will be played has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4, Sibelius; Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl," (first time in New York), Reznicek; Overture to a comedy by Shakespeare, Scheinpflug.

The incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," Richard Strauss; Symphony No. 4 in C major (in one movement), (first time in New York), Ropartz; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

Address: New York City

Date NOV 29 1914

rk, 1884

An early work of Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 4, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. This is his symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and in this work Strauss gives the first real evidence of what afterward was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. Certainly for the modern hearer there is nothing particularly uncommon or difficult in this work. As a matter of fact, it is very melodious and according to modern standards very simple. "From Italy" is in four parts, the titles of which are, in the order in which they come: "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." The soloist will be the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, who then makes his first appearance of the season. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

HOW GREAT WAR HITS FA

Eugene Ysaye, With Three Sons at Front, Loses Home in Fall of Ostend, but Saves

Eugene Ysaye, Belgian violinist, driven out of Ostend when the Germans invaded the territory.

Efrem Zimbalist, Russion violinist, who is forced to stay in New York because of the war.

Fritz Kreisler, famous violinist, and wife, who tell of service on the Austrian battlefields. Kreisler was injured in battle with the Cossacks and his wife went along as nurse. From a recent photo taken at the front.

The European war has demanded a heavy toll of world-famous violinists.

Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian master of the violin, has three sons in the war, and he himself has lost a $50,000 home in the fall of Ostend.

Jacques Thibaut, premier violinist of France, is in the French army, and not a word has come from his regiment, which is known to have been in the thickest of the fighting.

Fritz Kreisler is in America with his wife, after being wounded, but he still can play the violin as well as ever.

Mischa Elman and Efrem Zimbalist, two Russian boys who are in the front rank as violinists, are both held in New York by reason of the war.

Elman is living luxuriously during a $100,000 vacation of seven months, afforded because of the inability of people abroad to keep their contract with him.

Zimbalist is now playing in New York and probably will continue until the war is over.

The hardest sort of an experience fell to the lot of Ysaye.

A short time before the war the famous virtuoso purchased a villa at Knocke, near Ostend, and remained there even after the fall of Antwerp. It was not until the Germans etablished themselves at Ostend that he decided to leave his new home.

In telling of Ysaye's flight, some friends say that he and two companions managed to secure a small fishing boat to take them to Dunkirk. They spent the night in their little craft without food and with no protection from the weather.

Ysaye was able to bring away only a few belongings, but these included his priceless violin. He was forced to leave many beautiful objects of art and some unique mementoes collected during his triumphal appearances in every country of the world.

Jacques Thibaut, the greatest violinist in all France, seems to have been lost entirely. His regiment was known to have become engaged with the Germans about 250 miles from Paris and heavy losses have been reported from the section they were in when last heard from.

Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian artist, seems to have struck it luckiest from the war. All told the struggle will mean about $100,000 easy money for him and a long vacation.

Just now he is spending his time playing chess in New York and going to hear the masters. He plans to hear Kreisler next week and already has played the part of audience many times for his bosom friend, Efrem Zimbalist.

Elman Burning the Candle

Elman has sent for his relatives and will put them in a beautiful "up-town" residence, while he himself continues to occupy expensive bachelor quarters in a "down-town" hotel.

Although but 18 years old he has money to burn and is burning it.

Every morning sees him up early for a constitutional. Every afternoon he goes for a horseback ride in Central Park and then retires to his quarters for a game of chess. In musical circles these chess games have become famous.

ORLD

Address: New York City

Date

Establi

Boston Symphony.

An orchestral work new to this city will be on each of the concert programmes to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck's direction. In addition to this bit of generosity there will be a symphony at the Thursday concert, which has been so little heard here as to constitute a novelty. The first programme entire is as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4..........Sibelius
Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl".....Reznicek
(First time in New York.)
Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare..Scheinpflug
(The incidental tenor solo in "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.)

The Saturday afternoon programme is this:

Symphony Fantasy, "From Italy"..Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 4 in C major (in one movement). Ropartz
(First time in New York.)
Overture, "Egmont"..................Beethoven

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date NOV 29 1914

Es

884

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, respectively. Dr. Muck will be unusually generous in the matter of novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme and on Thursday evening the symphony which will be played has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 4, Sibelius; Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl," (first time in New York), Reznicek; Overture to a comedy by Shakespeare, Scheinpflug.

The incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," Richard Strauss; Symphony No. 4 in C major (in one movement), (first time in New York), Ropartz; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

Address: New York City

Date

rk, 1884

An early work of Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 4, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. This is his symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and in this work Strauss gives the first real evidence of what afterward was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. Certainly for the modern hearer there is nothing particularly uncommon or difficult in this work. As a matter of fact, it is very melodious and according to modern standards very simple. "From Italy" is in four parts, the titles of which are, in the order in which they come: "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." The soloist will be the eminent pianist Harold Bauer, who then makes his first appearance of the season. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

1914

MOUS VIOLINISTS

Violin—Kreisler Wounded but Still Able to Play

Jacques Thibaut, French violinist, who is reported killed in an engagement 250 miles from Paris (at left). Mischa Elman, Russian, now in New York as result of the war (at right).

Address: New York City

Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

AN early work of Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the programme of the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. This is his Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," and in the work Strauss gives the first real evidence of what afterward was to become his wide divergence from the musical conventions and traditions. eCrtainly for the modern hearer there is notihng particularly uncommon or difficult in this work. It is very melodious and according to modern standards very simple.

"From Italy" is in four parts, the titles of which are, in order, "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore in Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk Life.' In this work Strauss records musically the deep impressions he received in 1886 when he made his first trip to Italy. It was while he was there that he sketched the Fantasia. and it had its first performance at a subscription concert in the Odeon, Munich, March 2, 1887.

The soloist will be the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, who then makes his first appearance of the season. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in G Major. The final number will be Beethovens Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

The first chamber music concert of the season by the Flonzaley String Quartette under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, will be given in the Music Hall, Academy of Music, this afternoon at half-past three o'clock. The remaining dates in this series of three concerts are January 24 and March 14. The programme this afternoon will be quartette in G major, Op. 17, No. 5, by Haydn; quartette in E flat major, Op. 30, by Tschaikowsky, and "intime, contenu" and "Rythmique," by Darius Milhaud (from the String Quartette).

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date 1 1914

Programme Books and Carnegie Hall.

CARNEGIE HALL is by many persons supposed to be one of the benefactions of the man after whom it is named. It is, on the contrary, run for profit on the strictest commercial lines. Joseph Pulitzer left the Philharmonic Society nearly a million dollars, but the interest on that sum is nearly all needed just to pay rent for the use of the hall for concerts and rehearsals. No one ha[illegible] right to complain of that; business is business; but one wonders why Mr. Carnegie, who has shown himself so very generous in other directions, does not add a most desirable benefaction by making this hall free to America's oldest and best orchestra. In any case, it ought to be possible to make an arrangement enabling the Philharmonic Society, and also the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to distribute their excellent programme books, which add so much to the enjoyment of most concert-goers, within the building, which distribution is now forbidden, for purely business reasons, connected with advertising. This, surely is unworthy of the chief concert hall in the American metropolis. The matter has been aggravated this season by a city ordinance forbidding the distribution of dodgers in the streets. In itself this is a most commendable measure, for it helps to keep the sidewalks clean; but it is unjust to apply this ordinance to the men who, for several years, have distributed the Philharmonic's and the Boston Orchestra's programme books from the street corner opposite the entrance to Carnegie Hall. These books are taken only by those who want to read them, and are never thrown on the sidewalk. They are now placed in a row near a building and the men who used to distribute them are still allowed to call attention to them. Even that privilege will, no doubt, be taken

---

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BROOKLYN EDIT

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Strauss' Great Work to Be Played Here

The work which first intimated to the world that Richard Strauss was an unusual genius will open the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, under the auspicies of The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. This is his Symphonic Fantasy, "In Italy," in which the young Strauss sought, and with astounding success, to translate into tone the sensations he received during his first visit to that country.

The soloist at this concert will be Harold Bauer, the noted pianist, who will play Beethoven's Fourth Doncerto in G major. The other number on the programme will be Beethoven's

[68]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date NOV 28 1914

At its Carnegie Hall concert next Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play, besides the fourth symphony of Sibelius and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespeare Comedy," a novelty composed by Reznicek and called "Schlemihl," a "symphonic biography." The Saturday afternoon programme will include Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the fourth symphony of Ropartz, which the Philharmonic played yesterday. Reznicek's Schlemihl was first performed in Berlin two years ago. The composer is said to have taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice, and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading, in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis, and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. In the course of the work the compo[illegible]trays the man at his b

---

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 29 1914

Dr. Muck at the first concert of the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will offer a work new to New York. This is Reznicek's Symphonic Biography, "Schlemihl," which will be played on Thursday evening. At the concert on Saturday afternoon Ropartz's Fourth Symphony in C major will be played. Of both of these works Dr. Muck gave the first performances in America—of the "Schlemihl" last April and of Ropartz's symphony last month in Boston. Of the two the "Schlemihl" is the more important. The work demands an orchestra of largest size and is played without pause; it is divided into four sections. Sibelius's interesting Fourth Symphony in A minor and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" complete the Thursday night programme, while on Saturday afternoon besides the Ropartz symphony, which is in one movement, Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy "In Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont" will be played. The order of the two programmes is as follows: Sibelius, symphony in A minor, No. 4; Reznicek, symphonic biograph[illegible] "S[illegible]emihl" (first time in New York); Sch[illegible]g, Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare. The incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's 'Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper. Richard Strauss, symphonic fantasy, "From Italy"; Ropartz, symphony No. 4 in C major (in one movement); Beethoven, overture, "Egmont."

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date V 29 1914

NEW WORK BY REZNICEK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert Thursday evening a "symphonic biography" called "Schlemihl" by Reznicek, a composer who for a number of years has played a more or less important rôle in music in Austria and Germany. He is best known in this country as the composer of the opera, "Donna Diana," the overture of which is often found on orchestral programmes. He has composed other works, some of which have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but up to the writing of his "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," "Schlemihl" was the most important piece he had written for orchestra.

It was first performed at the third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Oskar Fried, in Berlin, Dec. 18, 1912. Since then it has been played in Munich and Vienna, and last April in Boston.

Reznicek has obviously taken Richard Strauss, in a general way, for his model. The work demands an orchestra of largest size, includes a short solo for tenor voice, and may employ an organ. Its title is misleading in so far as there is no connection with Peter Schlemihl, the hero of Chamisso's familiar tale, who lost his shadow. Reznicek has made his own analysis and says that this poem is intended to portray in tones the life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. In the course of the work the composer portrays the man at his best and at his worst, carries him through a fantastical orgy, in the trio of which the figures of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures, "A Comedy of Marionettes," enter—the female dancer, the mad flute player, the leader and the marionette orchestra, the humpbacked dwarf, and the singing woman. Then he is restored to respectability. He has a wife. There is a love scene, a wedding, and a child appears; and then the old struggle begins over again.

The character of the haughty man, disdainful of outside help relying upon himself is not suited to the contemporaneous bustle. Desperate struggles and exhaustion—a short breathing spell—recollections of happy hours—sickness—forebodings of death—the only consolation — disaster has the upper

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 29 1914

Est 1884

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck hat für das kommende Konzertpaar des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters am 3. und 5. Dezember die folgenden Programme aufgeſtellt. Am Donnerstag Abend dirigirt er die Vierte Symphonie von Sibelius, Reznicek, „Symphoniſche Biographie“, „Schlemihl“ (neu) und Scheinpflug's Ouverture „zu einer Komödie von Shakeſpeare“. Das Tenorſolo in der Novität ſingt Herr Paul Draper. Das Programm für Samstag Nachmittag iſt Richard Strauß' „Aus Italien“, Ropartz' Symphonie No. 4 in einem Satz, und Beethoven's „Egmont“-Ouvertüre.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 28 1914

Established

BOOKS NOT OF FICTION.

Dealing With History, Labor, Men, Monuments and Race Culture.

Among books of the moment appealing to special interests is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton-Mifflin Company), an historical sketch by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. The book is illustrated by portraits of leaders and concert-masters, pictures of the orchestra as a body at various periods, and, for a frontispiece, a photographic reproduction of a bust of the founder, Henry L. Higginson. Of great interest and value, in an appendix, is a list of soloists who have appeared with the orchestra during the whole period 1881-1913-14.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 29 1914

York, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, respectively. Dr. Muck will be generous in the matter of novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme, and on Thurs[illegible] the symphony which will be played has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Sibelius Symphony in A Minor, No. 4; Reznicek, symphonic biography, "Schlemihl" (first time in New York).Scheinpflug, overture to a comedy by Shakespeare; the incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Richard Strauss, symphonic fantasy, "From Italy"; Ropartz, Symphony No. 4 in C Major (in one movement). (First time in New York.) Beethoven, overture, "Egmont."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 28 1914

Esta 84

A noted Boston institution, the organization that took the place of the Great Organ in maintaining Boston's musical preeminence, has now been in existence for a third of a century and M. A. De Wolfe Howe writes its history in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin Company.) It happens, too, that this year marks the completion of eighty years of life for Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder and steady supporter of the orchestra. The author gives a brief sketch of Major Higginson and his fondness for music, he gives some account of earlier instrumental efforts in Boston, though he is too young to remember the Mendelssohn Quintette, and then settles down to tell about the Symphony orchestra from its beginnings in 1881 under George Henschel. It is a straightforward, temperate account of an enterprise that has greatly advanced music in the United States, besides lifting Boston up into a higher sphere of its own. At the end are lists of the musicians who have taken part in the orchestra, whether as directors, soloists or simply members, with their term of service, and also lists of all the compositions the orchestra has rendered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 1 29 1914

York, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second Brooklyn concert Friday evening in the Academy of Music. Harold Bauer, who will play Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, will be soloist. Among the numbers on the programme are Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 1 29 1914

Esta 1884

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively. Dr. Muck will present a work new to New York on each programme. The Thursday evening programme will include Sibelius's Symphony in A minor, No. 4; Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography," "Schlemihl," first time in New York; and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare." The incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper. The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy"; Ropartz's Symphony No. 4 in C (in one movement), first time in New York. and Beethoven's Overture, "Egmont."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 28 1914

E 1884

At the end of the week come two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first with highly original programme, consisting of the Libelius fourth symphony, Reznicke's new "Schlemihl" and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare," and the second flanking the latest symphony of Guy Ropartz with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," by Richard Strauss.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC

Establis

Though a programme note on Reznicek's "Schlemihl" says it has nothing to do with the case, a good many people who hear to-night's "symphonic biography" by the Bostonians are going to find an analogy to a minor character, Schlemihl, in Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann," last seen recently at the Century.

Reznicek is an Austrian hitherto known as the composer of an opera, "Donna Diana," of which the overture is sometimes played. He has just written a "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger." His "Schlemihl," first performed at the Berlin Philharmonic by Oskar Fried in December, 1912, has been heard at Munich and Vienna and last April in Boston. It calls for an orchestra of largest size, is continuous in four parts, has a short solo for tenor voice and may employ an organ. Its title is vague, as there is no direct connection with Peter Schlemihl, hero of Chamisso's story, who "lost his shadow."

In his own analysis the composer says he intended to portray the life and fate of "a modern man pursued by misfortune," who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. The music shows the man at his best and worst. It carries him through a fantastical orgy in which appear the figures of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures, "A Comedy of Marionettes," the female dancer, the mad flute player, conductor and marionette orchestra, the humpbacked dwarf, and singing woman.

Then he is restored to respectability. He has a wife. There is a love scene, a wedding, and a child appears, yet the old struggle begins over again. The character of the haughty man, disdainful of outside help, relying upon himself, is not suited to the contemporaneous bustle. There follow desperate struggles and exhaustion, a short breathing spell, recollections of happy hours, sickness and disaster, forebodings of death, the only consolation.

From abysmal depths rises the voice of fate, and there is a prayer. Once more, for the last time, the vanquished man raises himself to superhuman height, and then, seized with disgust, lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

Sibelius's interesting fourth symphony opens to-night's concert and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" ends it.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1914
Date

Es 1884

A REAL MUSICAL TREAT.

Splendid Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A novelty by a master, played by a master orchestra, is always appreciated, especially so when performed by such a splendid body as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night proved no exception to the rule. The symphonic phantasy, "From Italy," an early work of the German genius, Richard Strauss, had first call on the audience's attention and proved an agreeable surprise because of its freedom from the strange and not always agreeable orchestral innovations that are looked for in the work of Strauss.

This number consists of four movements, "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk Life." That the composer showed evidence of radical changes in musical form is clearly noticeable throughout the entire number, particularly in "Neapolitan Folk Life." Dr. Muck's reading was one of splendid precision and brought out every desired expressive note.

In this age of "artistic temperament," displayed by the master pianists of various nationalities, it is refreshing to sit through a number played by Harold Bauer, an eminent artist, absolutely devoid of everything excepting those qualities that tend to bring out the highest achievements of piano playing. Mr. Bauer was the soloist last night and performed the extremely difficult Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in magnificent style. His technique was a revelation in exacting precision and the poetic and sympathetic Beethoven lost nothing in his interpretation.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, long familiar to concert devotees. Like many other of that master's earlier works, this number is beautiful in its melodic construction and it is hardly necessary to say that the Boston Symphony performed it splendidly.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City. 1914
Date

Estal 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS EXCELLENTLY

Programme Slightly Better than That of Last Thursday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra deserves well of the New York public. Its concerts have always given unlimited and well considered pleasure to all music lovers, and have been red letter events of the musical season. Yet there must be reason for pause when we consider the two last programmes Dr. Muck has vouchsafed us. The musical observers have already spoken of the one of Thursday evening—the one of yesterday afternoon was only slightly more inspiriting. Needless to say, the band played with all its wonted excellence, and Dr. Muck held the will of his musicians obedient to his slightest nod. Of this part of the afternoon only praise can be spoken.

As on Thursday, there were only three numbers on the programme. Richard Strauss's none too interesting or important Symphonic Fantasia "From Italy" opened the afternoon, then came Ropartz's Fourth Symphony, the programme concluding with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was stated on the programme that the Ropartz symphony was receiving its first performance in New York. The ways of conductors are past finding out, as are their reasons for repeating works. It is sufficient to say that this particular symphony received its first New York performance last week by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. Stransky thus beating out Dr. Muck. As to the value of this triumph there might be various opinions.

The Ropartz symphony is altogether in the vein of César Franck, without the Belgian composer's incisiveness of spirit. Played in only one movement, it fails to make any marked differentiation between its various parts, with the result that at the end the listener is very much at a loss as to what it is all about. It possesses, indeed, not a little melodic invention, yet the invention smells too much of the lamp to be altogether free and spontaneous. Clever as it is in its technical mastery, it seems doubtful whether it possesses the sweep or originality of idea to make it a permanent adition to the concert halls. However, this, like all else, is in the lap of the gods. By giving it, Dr. Muck at least proved his belief in the neutrality of art.

[69]

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

Date NOV 2 9 1914

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck hat für das kommende Konzertpaar des Boſtoner Symphnie-Orcheſters am 3. und 5. Dezember die folgenden Programme aufgeſtellt. Am Donnerstag Abend dirigirt er die Vierte Symphonie von Sibelius, Reznicek, „Symphoniſche Biographie“, „Schlemihl“ (neu) und Scheinpflug's Ouverture „zu einer Komödie von Shakeſpeare“. Das Tenorſolo in der Novität ſingt Herr Paul Draper. Das Programm für Samstag Nachmittag iſt Richard Strauß' „Aus Italien“, Ropartz' Symphonie No. 4 in einem Satz, und Beethoven's „Egmont“-Ouvertüre.

Est 1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City

Date 9 1914

BOOKS NOT OF FICTION.

Dealing With History, Labor, Men, Monuments and Race Culture.

Established:

Among books of the moment appealing to special interests is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton-Mifflin Company), an historical sketch by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. The book is illustrated by portraits of leaders and concert-masters, pictures of the orchestra as a body at various periods, and, for a frontispiece, a photographic reproduction of a bust of the founder, Henry L. Higginson. Of great interest and value, in an appendix, is a list of soloists who have appeared with the orchestra during the whole period 1881-1913-14.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.

Date [illegible]14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, respectively. Dr. Muck will be generous in the matter of novelties, for there will be a work new to New York on each programme, and on Thursday evening the symphony which will be played has been heard so little and is of such unusual interest that it may be regarded almost as a novelty. The Thursday evening programme will be as follows:

Bibelius Symphony in A Minor, No. 4; Reznicek, symphonic biography, "Schlemihl" (first time in New York).Scheinpflug, overture to a comedy by Shakespeare; the incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Richard Strauss, symphonic fantasy, "From Italy"; Ropartz, Symphony No. 4 in C Major (in one movement). (First time in New York.) Beethoven, overture, "Egmont."

York, 1884

Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date 3 1914

A noted Boston institution, the organization that took the place of the Great Organ in maintaining Boston's musical preeminence, has now been in existence for a third of a century and M. A. De Wolfe Howe writes its history in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin Company.) It happens, too, that this year marks the completion of eighty years of life for Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder and steady supporter of the orchestra. The author gives a brief sketch of Major Higginson and his fondness for music, he gives some account of earlier instrumental efforts in Boston, though he is too young to remember the Mendelssohn Quintette, and then settles down to tell about the Symphony orchestra from its beginnings in 1881 under George Henschel. It is a straightforward, temperate account of an enterprise that has greatly advanced music in the United States, besides lifting Boston up into a higher sphere of its own. At the end are lists of the musicians who have taken part in the orchestra, whether as directors, soloists or simply members, with their term of service, and also lists of all the compositions the orchestra has rendered.

Estal 184

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

From
Address: New York City

Date 1 29 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second Brooklyn concert Friday evening in the Academy of Music. Harold Bauer, who will play Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, will be soloist. Among the numbers on the programme are Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

From
Address: New York City

Date 1 29 1914

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively. Dr. Muck will present a work new to New York on each programme. The Thursday evening programme will include Sibelius's Symphony in A minor, No. 4; Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography," "Schlemihl," first time in New York; and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare." The incidental tenor solo in Reznicek's "Schlemihl" will be sung by Paul Draper. The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy"; Roparts's Symphony No. 4 in C (in one movement), first time in New York. and Beethoven's Overture, "Egmont."

Esta 1884

Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.

Date

At the end of the week come two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first with highly original programme, consisting of the Libelius fourth symphony, Reznicke's new "Schlemihl" and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare," and the second flanking the latest symphony of Guy Ropartz with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," by Richard Strauss.

E 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City

Date

Though a programme note on Reznicek's "Schlemihl" says it has nothing to do with the case, a good many people who hear to-night's "symphonic biography" by the Bostonians are going to find an analogy to a minor character, Schlemihl, in Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann," last seen recently at the Century.

Reznicek is an Austrian hitherto known as the composer of an opera, "Donna Diana," of which the overture is sometimes played. He has just written a "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger." His "Schlemihl," first performed at the Berlin Philharmonic by Oskar Fried in December, 1912, has been heard at Munich and Vienna and last April in Boston. It calls for an orchestra of largest size, is continuous in four parts, has a short solo for tenor voice and may employ an organ. Its title is vague, as there is no direct connection with Peter Schlemihl, hero of Chamisso's story, who "lost his shadow."

In his own analysis the composer says he intended to portray the life and fate of "a modern man pursued by misfortune," who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. The music shows the man at his best and worst. It carries him through a fantastical orgy in which appear the figures of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures, "A Comedy of Marionettes," the female dancer, the mad flute player, conductor and marionette orchestra, the humpbacked dwarf, and singing woman.

Then he is restored to respectability. He has a wife. There is a love scene, a wedding, and a child appears, yet the old struggle begins over again. The character of the haughty man, disdainful of outside help, relying upon himself, is not suited to the contemporaneous bustle. There follow desperate struggles and exhaustion, a short breathing spell, recollections of happy hours, sickness and disaster, forebodings of death, the only consolation.

From abysmal depths rises the voice of fate, and there is a prayer. Once more, for the last time, the vanquished man raises himself to superhuman height, and then, seized with disgust, lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

Sibelius's interesting fourth symphony opens to-night's concert and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" ends it.

Establis

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 14

Date

A REAL MUSICAL TREAT.

Splendid Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A novelty by a master, played by a master orchestra, is always appreciated, especially so when performed by such a splendid body as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night proved no exception to the rule. The symphonic phantasy, "From Italy," an early work of the German genius, Richard Strauss, had first call on the audience's attention and proved an agreeable surprise because of its freedom from the strange and not always agreeable orchestral innovations that are looked for in the work of Strauss.

This number consists of four movements, "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento" and "Neapolitan Folk Life." That the composer showed evidence of radical changes in musical form is clearly noticeable throughout the entire number, particularly in "Neapolitan Folk Life." Dr. Muck's reading was one of splendid precision and brought out every desired expressive note.

In this age of "artistic temperament," displayed by the master pianists of various nationalities, it is refreshing to sit through a number played by Harold Bauer, an eminent artist, absolutely devoid of everything excepting those qualities that tend to bring out the highest achievements of piano playing. Mr. Bauer was the soloist last night and performed the extremely difficult Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in magnificent style. His technique was a revelation in exacting precision and the poetic and sympathetic Beethoven lost nothing in his interpretation.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's 'Egmont" overture, long familiar to concert devotees. Like many other of that master's earlier works, this number is beautiful in its melodic construction and it is hardly necessary to say that the Boston Symphony performed it splendidly.

Es 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City. 4

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS EXCELLENTLY

Programme Slightly Better than That of Last Thursday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra deserves well of the New York public. Its concerts have always given unlimited and well considered pleasure to all music lovers, and have been red letter events of the musical season. Yet there must be reason for pause when we consider the two last programmes Dr. Muck has vouchsafed us. The musical observers have already spoken of the one of Thursday evening—the one of yesterday afternoon was only slightly more inspiriting. Needless to say, the band played with all its wonted excellence, and Dr. Muck held the will of his musicians obedient to his slightest nod. Of this part of the afternoon only praise can be spoken.

As on Thursday, there were only three numbers on the programme. Richard Strauss's none too interesting or important Symphonic Fantasia "From Italy" opened the afternoon, then came Ropartz's Fourth Symphony, the programme concluding with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was stated on the programme that the Ropartz symphony was receiving its first performance in New York. The ways of conductors are past finding out, as are their reasons for repeating works. It is sufficient to say that this particular symphony received its first New York performance last week by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. Stransky thus beating out Dr. Muck. As to the value of this triumph there might be various opinions.

The Ropartz symphony is altogether in the vein of César Franck, without the Belgian composer's incisiveness of spirit. Played in only one movement, it fails to make any marked differentiation between its various parts, with the result that at the end the listener is very much at a loss as to what it is all about. It possesses, indeed, not a little melodic invention, yet the invention smells too much of the lamp to be altogether free and spontaneous. Clever as it is in its technical mastery, it seems doubtful whether it possesses the sweep or originality of idea to make it a permanent adition to the concert halls. However, this, like all else, is in the lap of the gods. By giving it, Dr. Muck at least proved his belief in the neutrality of art.

Estal 1884

From POST

Address: New York City

Date 5 1914

Establ

Dr. Muck believes that the war cannot fail to have, in the end, a strongly beneficial influence on the artistic production of Europe. In a conversation with Olin Downes, printed in Musical America, he expressed the opinion that the primal verities would be felt once more. Simplicity, sincerity, music which appears because it must appear, music which is farthest from fad or the desire for pecuniary gain, may reasonably be anticipated. And he broke off: "But what is the use? Who will want music for the next hundred years in Europe? They will want houses, and food. Where will it end?"

If the war does not mend musical matters in the direction indicated by Dr. Muck, Germany will indeed be in a sorry plight. The type of Kultur worshipped in that country to-day seems to have killed real creativeness. At present there exist in the large cities cliques swearing by Strauss, Reger, or Schönberg, and whoever does not flock with them has no opportunity. Dr. Muck is an admirer of Grieg's friend and biographer, Schjelderup, two of whose pieces he conducted in Boston a few years ago. He now has in hand his symphonic poem on Ibsen's "Brand," which he likes. He does not like the "Five Orchestral Pieces" of Schönberg, but will have them played in Boston because some want to hear them.

About 30,000 addresses of musicians are included in the thirtieth annual issue of Max Hesse's "Deutscher Musikerkalender," just published in Leipzig. There are no French or English addresses, but this, evidently, is not an omission due to hostile feeling, for the Russian and Belgian musicians are included.

Newspaper Cutting

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 5 1914

Date

1884

BAUER APPLAUDED WITH BOSTONIANS

Sedate Programme of Beethoven and Strauss Played at the Academy.

SYMPHONIC FANTASY HEARD

Damrosch Orchestra Gives Matinee Concert.

Having been raked over the coals of critical fire for using the most wonderful orchestral instrument in the world to play such novelties as Sibelius' Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Schlemihl" at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Manhattan concert on Thursday, Dr. Karl Muck, for his Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music last night, came back to well tried and favorite numbers, which could not possibly give offense, nor yet could arouse a tornado of discussion. His programme included Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy "From Italy," Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and Beethoven's concerto in G major for the piano.

To find Strauss enlisted with Beethoven as a composer of the well tried in music is to bring into prominence the change that a few years has wrought in the reception of his work. Not long ago the "madman of music" shared the same fate that now greets Reznicek and Sibelius. The number played last night does not come in the category of pieces that aroused resentment here, although at its first performance in Munich the composer was regarded as "quite mad."

If last night's programme did not arouse discussion, neither did it arouse much enthusiasm. The audience, which, as usual, filled the house, was apathetic. The applause was perfunctory, except for the assisting pianist, Harold Bauer, who played the concerto. Although there was never any musical necessity of a soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts, there is an undoubted public demand for one, and it is usually upon the performer that the applause is lavished.

Mr. Bauer is a veteran player with a big reputation. Although a sincere artist, authoritative in his playing, at times, as last night, he becomes ponderous in his touch and yields to the temptation of over-emphasis, lingering rather too long on notes, and, in heavily chorded passages, sometimes blurring his tone.

The orchestra played as usual, that is superlatively well. In the Strauss fantasy, it was hard to discover the reason for the original cry of "madman" directed against the composer, except for his daring in taking the old "Funiculi, funicula" Italian folk song as his theme in the last movement, "Neapolitan folk life" and the somewhat inconclusive construction of the third movement, "On the Shores of Sorrento." This section of the fantasy shows the flash of real genius that illumines most of Strauss' work [illegible] music [illegible] bringing out the sunlit atmosphere of Italy.

---

There was one big offense in the concert, having nothing to do with the ear or the orchestra, a purely optical offense. That was in the appearance again of the stage setting which is used continuously at the Academy for all concerts. The familiar back drop of painted pink pillars and unsightly green, representing what might be considered an attractive parlor setting for a third-rate stock company, has always been an eyesore. Its continued use for concert and song recital, as a background for the best musical performances the country has to give can only be explained because of the absence of protest against it. When compared with the artistic tapestries which form the background at the centre of concert music in Manhattan, Carnegie Hall, or to take a theatre, the Metropolitan Opera House, with its classic back drop for concerts, the setting looks extremely mean. It is entirely out of keeping with the beautiful appointments of the Academy of Music.

Beethoven's "Heroic" Played.

The Symphony Society of New York gave the third of its Friday afternoon concerts at Aeolian Hall yesterday with Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, and under the direction of Walter Damrosch gave an inspired interpretation of Beethoven's glorification of the heroic Napoleon.

All the beauty and majesty of the work was brought out by the musicians yesterday afternoon; the sudden contrasts between plaintive themes and themes of victory; the deep despair of the "Marcia Funebra" and the gay abandon of the scherzo and trio movements of the work, and the grand finale, which is in itself almost an impassioned percoration on heroism.

The orchestra was assisted by Alma Gluck, whose soft, velvet-toned voice was used with excellent art in the flowing legato passages of an aria from Mozart's "Die Entfurhrung aus dem Seraglio." Mme. Gluck sang also a group of three songs by Charpentier, "Les Cloches Felees," "Priere" and "Chevaux de Bois." In the last of the three she had an opportunity to display her dramatic ability.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra played a series of British folk song and dance settings by Percy Grainger. The first, "Molly on the Shore," was a lilting Irish reel, in which the "fiddle" effect characteristic of this type of music was maintained throughout with great success. The "Irish Tune" number, with its haunting touch of melancholy, was based on an old tune from County Derry. The last number of the series was a "Shepherd's Hey," one of the Morris dance tunes, given with a dash and flourish that seemed to take the house by storm.

The concluding number of the programme was a suite, "Reflets d'Allemagne," by Florent Schmitt. Mr. Damrosch summed the piece up well when he announced it as a tourist's impressions of Germany, being a combination of German goodfellowship and French charm—"an out-of-date combination in these stirring times," he added. The suite was in three waltz themes, entitled "Nuremberg," "Dresden" and "Munich."

Newspaper Cutting

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date DEC [illegible] 1914

purpose.

rk, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Early German Music Welcomed. Bauer as Piano Soloist.

When Collins wrote his ode beginning "When Music, heavenly maid, was young," he must have been listening to Beethoven's "Pianoforte Concerto in G," which was the chief feature of the Boston Symphony programme at the Academy of Music last night. In these modern days music is not always a "heavenly maid," by any means. Often she is an earthly jade, most reprehensible when she is most fascinating. But "heavenly" is exactly the word for this concerto. It has a beauty which holds the hearer without being colored with what is commonly called "emotional appeal." Its delicate and exquisite texture is for the mind rather than for the nerves, and that ethereal, other worldly effect was heightened last night by the restrained and very beautiful performance of its piano part by Harold Bauer. His playing had the most perfect clarity and he never sacrificed quality of tone to quantity. He was content not to get more out of the piano than Beethoven put into it, and as Beethoven wrote for a very primitive type of instrument, that speaks volumes for Mr. Bauer's artistic conscience. The result was a perfectly blended and balanced performance. Dr. Muck is at his happiest when he is conducting his orchestra in association with soloists, and its mastery of delicate shading and beautiful tone was never in happier evidence than in its conjunction with Bauer last evening.

The programme, on the whole, was the best balanced one which Dr. Muck has given here for a long time. He has given many more attractive compositions than any single work in last evening's programme. He has an unhappy faculty, at times of arranging his selections so as to produce either too great monotony or else lack of balance or harmony among the parts, but last night he created a harmonious whole, which was yet not monotonous.

Beethoven's "Concerto" was preceded by Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," which was written when the composer was 22 years old, and had not yet begun to wave the red flag of musical anarchy, and it was followed by Beethoven's broad and stirring overture to "Egmont," which even holds people who do not associate it with the revolt of the Netherlanders from Spanish oppression. Perhaps some hearers would have preferred the "Meistersinger' 'overture to this by Beethoven in this particular place, but what we got was fine, and the audience wash appy.

A non-neutral citizen wrote to The Eagle yesterday a "prediction" that "the applause will not be passionate," "and added that 'made in Germany' is a label that is not popular here at present." On the contrary, the programme was extremely well liked, and for a reason which this correspondent may have realized after he heard the music more fully than he did from reading German names of composers. For this music was born before the day of war lords. It represents the real spirit and the true culture of the German people before their rulers became obsessed with the dream of world conquest. There is the tragedy of war, but none of the lust of conquest in the Beethoven overture. The Strauss fantasie was written before he had fallen under the influence of Nietsche. It voiced the joy and rest of a tour in Italy when the youth's strength had been overstrained; its pictures of the beauty of Sorento and the gayety of the streets of Naples have little relation with the later music, which does express modern German thought and the spirit, which, as many outside observers believe, was the cause of the present war. We have not reached the pass where one must be a champion of the Kaiser in order to enjoy Beethoven. And let us not accuse Dr. Muck of trying to put world politics into his programme, so long as he gives us such music as that of last evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

14

Date

Establ

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Bostons Heard in Splendid Concert.

"LOHENGRIN" TO-NIGHT

Schumann-Heink Recital and Other Attractions.

The programme rendered last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music differed widely from that which the same organization presented on Thursday in Manhattan. On the latter occasion, two much-discussed works of very modern tendencies formed the chief feature. Last night Strauss' symphonic fantasy "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont," were the chief offerings. It goes without saying, that as usual, perfection characterized these renditions and there was no lack of appreciation.

Yet the question might well be asked why Conductor Dr. Karl Muck failed to bring his new discoveries to this borough. Without going into the merits of the compositions in question, and without paying the slighteste attention to the criticism which almost burned holes into the music columns of the Manhattan newspapers, the Brooklyn Times contends that local concerts should be characterized by every conceivable novelty which our great conductors bring to this country. It is a great mistake to presume that the people across the river are the only ones who are able to sit in judgment on these matters, nor do we suspect for a single moment that Dr. Muck considers it unsafe to bring innovations into the land on this side of the subway terminals.

No matter what critics may say, it is certainly fair to assume that with the works of Sibelius and Reznicek must possess considerable merit or Dr. Muck would never consider them worthy of production. That much being settled, why must Brooklyn wait until every other part of the country has heard the new pieces?

Harold Bauer, the pianist, played Beethoven's G major concerto and abundant applause was given the soloist. He played with his usual sincerity and authority, and if he showed an inclination to be ponderous at times, this tendency did not mar the merit of the performance for the audience.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

DEC 7 - 1914

Date

Esta 884

Bei den Boſtonern hörte ich am Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die Ropartz'ſche Vierte Symphonie, die wir am 27. November als Novität bei den Philharmonikern gehört hatten, zum zweitenmale, und zwar mit ſtärkerer Würdigung der Muſik, die diesmal vollere Wirkſamkeit entfaltete. Eine einzige Anhörung iſt für ein modernes Werk nicht viel, daher das Urtheil unter ſolchen Umſtänden nothwendigerweiſe ein proviſoriſches ſein muß. Wenn mich der Komponiſt auch diesmal nicht davon überzeugen

[70]

[illegible] hat, ſo erſchien mir ſein Werk doch gut balanzirt, vor allem ehrlicher Ueberzeugung voll und von ſehr anerkennenswerther Technik. Die Orcheſtrirung iſt vielfarbig, intereſſant, faſt nie überladen. Ich fand diesmal noch mehr als das erſtemal, daß es ein Fehler war, das Werk in einem einzigen Satz zuſammenzudrängen. Auf dieſe Enge in der Architektonik, in den allzu intim zuſammengefügten Kontraſten liegt es meiner Anſicht nach in erſter Linie, wenn das Werk bei einem erſten Anhören einen wenig kongruenten und balanzirten Eindruck macht. Geſpielt wurde es von den Boſtonern, daſſelbe gilt auch von Strauß ſymphoniſcher Phantaſie „Aus Italien" und der „Egmont"-Ouverture, mit voller Meiſterſchaft.

H.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City

DEC 6 - 1914

Date

Est 1884

BOSTONIANS GIVE CONCERT FULL OF RICH MELODIES

Ropartz's C-Major Symphony Wins Great Favor at Its Second Hearing.

There was as great an amount of charm in yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall as there was lack of that quality in the Thursday evening concert by the same organization. In the one case there was the comfort of melody beautifully developed; in the other was the test of discord enlarged until nerves were outraged and left quivering.

To a certain extent Dr. Muck redeemed himself by his selections for yesterday's programme. He gave Strauss' "From Italy," symphonic fantasia; Ropartz C major symphony; and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

MELODIOUS STRAUSS WORK.

The Strauss work was written at a time when that since-sensational composer was still under the spell of mellifluous influences, which means that the revolutionary spirit manifested in "Salome," "Elektra" and various modern tone poems had not then manifested itself. The orchestra illustrated its most genial mood in each of the four movements, displaying a superb tone quality, perfect balance in the different choirs and ensemble work that was a model of accuracy and solidity.

Dr. Muck had expected to introduce the Ropartz Symphony to New York, but he was anticipated by about a week, for Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic Society presented it on November 27. A second hearing in even so short a time disclosed many beauties which were not realized at the earlier hearing. Though the symphony is played without a pause and lasts three-quarters of an hour, it held the interest from start to finish.

INFLUENCE OF FRENCH SCHOOL.

Mr. Ropartz shows in this work leanings toward the modern French school of composition, which influence he has used in moderation. There is poetic tunefulness and haunting harmony aplenty in the three unseparated movements. These he developed in an interesting and pleasing manner and on rather conventional lines, but never by any chance did he seek or acquire anything other than an artistic and laudable result. The Boston men played the work skilfully and effectively.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date

1884

French Ropartz's fourth symphony, if not a "first time in New York," was the first of its nationality on Karl Muck's list at Carnegie Hall to-day. The Boston Symphony men were adding Strauss's "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont." They will return here Jan. 7 and 9 with their first soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: New York

Date DEC 6 1914

At their second matinee in Carnegie Hall this season yesterday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony played the fourth symphony of the French composer Ropartz, which was performed here last week by the Philharmonic. This essentially modern [illegible] its moments of

From POST
Address: New York City
Date 5 1914

Establ

Dr. Muck believes that the war cannot fail to have, in the end, a strongly beneficial influence on the artistic production of Europe. In a conversation with Olin Downes, printed in Musical America, he expressed the opinion that the primal verities would be felt once more. Simplicity, sincerity, music which appears because it must appear, music which is farthest from fad or the desire for pecuniary gain, may reasonably be anticipated. And he broke off: "But what is the use? Who will want music for the next hundred years in Europe? They will want houses, and food. Where will it end?"

If the war does not mend musical matters in the direction indicated by Dr. Muck, Germany will indeed be in a sorry plight. The type of Kultur worshipped in that country to-day seems to have killed real creativeness. At present there exist in the large cities cliques swearing by Strauss, Reger, or Schönberg, and whoever does not flock with them has no opportunity. Dr. Muck is an admirer of Grieg's friend and biographer, Schjelderup, two of whose pieces he conducted in Boston a few years ago. He now has in hand his symphonic poem on Ibsen's "Brand," which he likes. He does not like the "Five Orchestral Pieces" of Schönberg, but will have them played in Boston because some want to hear them.

About 30,000 addresses of musicians are included in the thirtieth annual issue of Max Hesse's "Deutscher Musikerkalender," just published in Leipzig. There are no French or English addresses, but this, evidently, is not an omission due to hostile feeling, for the Russian and Belgian musicians are included.

Newspaper Cutting

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 1914
Date

f, 1884

BAUER APPLAUDED WITH BOSTONIANS

Sedate Programme of Beethoven and Strauss Played at the Academy.

SYMPHONIC FANTASY HEARD

Damrosch Orchestra Gives Matinee Concert.

Having been raked over the coals of critical fire for using the most wonderful orchestral instrument in the world to play such novelties as Sibelius' Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Schlemihl" at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Manhattan concert on Thursday, Dr. Karl Muck, for his Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music last night, came back to well tried and favorite numbers, which could not possibly give offense, nor yet could arouse a tornado of discussion. His programme included Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy "From Italy," Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and Beethoven's concerto in G major for the piano.

To find Strauss enlisted with Beethoven as a composer of the well tried in music is to bring into prominence the change that a few years has wrought in the reception of his work. Not long ago the "madman of music" shared the same fate that now greets Reznicek and Sibelius. The number played last night does not come in the category of pieces that aroused resentment here, although at its first performance in Munich the composer was regarded as "quite mad."

If last night's programme did not arouse discussion, neither did it arouse much enthusiasm. The audience, which, as usual, filled the house, was apathetic. The applause was perfunctory, except for the assisting pianist, Harold Bauer, who played the concerto. Although there was never any musical necessity of a soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts, there is an undoubted public demand for one, and it is usually upon the performer that the applause is lavished.

Mr. Bauer is a veteran player with a big reputation. Although a sincere artist, authoritative in his playing, at times, as last night, he becomes ponderous in his touch and yields to the temptation of over-emphasis, lingering rather too long on notes, and, in heavily chorded passages, sometimes blurring his tone.

The orchestra played as usual, that is superlatively well. In the Strauss fantasy, it was hard to discover the reason for the original cry of "madman" directed against the composer, except for his daring in taking the old "Funiculi, funicula" Italian folk song as his theme in the last movement, "Neapolitan folk life" and the somewhat inconclusive construction of the third movement, "On the Shores of Sorrento." This section of the fantasy shows the flash of real genius that illumines most of Strauss' work. It is music magic bringing out the sunlit atmosphere of Italy.

There was one big offense in the concert, having nothing to do with the ear or the orchestra, a purely optical offense. That was in the appearance again of the stage setting which is used continuously at the Academy for all concerts. The familiar back drop of painted pink pillars and unsightly green, representing what might be considered an attractive parlor setting for a third-rate stock company, has always been an eyesore. Its continued use for concert and song recital, as a background for the best musical performances the country has to give can only be explained because of the absence of protest against it. When compared with the artistic tapestries which form the background at the centre of concert music in Manhattan, Carnegie Hall, or to take a theatre, the Metropolitan Opera House, with its classic back drop for concerts, the setting looks extremely mean. It is entirely out of keeping with the beautiful appointments of the Academy of Music.

Beethoven's "Heroic" Played.

The Symphony Society of New York gave the third of its Friday afternoon concerts at Aeolian Hall yesterday with Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, and under the direction of Walter Damrosch gave an inspired interpretation of Beethoven's glorification of the heroic Napoleon.

All the beauty and majesty of the work was brought out by the musicians yesterday afternoon; the sudden contrasts between plaintive themes and themes of victory; the deep despair of the "Marcia Funebra" and the gay abandon of the scherzo and trio movements of the work, and the grand finale, which is in itself almost an impassioned perc·ation on heroism.

The orchestra was assisted by Alma Gluck, whose soft, velvet-toned voice was used with excellent art in the flowing legato passages of an aria from Mozart's "Die Entfurhrung aus dem Seraglio." Mme. Gluck sang also a group of three songs by Charpentier, "Les Cloches Felees," "Priere" and "Chevaux de Bois." In the last of the three she had an opportunity to display her dramatic ability.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra played a series of British folk song and dance settings by Percy Grainger. The first, "Molly on the Shore," was a lilting Irish reel, in which the "fiddle" effect characteristic of this type of music was maintained throughout with great success. The "Irish Tune" number, with its haunting touch of melancholy, was based on an old tune from County Derry. The last number of the series was a "Shepherd's Hey," one of the Morris dance tunes, given with a dash and flourish that seemed to take the house by storm.

The concluding number of the programme was a suite, "Reflets d'Allemagne," by Florent Schmitt. Mr. Damrosch summed the piece up well when he announced it as a tourist's impressions of Germany, being a combination of German goodfellowship and French charm—"an out-of-date combination in these stirring times," he added. The suite was in three waltz themes, entitled "Nuremberg," "Dresden" and "Munich."

Newspaper Cutting

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date

purpose.

rk, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Early German Music Welcomed. Bauer as Piano Soloist.

When Collins wrote his ode beginning "When Music, heavenly maid, was young," he must have been listening to Beethoven's "Pianoforte Concerto in G," which was the chief feature of the Boston Symphony programme at the Academy of Music last night. In these modern days music is not always a "heavenly maid," by any means. Often she is an earthly jade, most reprehensible when she is most fascinating. But "heavenly" is exactly the word for this concerto. It has a beauty which holds the hearer without being colored with what is commonly called "emotional appeal." Its delicate and exquisite texture is for the mind rather than for the nerves, and that ethereal, other worldly effect was heightened last night by the restrained and very beautiful performance of its piano part by Harold Bauer. His playing had the most perfect clarity and he never sacrificed quality of tone to quantity. He was content not to get more out of the piano than Beethoven put into it, and as Beethoven wrote for a very primitive type of instrument, that speaks volumes for Mr. Bauer's artistic conscience. The result was a perfectly blended and balanced performance. Dr. Muck is at his happiest when he is conducting his orchestra in association with soloists, and its mastery of delicate shading and beautiful tone was never in happier evidence than in its conjunction with Bauer last evening.

The programme, on the whole, was the best balanced one which Dr. Muck has given here for a long time. He has given many more attractive compositions than any single work in last evening's programme. He has an unhappy faculty, at times of arranging his selections so as to produce either too great monotony or else lack of balance or harmony among the parts, but last night he created a harmonious whole, which was yet not monotonous.

Beethoven's "Concerto" was preceded by Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," which was written when the composer was 22 years old, and had not yet begun to wave the red flag of musical anarchy, and it was followed by Beethoven's broad and stirring overture to "Egmont," which even holds people who do not associate it with the revolt of the Netherlanders from Spanish oppression. Perhaps some hearers would have preferred the "Meistersinger' 'overture to this by Beethoven in this particular place, but what we got was fine, and the audience wash appy.

A non-neutral citizen wrote to The Eagle yesterday a "prediction" that "the applause will not be passionate," "and added that 'made in Germany' is a label that is not popular here at present." On the contrary, the programme was extremely well liked, and for a reason which this correspondent may have realized after he heard the music more fully than he did from reading German names of composers. For this music was born before the day of war lords. It represents the real spirit and the true culture of the German people before their rulers became obsessed with the dream of world conquest. There is the tragedy of war, but none of the lust of conquest in the Beethoven overture. The Strauss fantasie was written before he had fallen under the influence of Nietsche. It voiced the joy and rest of a tour in Italy when the youth's strength had been overstrained; its pictures of the beauty of Sorento and the gayety of the streets of Naples have little relation with the later music, which does express modern German thought and the spirit, which, as many outside observers believe, was the cause of the present war. We have not reached the pass where one must be a champion of the Kaiser in order to enjoy Beethoven. And let us not accuse Dr. Muck of trying to put world politics into his programme, so long as he gives us such music as that of last evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

TIMES
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Bostons Heard in Splendid Concert.

"LOHENGRIN" TO-NIGHT

Schumann-Heink Recital and Other Attractions.

The programme rendered last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music differed widely from that which the same organization presented on Thursday in Manhattan. On the latter occasion, two much-discussed works of very modern tendencies formed the chief feature. Last night Strauss' symphonic fantasy "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont," were the chief offerings. It goes without saying, that as usual, perfection characterized these renditions and there was no lack of appreciation.

Yet the question might well be asked why Conductor Dr. Karl Muck failed to bring his new discoveries to this borough. Without going into the merits of the compositions in question, and without paying the slighteste attention to the criticism which almost burned holes into the music columns of the Manhattan newspapers, the Brooklyn Times contends that local concerts should be characterized by every conceivable novelty which our great conductors bring to this country. It is a great mistake to presume that the people across the river are the only ones who are able to sit in judgment on these matters, nor do we suspect for a single moment that Dr. Muck considers it unsafe to bring innovations into the land on this side of the subway terminals.

No matter what critics may say, it is certainly fair to assume that with the works of Sibelius and Reznicek must possess considerable merit or Dr. Muck would never consider them worthy of production. That much being settled, why must Brooklyn wait until every other part of the country has heard the new pieces?

Harold Bauer, the pianist, played Beethoven's G major concerto and abundant applause was given the soloist. He played with his usual sincerity and authority, and if he showed an inclination to be ponderous at times, this tendency did not mar the merit of the performance for the audience.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
DEC 7 - 1914
Date

Estal 884

Bei den Boſtonern hörte ich am Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die Ropartz'ſche Vierte Symphonie, die wir am 27. November als Novität bei den Philharmonikern gehört hatten, zum zweitenmale, und zwar mit ſtärkerer Würdigung der Muſik, die diesmal vollere Wirkſamkeit entfaltete. Eine einzige Anhörung iſt für ein modernes Werk nicht viel, daher das Urtheil unter ſolchen Umſtänden nothwendigerweiſe ein proviſoriſches ſein muß. Wenn mich der Komponiſt auch diesmal nicht davon überzeugen [illegible], daß er ein Meiſterſtück geſchaffen hat, ſo erſchien mir ſein Werk doch gut balanzirt, vor allem ehrlicher Ueberzeugung voll und von ſehr anerkennenswerther Technik. Die Orcheſtrirung iſt vielfarbig, intereſſant, faſt nie überladen. Ich fand diesmal noch mehr als das erſtemal, daß es ein Fehler war, das Werk in einem einzigen Satz zuſammenzudrängen. Auf dieſe Enge in der Architektonik, in den allzu intim zuſammengefügten Kontraſten liegt es meiner Anſicht nach in erſter Linie, wenn das Werk bei einem erſten Anhören einen wenig kongruenten und balanzirten Eindruck macht. Geſpielt wurde es von den Boſtonern, daſſelbe gilt auch von Strauß ſymphoniſcher Phantaſie „Aus Italien" und der „Egmont"-Ouverture, mit voller Meiſterſchaft.

H.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
DEC 6 - 1914
Date

Est 1884

BOSTONIANS GIVE CONCERT FULL OF RICH MELODIES

Ropartz's C-Major Symphony Wins Great Favor at Its Second Hearing.

There was as great an amount of charm in yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall as there was lack of that quality in the Thursday evening concert by the same organization. In the one case there was the comfort of melody beautifully developed; in the other was the test of discord enlarged until nerves were outraged and left quivering.

To a certain extent Dr. Muck redeemed himself by his selections for yesterday's programme. He gave Strauss' "From Italy," symphonic fantasia; Ropartz C major symphony; and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

MELODIOUS STRAUSS WORK.

The Strauss work was written at a time when that since-sensational composer was still under the spell of mellifluous influences, which means that the revolutionary spirit manifested in "Salome," "Elektra" and various modern tone poems had not then manifested itself. The orchestra illustrated its most genial mood in each of the four movements, displaying a superb tone quality, perfect balance in the different choirs and ensemble work that was a model of accuracy and solidity.

Dr. Muck had expected to introduce the Ropartz Symphony to New York, but he was anticipated by about a week, for Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic Society presented it on November 27. A second hearing in even so short a time disclosed many beauties which were not realized at the earlier hearing. Though the symphony is played without a pause and lasts three-quarters of an hour, it held the interest from start to finish.

INFLUENCE OF FRENCH SCHOOL.

Mr. Ropartz shows in this work leanings toward the modern French school of composition, which influence he has used in moderation. There is poetic tunefulness and haunting harmony aplenty in the three unseparated movements. These he developed in an interesting and pleasing manner and on rather conventional lines, but never by any chance did he seek or acquire anything other than an artistic and laudable result. The Boston men played the work skilfully and effectively.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

E 1884

French Ropartz's fourth symphony, if not a "first time in New York," was the first of its nationality on Karl Muck's list at Carnegie Hall to-day. The Boston Symphony men were adding Strauss's "From Italy" and Beethoven's "Egmont." They will return here Jan. 7 and 9 with their first soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date 6 1914

k, 1

At their second matinee in Carnegie Hall this season yesterday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony played the fourth symphony of the French composer Ropartz, which was performed here last week by the Philharmonic. This essentially modern [illegible] with its moments of

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PRESENTS ROPARTZ

Symphony No. 4 in C Major Occupies 32 Minutes of Programme.

"EGMONT" OVERTURE PROVES REFRESHING

Strauss's Fantasia, "From Italy," Also Heard Under Dr. Muck's Direction.

As Josef Stransky already had produced Ropartz's symphony No. 4 in C major on Friday afternoon of last week, Dr. Muck's purpose of giving that work its first hearing in New York at yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to naught.

But the long and tiresome composition was not replaced by another selection. Placed between Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, it occupied thirty-two weary minutes and proved quite as somniferous as at the excellent performance given by the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Of course the Boston Symphony Orchestra played as euphoniously as ever under Dr. Muck's masterly direction. But even playing so perfect cannot always make inspiring what is depressing. The only offering that refreshed and exhilarated the listener was the "Egmont" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

There seems to be a tendency in certain quarters to stir up feeling against Dr. Muck, though unquestionably he stands in the very forefront of his profession, and such a programme as he offered yesterday furnishes a useful pretext. Bearing in mind, however, the experiences of Anton Seidl, Arturo Toscanini and Gustav Mahler this would hardly be the first time men of such distinction in the world of music have aroused bitter opposition in New York.

From
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck Conducts a Programme of Little Importance.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday was attended by a very large audience, which seemed not always sure of anything except that it was listening to good playing. The programme comprised Richard Strauss's suite, "Aus Italien", Guy Ropartz's C major symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The house programme stated that the Ropartz symphony was to be played for the first time in New York, but it is only a few days since the Philharmonic Society performed it.

The second hearing of the work was pleasing, but it did not deepen the impression made by the first. It is good music, but has no great utterance to make. The French always write elegantly and even aristocratically. They have much judgment, taste and technic. Incidentally their music is usually urban. It smacks of Paris, and there is little in it except in the intermezzo to suggest rural France, and even then one wonders whether Ropartz had seen the peasants anywhere except out of the window of a train between Nancy and the capital. However, it is a pleasing symphony and it was beautifully played. Dr. Muck seemed to love it in a fatherly way and he conducted it with much tenderness.

There appears to be no particular reason why the Strauss suite should be played in these days. It is poor stuff and it does not represent the composer's best powers. It has very little to say, it says it weakly, and it takes too much time to do it. Without doubt, after the comparatively small results of the first two numbers the Beethoven overture must have made most hearers happy.

The two concerts of this second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have left the admirers of the organization in an unhappy frame of mind. If the amiable Dr. Muck has lost his love for New York it is our misfortune, but it will perhaps be a help to the local orchestras. Let us hope that the distinguished conductor will favor us next time with a little Mozart.

Newspaper Cutting

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 6 19
Date

With last night devoted to opera, a the Boston Symphony Orchestra at t Academy on Friday evening with wonted large attendance, in addition the many private entertainments f "budding" debutantes, last week was o of the gayest thus far on the win calendar.

Prominent among the latest recruits the debutante ranks was Miss Helen Sanger, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Cary Sanger, who was introduced on Thursday at her parents' home, No. 10 Montague terrace. Miss Sanger and her mother were assisted by a bevy of the former's contemporaries and classmates at the Brooklyn Heights Seminary. Among them were Miss Eva Mall, Miss Marjorie Piper, Miss Gertrude Thurston, Miss Francis Coutts, Miss Cecilia Brewster, Miss Adelaide Moffatt, Miss Elizabeth Thayer, Miss Marion Wrigley, Miss Frances Dudley, Miss Katherine Dana, Miss Mabel Haynes, Miss Mary Dunnell, Miss Ruth Jenks, Miss Katherine eKtcham, Miss Cecilia Brewster, Miss Drusilla Cravens, Miss Louise Ruxton and Miss Elizabeth Thayer.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Dr. Muck's Men, Not the Music, Win Applause

Uninteresting Compositions Form Greater Part of Programme in Carnegie Hall.

What yesterday afternoon's audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall thought of the programme's chief novelty, Mr. Joseph Ropartz's Fourth Symphony, was expressed by the slight applause which followed its performance. It was first played in this city by the Philharmonic Society ten days ago. Its effect is best described by the comment of one ardent concertgoer yesterday who said;—

"It seemed very long when first I heard it, but to-day it seemed even longer. It must be a work that grows."

The audience was moved to desultory applause, and after this had died away some one started it again, as if it were an afterthought or a belated compliment to the orchestra's playing of the tedious score by the modern Frenchman. The work has few moments of beauty and few themes that interest, so its charm yesterday was in the skill with which it was played.

Of little interest, too, was Mr. Richard Strauss' "From Italy," which is an early work and is neither really Strauss nor good red herring. His later works show him a master of effects, while "From Italy" has only one movement, the third, that is of interest to present day audiences. If Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's conductor, delights in Dr. Strauss' music, as so many do, why not present a later work of the mature musician? Here again, however, the playing of the orchestra and not the composition was the thing, all except the trumpet break in the early part.

Newspaper Cutting

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
DEC 4 - 191
Date

Boſ ner Symphonie=Orcheſter.

Die Boſtoner ſpielten geſtern unter Dr. ck's Leitung ein recht dunkel gefärbtes ogramm in Carnegie Hall, das die abſchreckend häßliche Vierte Symphonie von ibelius mit ihren revoltirenden Kakophonien und ſonſtigen Häßlichkeiten brachte und als Novität ein „ſymphoniſches Lebensbild“ in einem Satz von Reznicek bot, das, „Schlemihl“ benannt, gänzlich in Strauß'ſchem Fahrwaſſer ſegelt, in einigen ſchönen Epiſoden jedoch auch eigene Laute nicht verleugnet. Ein ausführlicherer Bericht muß des Tyrannen „Raummangel“ wegen dem morgigen Blatt vorbehalten werden.

H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date DEC 4 191

Brangaene.

New York might well consider itself fortunate musically last night with Toscanini at the opera and Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

It was a programme of novel music that the Bostonians played, beginning with Sibelius' "Fourth Symphony," a work of unusual tonalities and generally sombre tone colors, which was played here on an earlier occasion. Then followed an attempt by Reznicek, a Viennese composer, to tell in musical terms the biography of Schlemihl, that legendary man who sold his shadow to the devil. Paul Draper's brief incidental solo near the end of this "Symphonic Biography" was the most intelligible feature of it. There was no misunderstanding Mr. Draper's clear cut German diction. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" completed a programme which, however puzzling its musical content might be, was admirably played by the Boston musicians.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall was like living next door to a music conservatory. Two solid hours of the most radical cacophonies of latter-day despots of din left 3,000 New Yorkers rather stunned with novelty. The splendid house slumped in its chairs, buried its heads in programme books. It laughed itself awake at the "vivace" of Sibelius's symphony, which ends in a question mark, calling Dr. Muck out again at the close. It made the band stand up with him after the new Reznicek "Schlemihl," and it rushed for its carriages after the last "Comedy Overture" of Scheinpflug.

From the first note of the Sibelius puzzle, the clarity of the big bass-fidd see-saw, like the Volga boatmen's "Ay Ouchnem," was unlike anything heard when the Finlander's fourth symphony was produced here once before. Take from Sibelius his "tarn helm" of rude mystery, and nothing remains. His tragic attempt to reproduce the voices of nature in the rugged iron-frost of a Northern clime falls to pieces under the melting sunlight of such interpretation. There was one instant of dramatic fury that struck fire in the "largo" episode.

The new "Schlemihl" was a different story, or would have been if there had never arisen a tone-poet before Reznicek by the name of Richard Strauss. The Austrian successor was original at least in a great orchestral groan and grand organpoint to which his hero died. Till then, the man "Schlemihl" led a "Heldenleben" of a life. He caroused to "Lieber Augustin," danced with the puppets of Aubrey Beardsley's Theatre Impossible—the books told that—married a mid-Victorian wife to the wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer's Night Dream" and heard the baby call "Papa" and "Mamma" in big George Longy's oboe. Paul Draper, hidden behind a celesta, sang the prayer after battle and sudden death.

Because the Boston Symphony is one of the big institutions of art in America its packed audiences are very jealous of their opportunities to hear what is going forward in the world on its five visits each year. Too much of a good thing last evening got the house by the ears. If Dr. Muck would read the programmes that Theodore Thomas played to this public he might see why his subscribers ask for less novelty at one dose, instead of more. Alfred Hertz and Dr. Dernburg stood up in a box throughout the "Schlemihl" number and smiled to see every man doing

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

New Symphony Program Heard

MODERN music occupied the attention of the subscribers to last evening's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. But it was modern music in its most unpleasant inharmonic form. Dr. Muck fairly outdid his former efforts in his endeavor to keep his audiences informed of the latest trend of contemporaneous composers.

There were but three numbers on the programme: Sibelius's symphony No. 4; Reznicek's "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography for orchestra, tenor and organ; and Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare.

From SUN
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date DEC 4

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS A NOVELTY

An Ambitions Attempt at Psychology in Music Made by Reznicek.

PORTRAYS FATE OF MAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme comprised Sibelius's fourth symphony, Reznicek's "Schlemihl" and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare." The Sibelius composition was first played here by the Symphony Orchestra of this city under the direction of Walter Damrosch and gave rise to some diverse comments. The Scheinflug composition also had been heard before last evening, but Reznicek's work, which he calls a "symphonic biography," was a novelty.

The title of the work is in a sense arbitrary, because the music is not related to Chamisso's story of Peter Schlemihl, the man who lost his shadow. Reznicek tells us that his composition is intended to portray in music the life and fate of a modern man who is destroyed by the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. This man he essays to exhibit to us at his best and his worst. He even rushes him through Aubrey Beardsley's "Comedy of Marionettes," with its female dancer, flute player, marionette orchestra, humpbacked dwarf and singing woman.

The man becomes respectable and marries. There is a child. But the man suffers from too much ego. He struggles, rests, remembers happier hours, gets sick, sees approaching death, struggles some more, and finally in sheer disgust disappears in the beyond.

This is a not inconsiderable programme, which seems to aim at beating Richard Strauss at his own game. At any rate it appears to unite elements which enter into the schemes of that musician's "Til Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Death and Apotheosis."

It is unnecessary to enter into any extended comment on Reznicek's performance of his self-appointed task. His composition disclosed a picture of a good man laboring prodigiously, not without intellect, not without art, not without feeling, but alas! without ideas. The influence of Strauss—himself as much a "demnition product" as Waly Dad on the city wall—lies upon the whole composition. Its uglinesses are of the familiar stopped trumpet variety and its beauties are created by permitting fundamental harmonies to emerge occasionally from the general refuse heap.

But this symphonic biography is not worth discussion. It has all been done before, done better and done with a nearer simulation of dignity. During the performance of the weird and difficult Sibelius symphony and this Reznicek disturbance the audience was palpably bored, but it rendered its unfailing tribute of applause to the splendid playing of the orchestra. The Scheinpflug overture was a relief to those who remained to hear it. Every one will sincerely hope that the stern moods of Dr. Muck will pass away and that he will cease trying to educate New York to enjoy such dreadful things as the Reznicek composition.

Newspaper

From PRESS
Address: New York City
DEC 4
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

Reznicek's "Schlemihl" Is Heard by Audience Which Packs Carnegie Hall.

For the first concert of its second pair of New York concerts the Boston Symphony, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, last night presented an unusual programme before an audience which, as ever, packed Carnegie Hall. It would be interesting to know if the reception which it got would have been the same had any but the celebrated Dr. Muck ventured to put it forward. At best, it must be recorded, it was a severe strain on any but the most erudite listener.

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony in A minor was the first of the three numbers. In this work the composer, to quote a critic writing at its first New York performance, "has parted company with himself" and followed an entirely new track. To say it is very modern will convey some idea as to its character. True it is some of the harmonies are enough to distract any but a disciple of Schoenberg, even though they are brought to a well handled close. But the dominant note seems to

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6

Estab

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PRESENTS ROPARTZ

884

Symphony No. 4 in C Major Occupies 32 Minutes of Programme.

"EGMONT" OVERTURE PROVES REFRESHING

Strauss's Fantasia, "From Italy," Also Heard Under Dr. Muck's Direction.

As Josef Stransky already had produced Ropartz's symphony No. 4 in C major on Friday afternoon of last week, Dr. Muck's purpose of giving that work its first hearing in New York at yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to naught.

But the long and tiresome composition was not replaced by another selection. Placed between Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, it occupied thirty-two weary minutes and proved quite as somniferous as at the excellent performance given by the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Of course the Boston Symphony Orchestra played as euphoniously as ever under Dr. Muck's masterly direction. But even playing so perfect cannot always make inspiring what is depressing. The only offering that refreshed and exhilarated the listener was the "Egmont" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

There seems to be a tendency in certain quarters to stir up feeling against Dr. Muck, though unquestionably he stands in the very forefront of his profession, and such a programme as he offered yesterday furnishes a useful pretext. Bearing in mind, however, the experiences of Anton Seidl, Arturo Toscanini and Gustav Mahler this would hardly be the first time men of such distinction in the world of music have aroused bitter opposition in New York.

From
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck Conducts a Programme of Little Importance.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday was attended by a very large audience, which seemed not always sure of anything except that it was listening to good playing. The programme comprised Richard Strauss's suite, "Aus Italien"; Guy Ropartz's C major symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The house programme stated that the Ropartz symphony was to be played for the first time in New York, but it is only a few days since the Philharmonic Society performed it.

The second hearing of the work was pleasing, but it did not deepen the impression made by the first. It is good music, but has no great utterance to make. The French always write elegantly and even aristocratically. They have much judgment, taste and technic. Incidentally their music is usually urban. It smacks of Paris, and there is little in it except in the intermezzo to suggest rural France, and even then one wonders whether Ropartz had seen the peasants anywhere except out of the window of a train between Nancy and the capital. However, it is a pleasing symphony and it was beautifully played. Dr. Muck seemed to love it in a fatherly way and he conducted it with much tenderness.

There appears to be no particular reason why the Strauss suite should be played in these days. It is poor stuff and it does not represent the composer's best powers. It has very little to say, it says it weakly, and it takes too much time to do it. Without doubt, after the comparatively small results of the first two numbers the Beethoven overture must have made most hearers happy.

The two concerts of this second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have left the admirers of the organization in an unhappy frame of mind. If the amiable Dr. Muck has lost his love for New York it is our misfortune, but it will perhaps be a help to the local orchestras. Let us hope that the distinguished conductor will favor us next time with a little Mozart.

Newspaper Cutting

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. DEC 6 1914
Date

With last night devoted to opera, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Friday evening with its wonted large attendance, in addition to the many private entertainments for "budding" debutantes, last week was one of the gayest thus far on the winter calendar.

Prominent among the latest recruits to the debutante ranks was Miss Helen Sanger, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Cary Sanger, who was introduced on Thursday at her parents' home, No. 10 Montague terrace. Miss Sanger and her mother were assisted by a bevy of the former's contemporaries and classmates at the Brooklyn Heights Seminary. Among them were Miss Eva Mall, Miss Marjorie Piper, Miss Gertrude Thurston, Miss Francis Coutts, Miss Cecilia Brewster, Miss Adelaide Moffatt, Miss Elizabeth Thayer, Miss Marion Wrigley, Miss Frances Dudley, Miss Katherine Dana, Miss Mabel Haynes, Miss Mary Dunnell, Miss Ruth Jenks, Miss Katherine eKtcham, Miss Cecilia Brewster, Miss Drusilla Cravens, Miss Louise Ruxton and Miss Elizabeth Thayer.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Establ

Dr. Muck's Men, Not the Music, Win Applause

Uninteresting Compositions Form Greater Part of Programme in Carnegie Hall.

What yesterday afternoon's audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall thought of the programme's chief novelty, Mr. Joseph Ropartz's Fourth Symphony, was expressed by the slight applause which followed its performance. It was first played in this city by the Philharmonic Society ten days ago. Its effect is best described by the comment of one ardent concertgoer yesterday who said:—

"It seemed very long when first I heard it, but to-day it seemed even longer. It must be a work that grows."

The audience was moved to desultory applause, and after this had died away some one started it again, as if it were an afterthought or a belated compliment to the orchestra's playing of the tedious score by the modern Frenchman. The work has few moments of beauty and few themes that interest, so its charm yesterday was in the skill with which it was played.

Of little interest, too, was Mr. Richard Strauss' "From Italy," which is an early work and is neither really Strauss nor good red herring. His later works show him a master of effects, while "From Italy" has only one movement, the third, that is of interest to present day audiences. If Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's conductor, delights in Dr. Strauss' music, as so many do, why not present a later work of the mature musician? Here again, however, the playing of the orchestra and not the composition was the thing, all except the trumpet break in the early part.

Newspaper Cutting

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
DEC 4 1914
Date

Esta

Boſ…ner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die Boſtoner ſpielten geſtern unter Dr. …ck's Leitung ein recht dunkel gefärbtes …ogramm in Carnegie Hall, das die abſchreckend häßliche Vierte Symphonie von Sibelius mit ihren revoltirenden Kakophonien und ſonſtigen Häßlichkeiten brachte und als Novität ein „ſymphoniſches Lebensbild“ in einem Satz von Reznicek bot, das, „Schlemihl“ benannt, gänzlich in Strauß'ſchem Fahrwaſſer ſegelt, in einigen ſchönen Epiſoden jedoch auch eigene Laute nicht verleugnet. Ein ausführlicherer Bericht muß des Tyrannen „Raummangel“ wegen dem morgigen Blatt vorbehalten werden.

H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date DEC

Brangaene.

New York might well consider itself fortunate musically last night with Toscanini at the opera and Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

It was a programme of novel music that the Bostonians played, beginning with Sibelius' "Fourth Symphony," a work of unusual tonalities and generally sombre tone colors, which was played here on an earlier occasion. Then followed an attempt by Reznicek, a Viennese composer, to tell in musical terms the biography of Schlemihl, that legendary man who sold his shadow to the devil. Paul Draper's brief incidental solo near the end of this "Symphonic Biography" was the most intelligible feature of it. There was no misunderstanding Mr. Draper's clear cut German diction. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Shakespearian Comedy" completed a programme which, however puzzling its musical content might be, was admirably played by the Boston musicians.

1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Esta

Last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall was like living next door to a music conservatory. Two solid hours of the most radical cacophonies of latter-day despots of din left 3,000 New Yorkers rather stunned with novelty. The splendid house slumped in its chairs, buried its heads in programme books. It laughed itself awake at the "vivace" of Sibelius's symphony, which ends in a question mark, calling Dr. Muck out again at the close. It made the band stand up with him after the new Reznicek "Schlemihl," and it rushed for its carriages after the last "Comedy Overture" of Scheinpflug.

From the first note of the Sibelius puzzle, the clarity of the big bass-fidd see-saw, like the Volga boatmen's "Ay Ouchnem," was unlike anything heard when the Finlander's fourth symphony was produced here once before. Take from Sibelius his "tarn helm" of rude mystery, and nothing remains. His tragic attempt to reproduce the voices of nature in the rugged iron-frost of a Northern clime falls to pieces under the melting sunlight of such interpretation. There was one instant of dramatic fury that struck fire in the "largo" episode.

The new "Schlemihl" was a different story, or would have been if there had never arisen a tone-poet before Reznicek by the name of Richard Strauss. The Austrian successor was original at least in a great orchestral groan and grand organ-point to which his hero died. Till then, the man "Schlemihl" led a "Heldenleben" of a life. He caroused to "Lieber Augustin," danced with the puppets of Aubrey Beardsley's Theatre Impossible—the books told that—married a mid-Victorian wife to the wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer's Night Dream" and heard the baby call "Papa" and "Mamma" in big George Longy's oboe. Paul Draper, hidden behind a celesta, sang the prayer after battle and sudden death.

Because the Boston Symphony is one of the big institutions of art in America its packed audiences are very jealous of their opportunities to hear what is going forward in the world on its five visits each year. Too much of a good thing last evening got the house by the ears. If Dr. Muck would read the programmes that Theodore Thomas played to this public he might see why his subscribers ask for less novelty at one dose, instead of more. Alfred Hertz and Dr. Dernburg stood up in a box throughout the "Schlemihl" number and smiled to see every man doing his duty in the trenches in what sounded like real war.

84

Date

Estab

New Symphony Program Heard

384

MODERN music occupied the attention of the subscribers to last evening's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. But it was modern music in its most unpleasant inharmonic form. Dr. Muck fairly outdid his former efforts in his endeavor to keep his audiences informed of the latest trend of contemporaneous composers.

There were but three numbers on the programme: Sibelius's symphony No. 4; Reznicek's "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography for orchestra, tenor and organ; and Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare.

From SUN
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date DEC 4

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS A NOVELTY

An Ambitions Attempt at Psychology in Music Made by Reznicek.

PORTRAYS FATE OF MAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme comprised Sibelius's fourth symphony, Reznicek's "Schlemihl" and Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare." The Sibelius composition was first played here by the Symphony Orchestra of this city under the direction of Walter Damrosch and gave rise to some diverse comments. The Scheinflug composition also had been heard before last evening, but Reznicek's work, which he calls a "symphonic biography," was a novelty.

The title of the work is in a sense arbitrary, because the music is not related to Chamisso's story of Peter Schlemihl, the man who lost his shadow. Reznicek tells us that his composition is intended to portray in music the life and fate of a modern man who is destroyed by the conflict between his ideal and his material existence. This man he essays to exhibit to us at his best and his worst. He even rushes him through Aubrey Beardsley's "Comedy of Marionettes," with its female dancer, flute player, marionette orchestra, humpbacked dwarf and singing woman.

The man becomes respectable and marries. There is a child. But the man suffers from too much ego. He struggles, rests, remembers happier hours, gets sick, sees approaching death, struggles some more, and finally in sheer disgust disappears in the beyond.

This is a not inconsiderable programme, which seems to aim at beating Richard Strauss at his own game. At any rate it appears to unite elements which enter into the schemes of that musician's "Til Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Death and Apotheosis."

It is unnecessary to enter into any extended comment on Reznicek's performance of his self-appointed task. His composition disclosed a picture of a good man laboring prodigiously, not without intellect, not without art, not without feeling, but alas! without ideas. The influence of Strauss—himself as much a "demnition product" as Waly Dad on the city wall—lies upon the whole composition. Its uglinesses are of the familiar stopped trumpet variety and its beauties are created by permitting fundamental harmonies to emerge occasionally from the general refuse heap.

But this symphonic biography is not worth discussion. It has all been done before, done better and done with a nearer simulation of dignity. During the performance of the weird and difficult Sibelius symphony and this Reznicek disturbance the audience was palpably bored, but it rendered its unfailing tribute of applause to the splendid playing of the orchestra. The Scheinpflug overture was a relief to those who remained to hear it. Every one will sincerely hope that the stern moods of Dr. Muck will pass away and that he will cease trying to educate New York to enjoy such dreadful things as the Reznicek composition.

Newspaper

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

rk, 1884

Reznicek's "Schlemihl" Is Heard by Audience Which Packs Carnegie Hall.

For the first concert of its second pair of New York concerts the Boston Symphony, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, last night presented an unusual programme before an audience which, as ever, packed Carnegie Hall. It would be interesting to know if the reception which it got would have been the same had any but the celebrated Dr. Muck ventured to put it forward. At best, it must be recorded, it was a severe strain on any but the most erudite listener.

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony in A minor was the first of the three numbers. In this work the composer, to quote a critic writing at its first New York performance, "has parted company with himself" and followed an entirely new track. To say it is very modern will convey some idea as to its character. True it is some of the harmonies are enough to distract any but a disciple of Schoenberg, even though they are brought to a well handled close. But the dominant note seems to [illegible] unrest, [illegible] sustained to the last bar. It was given a splendid reading, it goes without saying.

Novelty of the Programme.

Following the Sibelius came Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the novelty of the programme, which is best described in the German words "symphonisches Lebensbild." By comparison with the task before the composer who sets himself to compose a portrait in tones the matter of writing a musical biography is simple, and the composer of "Schlemini" was quite equal to his task.

In analyzing his own work Reznicek said that this symphonic poem had nothing to do with the Peter Schemihl of the Chamisso story, who lost his shadow. It is intended only to portray the fate "of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence." That he accomplished what he set out to do was the opinion of most of the hearers last night, especially those who had the programme notes to guide them.

There are some really beautiful passages in the work and some of a stirring quality of real worth. The prayer, a tenor solo, sung last night by Paul Draper, is Goethe's "Wanderers Nachtlied." With the organ accompaniment it makes an effective prelude to the final theme. When it is heard again probably it will be welcome on New York programmes.

Full of Novel Twists

An "overture to a come speare," by Paul Scheinpflu
the list. It is a brilliantly light and melodious, and twists and turns. The am when the Glockenspiel do pected trick, leaves a plea
sion.

The band played with its finish and charm. It i somehow, that the players
joy their work, which may ble for the perfect ensemble

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date
Estab

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS AUDIENCE

Schienpflug's 'Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare' Saves Programme.

OTHER NUMBERS TECHNICALLY FINE

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Biography" Brilliantly Played.

The Orchestra from Boston came to us again last night, and Carnegie Hall held an audience such as gathers there only when Major Higginson's musicians honor us with their presence. It was an audience which contained all that is most brilliant in New York's musical public; it came hoping and expecting to be conquered—and despite the programme it was conquered, solely by the magnificent playing of the band under Dr. Muck's baton.

It must be said at the outset that the programme was one of the dullest ever given by Dr. Muck at a Boston Symphony concert. It contained only three numbers, of which only the last, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," brought happiness. This overture was a bright and very characteristic composition into which is worked a charming English melody of the sixteenth century. It sent the audience away happy, and almost willing to forgive the boredom which had gone before. The two preceding numbers were Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography for full orchestra, tenor solo and organ.

We have made a larger acquaintance with Sibelius's music since he first charmed us with his "Finlandia" and his early symphonies. His music, based on incidents in the Finnish epic, "Kalewala," has aroused a sincere admiration for his genius as an interpreter of the national spirit in music. But his fourth symphony is still repellent, or we are still rebellent. It still seems to us that if it is not it ought to be irritating to all who have not made it a point to see beauty and significance in every kind of expression in the art, provided it departs sufficiently far from the accepted canons of taste. This is one of the affectations which will no doubt be rooted out of music as one of the results of the cataclysm through which civilization is passing now. After it will come a greater tranquillity of thought, a sincerer devotion to æsthetic principles, less arrogant assertion of the privilege of doing what one pleases, based on the notion that the layman is an ignoramus and the critic a pedant, and that an artist needs only say that he feels it to be right to do as he is doing, and that, if an observer disputes his right to paint a red house with blue pigments, the observer simply does not see with artist's eyes.

The latest of Sibelius's symphonies is crude and rude in its thematic material, and in its harmonization seems purposely designed to pain the ears of its hearers. As was said here a year and a half ago, it is an individual expression beyond question, but it will be hard for anyone to believe that the composer wrote it because it was the voice of any æsthetical or emotional

1914
rk, 1884

---

ance [illegible] in it might be explained [illegible] ground that it was designed to be delineative of outward incident, like some of the "Kalewala" music, but unless this explanation be adopted and the programme confessed it must leave the mind of the normal listener in a maze.

Needless to say, the great band gave it a splendid performance, a performance which brought out most effectively the technical excellencies of the work and the composer's mastery of orchestral effect. The audience gave the symphony only a polite reception.

The Reznicek "Symphonic Biography" was very much in the school of Richard Strauss. It portrayed the "life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence," and portrayed it in the usual mood of flambuoyant pessimism so prevalent in musical Germany of to-day. It was in spirit a sort of compound of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Symphonia Domestica." It possessed some melodic inspiration, which was overwhelmed by a mass of Straussian dissonances, and it was in addition entirely too long. In fact, there seemed altogether too much ado about a very uninteresting character, the chief merit of the composition being its sense of orchestral technical mastery.

The tenor solo in the composition was sung by Mr. Paul Draper. Why Mr. Draper should have been selected to sing it must have roused much wonder.

H. E. K.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 4 1914
Established:

DREARY PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Evening Concert Tedious—Reznicek's Symphonic Biography Has First Hearing.

Musically, last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall was unspeakably dreary.

The first fifty minutes of wasted musical effort was devoted to Jean Sibilius's fourth symphony, in A minor, which received its American premiere at a New York Symphony Orchestra concert on March 2, 1913.

Following the symphony was the first performance in this city of Emil Nikolaus Reznicek's symphonic biography, entitled "Schlemihl." Declaring in his own analysis of the work that it has nothing to do in any way with Chamisso's Schlemihl, who has been embodied in "The Tales of Hoffmann," the Austrian composer explains that his music is intended to depict, in tones, the life of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence.

Played without pause between the four sections, the composition is frankly descriptive and filled with constant contrasts that serve the intended purpose.

The music portrays the first haughty bearing of man, then destiny, his strayings and debauchery, and his struggles toward downfall. The close brings a prayer for peace, in which a tenor solo is introduced.

Were this symphonic biography shorter it might gain in value.

A performance that did not show the orchestra at its best included the added services of an organist and Paul Draper, whose singing of the prayer was weak in voice and style. The final work on the programme was Scheinpflug's overture to a Shakespeare comedy.

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914
Est 188

Strange Things Told in Music by Boston Men

Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography," Played by Orchestra, Depicts a Humpback, a Dancer and a Disgusted Man.

Advocates of modern music got their fill of unusual harmonies and orchestral effects at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Dr. Karl Muck chose three works of the most modern style of presentation. The fourth symphony of the Finnish composer Sibelius, with which the programme began, is already known in this city, having been introduced to this country by the New York Symphony Orchestra last year. It is a strange work, dissonant but not so highly colored as the majority of modern things.

The real novelty of the evening was a new work by a Viennese composer, Reznicek, called "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography. As with many late compositions, it was played without pause and was so long as to tax the nerves of many hearers whose taste does not run toward dissonance. At first it seemed a disconnected succession of episodes. Perhaps that is what the composer meant it to be.

In his own analysis printed in the programme notes Reznicek gives some of the [illegible] he meant [illegible]. Among them there appear the [illegible] man, straying [illegible] a fantastical orgy, a female dancer, a mad flute player, a humpbacked dwarf, a love scene and a man seized with disgust who lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

---

How all of that could be expressed musically without seeming to wander in treatment occasionally is a wonder. There were entrancing fragments of music amidst the harsh sounding of the brass section and lound beating of drums. There were thrilling climaxes, such as the one directly following the incidental vocal solo which was sung by Mr. Paul Draper, who has shown himself before now equal to almost any task requiring perfect intonation in chromatic works. He did his little work well.

The symphonic biography as a whole in spite of its beauties, some of which were suggestive of more than one of Germany's composers, did not give the impression of being a unified whole. Sometimes the orchestral effects seemed to have been used simply to display the composer's ingenuity rather than to bring out pictorial effects.

Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare was the third and last work played. The playing of the orchestra was excellent, all that could be desired, but the amount of applause which followed the numbers would indicate that there were many in the audience who would prefer to hear Dr. Muck and his men play more of the classics than of present day novelties.

◆

From [redacted] TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 - 1914
rk, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Concert of Modern Music by Sibelius, Reznicek, and Schienpflug.

Dr. Muck put the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening in Carnegie Hill to probably the severest test it has ever been subjected to, of its capacity to absorb new music. The result was scarcely less than a proof of iron endurance. His programme was made up of three modern compositions—Jean Sibelius's fourth symphony in A minor, Emil Reznicek's "symphonic biography," as he calls it, "Schlemihl," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakepeare." Of these the first and last had been heard in New York before, but were at least unfamiliar to most of the listeners and new perhaps to many.

Sibelius's symphony was played in March, 1913, by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It was at that time scarcely intelligible to many of its listeners; last evening it was no more so. Its four movements are strangely disjointed, fragmentary, thin in substance. It was remarked when it was first heard here that it signifies a sudden and complete departure of the composer from all his previous musical ideals as they have been represented in other of his orchestral compositions known to New York.

It seems still hemmed in with doubts of his own raising; uncertainties, half-hearted attempts, beginnings without issue. His themes are long and diffuse, but they are developed with little progress toward any definite result, vaguely, with an irresolute touch. They are dropped and something else taken up; they vanish mysteriously and leave no sign. The movements wander on and expire like a candle blown out. Their substance and method are wholly rhapsodical. The second, an "allegro molto vivace," begins somewhat more coherently than the others, with a rhythmically striking theme in the feeling of a scherzo, but the mists soon gather around it, and it vanishes into nothingness with an abruptness that leaves the audience for several seconds bewildered. The composer gathers himself finally in the third movement for a strong and eloquent passage, and again in the last movement, but they are very brief, and he returns to his wandering unisons, his fragmentary reiterations.

The instrumentation is very light and transparent. There are "modern" effects of the "whole tone scale." The themes are often presented in imitation by one and another choir with a harmonic background thin to the verge of barrenness. They are set against each other in biting dissonances with perfect unconcern. The performance was a remarkably finished one and the analysis of the work to which Dr. Muck's reading subjected it seemed to lay bare its thinness pitilessly.

The symphony, at least, gives the impression of being the work of a musical personality, however, misdirected. Reznicek's long "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," however is the pretentious and bombastic attempt of a commonplace imitator of Strauss. The elaborate framework of a "programme," given by the composer in detail, is such as Strauss uses with infinitely greater talent. Some of the themes, such as that which opens the work, representing "the man," show their source without much guile. There is the whole outfit of biographical detail, which the music pursues with a fidelity purely literary, wholly incompatible with a real musical significance.

It is full of the conventional signs, signals, and earmarks of the musician bent more on a programme than on music, and without the talent to produce a plausible compatibility between them. At the end "the word" must be allowed to enter, to give full expression to the climax; and Mr. Paul Draper sang the short solo which is a setting of Goethe's "Wanderer's Nachtlied." The orchestra played the work with great finish and with elaborate bravura.

Scheinpflug's overture was played here by the Boston Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction, in March, 1909, when it gave pleasure as a clever piece of musical humor, with traits of a true comic spirit.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914
Esta 884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the first of its second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra was tuned to the pitch of its perfections. Perhaps it is too much to expect the perfections of any orchestra in the world at the very beginning of a season, but of the Boston Orchestra we do. The performance of its first pair of concerts here a few weeks ago was so nearly all of what we have grown accustomed to expect that the performance last night, with the excitement of its transparent fire, was almost a surprise.

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, which headed the programme, was played for the first time by this orchestra two years ago in Boston. Any one who had heard the two performances might well have wondered at the clarity with which all that is so beautifully mysterious in this music had at last been embodied. In the first performance there was the groping of a life in a mist. In the performance last night the symphony seemed like a cloud of evaporating sculpture. Neither performance was obscure, and in neither performance did the symphony itself seem less profound with the questioning shapes of life that cannot be answered. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is a supreme invitation to revery.

Individual as this music is and as rich as it is in innovations, it does not belong to the so-called music of the future. It is not Cubist music and it is not Futurist music, though it has been called such by critics who see in Cubism and Futurism only something which they cannot see through. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is organically connected with the traditional forms, but it is completely free from the traditional rhetoric of music, the dramatic emphasis which is the birthmark of self-consciousness, the gesture of climax. The symphony of introspection, it is never the soliloquy of the theatre. A little like a maniac, it talks to itself; it is the lonely solo of lonely thought; it is the only solipsist in art. And so the tones of eloquence are all quite naturally absent.

Intensity of mood seems to strangle the tone instead of releasing it, and in the place of a fortissimo there is continually the effect of exploding into silence. The ending of the second movement is the most mysteriously sudden effect that I know in music. It comes like sudden death to a man who is thinking only of living, not merely without preparation, without even the pause of recognition. It makes the anticlimax of life itself.

The second number was the "Schlemihl," by Reznicek, a brilliant and moving piece of programme music which had here its first performance in New York. This work is not without reminiscences of Strauss and Wagner, but is none the less fresh with its own individuality, full of vivacity and novel coloring. Certain passages for the harps did much by a queer brittle effect of splintered sound to show a new way to deal with an instrument that needs to be desentimentalized. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare" brought the concert to a close with a systematic mingling of modern Germany and Elizabethan England.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address DEC 4 - 1914
Date
Es 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE

Mason's Analysis of Concert to Be Given Tonight.

In his lecture recital last evening on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given tonight, Daniel Gregory Mason, first took up Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," his symphonic fantasia, which was written in 1886 when the composer was twenty-two years old. It marked the transition from his classical to his "poetic" or "realistic" style. His earlier works, influenced chiefly by Brahms, followed the traditional forms, such as the sonata form, based on a systematic arrangement of melodies. At the time "Aus Italien" was written, Strauss was dissatisfied with these forms, and began, under the influence of his friend, Alexander Ritter, to work in the direction which Berlioz and Liszt had indicated — "programme music" — based on a free evolution of themes. Mr. Mason pointed out that his great success in this experiment depended in no small measure on his thorough training in traditional methods. The lecturer then played parts of the first and third movements of the work, "In the Campagna," and "By Sorrento's Strand."

Beethoven's "Piano Concerto in G," it was suggested, also contained in its second movement an example of the same style of "poetic" or definitely expressive musical ideas. In illustration, the movement was played in full.

The lecture closed with an exposition and performance of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which constitutes the third number on tonight's programme. Mr. Mason played with sureness of touch and sympathetic understanding and was warm applauded. The recital was gi the lecture hall, Academy of under Institute auspices.

be unrest, [illegible] is sustained to the last bar. It was given a splendid reading, it goes without saying.

Novelty of the Programme.

Following the Sibelius came Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the novelty of the programme, which is best described in the German words "symphonisches Lebensbild." By comparison with the task before the composer who sets himself to compose a portrait in tones the matter of writing a musical biography is simple, and the composer of "Schlemini" was quite equal to his task.

In analyzing his own work Reznicek said that this symphonic poem had nothing to do with the Peter Schemihl of the Chamisso story, who lost his shadow. It is intended only to portray the fate "of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence." That he accomplished what he set out to do was the opinion of most of the hearers last night, especially those who had the programme notes to guide them.

There are some really beautiful passages in the work and some of a stirring quality of real worth. The prayer, a tenor solo, sung last night by Paul Draper, is Goethe's "Wanderers Nachtlied." With the organ accompaniment it makes an effective prelude to the final theme. When it is heard again probably it will be welcome on New York programmes.

Full of Novel Twists

An "overture to a come speare," by Paul Scheinpflu
the list. It is a brilliantly light and melodious, and twists and turns. The am when the Glockenspiel do pected trick, leaves a plea
sion.

The band played with its finish and charm. It i somehow, that the players
joy their work, which may ble for the perfect ensemble

---

ance [illegible] in it might be explained [illegible] ground that it was designed to be delineative of outward incident, like some of the "Kalewala" music, but unless this explanation be adopted and the programme confessed it must leave the mind of the normal listener in a maze.

Needless to say, the great band gave it a splendid performance, a performance which brought out most effectively the technical excellencies of the work and the composer's mastery of orchestral effect. The audience gave the symphony only a polite reception.

The Reznicek "Symphonic Biography" was very much in the school of Richard Strauss. It portrayed the "life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence," and portrayed it in the usual mood of flambuoyant pessimism so prevalent in musical Germany of to-day. It was in spirit a sort of compound of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Symphonia Domestica." It possessed some melodic inspiration, which was overwhelmed by a mass of Straussian dissonances, and it was in addition entirely too long. In fact, there seemed altogether too much ado about a very uninteresting character, the chief merit of the composition being its sense of orchestral technical mastery.

The tenor solo in the composition was sung by Mr. Paul Draper. Why Mr. Draper should have been selected to sing it must have roused much wonder.

H. E. K.

---

things he meant to depict. Among them there appear the vicious man, straying in a fantastical orgy, a female dancer, a mad flute player, a humpbacked dwarf, a love scene and a man seized with disgust who lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

How all of that could be expressed musically without seeming to wander in treatment occasionally is a wonder. There were entrancing fragments of music amidst the harsh sounding of the brass section and lound beating of drums. There were thrilling climaxes, such as the one directly following the incidental vocal solo which was sung by Mr. Paul Draper, who has shown himself before now equal to almost any task requiring perfect intonation in chromatic works. He did his little work well.

The symphonic biography as a whole in spite of its beauties, some of which were suggestive of more than one of Germany's composers, did not give the impression of being a unified whole. Sometimes the orchestral effects seemed to have been used simply to display the composer's ingenuity rather than to bring out pictorial effects.

Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare was the third and last work played. The playing of the orchestra was excellent, all that could be desired, but the amount of applause which followed the numbers would indicate that there were many in the audience who would prefer to hear Dr. Muck and his men play more of the classics than of present day novelties.

◆

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS AUDIENCE

Schienpflug's 'Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare' Saves Programme.

OTHER NUMBERS TECHNICALLY FINE

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Biography" Brilliantly Played.

The Orchestra from Boston came to us again last night, and Carnegie Hall held an audience such as gathers there only when Major Higginson's musicians honor us with their presence. It was an audience which contained all that is most brilliant in New York's musical public; it came hoping and expecting to be conquered—and despite the programme it was conquered, solely by the magnificent playing of the band under Dr. Muck's baton.

It must be said at the outset that the programme was one of the dullest ever given by Dr. Muck at a Boston Symphony concert. It contained only three numbers, of which only the last, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," brought happiness. This overture was a bright and very characteristic composition into which is worked a charming English melody of the sixteenth century. It sent the audience away happy, and almost willing to forgive the boredom which had gone before. The two preceding numbers were Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography for full orchestra, tenor solo and organ.

We have made a larger acquaintance with Sibelius's music since he first charmed us with his "Finlandia" and his early symphonies. His music, based on incidents in the Finnish epic, "Kalewala," has aroused a sincere admiration for his genius as an interpreter of the national spirit in music. But his fourth symphony is still repellent, or we are still rebellent. It still seems to us that if it is not it ought to be irritating to all who have not made it a point to see beauty and significance in every kind of expression in the art, provided it departs sufficiently far from the accepted canons of taste. This is one of the affectations which will no doubt be rooted out of music as one of the results of the cataclysm through which civilization is passing now. After it will come a greater tranquillity of thought, a sincerer devotion to æsthetic principles, less arrogant assertion of the privilege of doing what one pleases, based on the notion that the layman is an ignoramus and the critic a pedant, and that an artist needs only say that he feels it to be right to do as he is doing, and that, if an observer disputes his right to paint a red house with blue pigments, the observer simply does not see with artist's eyes.

The latest of Sibelius's symphonies is crude and rude in its thematic material, and in its harmonization seems purposely designed to pain the ears of its hearers. As was said here a year and a half ago, it is an individual expression beyond question, but it will be hard for anyone to believe that the composer wrote it because it was the voice of an[illegible] pathetical or emotional

---

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

DREARY PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Evening Concert Tedious—Reznicek's Symphonic Biography Has First Hearing.

Musically, last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall was unspeakably dreary.

The first fifty minutes of wasted musical effort was devoted to Jean Sibilius's fourth symphony, in A minor, which received its American premiere at a New York Symphony Orchestra concert on March 2, 1913.

Following the symphony was the first performance in this city of Emil Nikolaus Reznicek's symphonic biography, entitled "Schlemihl." Declaring in his own analysis of the work that it has nothing to do in any way with Chamisso's Schlemihl, who has been embodied in "The Tales of Hoffmann," the Austrian composer explains that his music is intended to depict, in tones, the life of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence.

Played without pause between the four sections, the composition is frankly descriptive and filled with constant contrasts that serve the intended purpose.

The music portrays the first haughty bearing of man, then destiny, his strayings and debauchery, and his struggles toward downfall. The close brings a prayer for peace, in which a tenor solo is introduced.

Were this symphonic biography shorter it might gain in value.

A performance that did not show the orchestra at its best included the added services of an organist and Paul Draper, whose singing of the prayer was weak in voice and style. The final work on the programme was Scheinpflug's overture to a Shakespeare comedy.

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914
Est

Strange Things Told in Music by Boston Men

◆

Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography," Played by Orchestra, Depicts a Humpback, a Dancer and a Disgusted Man.

◆

Advocates of modern music got their fill of unusual harmonies and orchestral effects at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Dr. Karl Muck chose three works of the most modern style of presentation. The fourth symphony of the Finnish composer Sibelius, with which the programme began, is already known in this city, having been introduced to this country by the New York Symphony Orchestra last year. It is a strange work, dissonant but not so highly colored as the majority of modern things.

The real novelty of the evening was a new work by a Viennese composer, Reznicek, called "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography. As with many late compositions, it was played without pause and was so long as to tax the nerves of many hearers whose taste does not run toward dissonance. At first it seemed a disconnected succession of episodes. Perhaps that is what the composer meant it to be.

In his own analysis printed in the programme [illegible] Reznicek gives some of the

---

From DAILY PEOPLE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 - 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Concert of Modern Music by Sibelius, Reznicek, and Schienpflug.

Dr. Muck put the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening in Carnegie Hill to probably the severest test it has ever been subjected to, of its capacity to absorb new music. The result was scarcely less than a proof of iron endurance. His programme was made up of three modern compositions—Jean Sibelius's fourth symphony in A minor, Emil Reznicek's "symphonic biography," as he calls it, "Schlemihl," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare." Of these the first and last had been heard in New York before, but were at least unfamiliar to most of the listeners and new perhaps to many.

Sibelius's symphony was played in March, 1913, by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It was at that time scarcely intelligible to many of its listeners; last evening it was no more so. Its four movements are strangely disjointed, fragmentary, thin in substance. It was remarked when it was first heard here that it signifies a sudden and complete departure of the composer from all his previous musical ideals as they have been represented in other of his orchestral compositions known to New York.

It seems still hemmed in with doubts of his own raising; uncertainties, halfhearted attempts, beginnings without issue. His themes are long and diffuse, but they are developed with little progress toward any definite result, vaguely, with an irresolute touch. They are dropped and something else taken up; they vanish mysteriously and leave no sign. The movements wander on and expire like a candle blown out. Their substance and method are wholly rhapsodical. The second, an "allegro molto vivace," begins somewhat more coherently than the others, with a rhythmically striking theme in the feeling of a scherzo, but the mists soon gather around it, and it vanishes into nothingness with an abruptness that leaves the audience for several seconds bewildered. The composer gathers himself finally in the third movement for a strong and eloquent passage, and again in the last movement, but they are very brief, and he returns to his wandering unisons, his fragmentary reiterations.

The instrumentation is very light and transparent. There are "modern" effects of the "whole tone scale." The themes are often presented in imitation by one and another choir with a harmonic background thin to the verge of barrenness. They are set against each other in biting dissonances with perfect unconcern. The performance was a remarkably finished one and the analysis of the work to which Dr. Muck's reading subjected it seemed to lay bare its thinness pitilessly.

The symphony, at least, gives the impression of being the work of a musical personality, however, misdirected. Reznicek's long "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," however is the pretentious and bombastic attempt of a commonplace imitator of Strauss. The elaborate framework of a "programme," given by the composer in detail, is such as Strauss uses with infinitely greater talent. Some of the themes, such as that which opens the work, representing "the man," show their source without much guile. There is the whole outfit of biographical detail, which the music pursues with a fidelity purely literary, wholly incompatible with a real musical significance.

It is full of the conventional signs, signals, and earmarks of the musician bent more on a programme than on music, and without the talent to produce a plausible compatibility between them. At the end "the word" must be allowed to enter, to give full expression to the climax; and Mr. Paul Draper sang the short solo which is a setting of Goethe's "Wanderer's Nachtlied." The orchestra played the work with great finish and with elaborate bravura.

Scheinpflug's overture was played here by the Boston Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction, in March, 1909, when it gave pleasure as a clever piece of musical humor, with traits of a true comic spirit.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the first of its second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra was tuned to the pitch of its perfections. Perhaps it is too much to expect the perfections of any orchestra in the world at the very beginning of a season, but of the Boston Orchestra we do. The performance of its first pair of concerts here a few weeks ago was so nearly all of what we have grown accustomed to expect that the performance last night, with the excitement of its transparent fire, was almost a surprise.

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, which headed the programme, was played for the first time by this orchestra two years ago in Boston. Any one who had heard the two performances might well have wondered at the clarity with which all that is so beautifully mysterious in this music had at last been embodied. In the first performance there was the groping of a life in a mist. In the performance last night the symphony seemed like a cloud of evaporating sculpture. Neither performance was obscure, and in neither performance did the symphony itself seem less profound with the questioning shapes of life that cannot be answered. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is a supreme invitation to revery.

Individual as this music is and as rich as it is in innovations, it does not belong to the so-called music of the future. It is not Cubist music and it is not Futurist music, though it has been called such by critics who see in Cubism and Futurism only something which they cannot see through. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is organically connected with the traditional forms, but it is completely free from the traditional rhetoric of music, the dramatic emphasis which is the birthmark of self-consciousness, the gesture of climax. The symphony of introspection, it is never the soliloquy of the theatre. A little like a maniac, it talks to itself; it is the lonely solo of lonely thought; it is the only solipsist in art. And so the tones of eloquence are all quite naturally absent.

Intensity of mood seems to strangle the tone instead of releasing it, and in the place of a fortissimo there is continually the effect of exploding into silence. The ending of the second movement is the most mysteriously sudden effect that I know in music. It comes like sudden death to a man who is thinking only of living, not merely without preparation, without even the pause of recognition. It makes the anticlimax of life itself.

The second number was the "Schlemihl," by Reznicek, a brilliant and moving piece of programme music which had here its first performance in New York. This work is not without reminiscences of Strauss and Wagner, but is none the less fresh with its own individuality, full of vivacity and novel coloring. Certain passages for the harps did much by a queer brittle effect of splintered sound to show a new way to deal with an instrument that needs to be desentimentalized. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare" brought the concert to a close with a systematic mingling of modern Germany and Elizabethan England.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE

Mason's Analysis of Concert to Be Given Tonight.

In his lecture recital last evening on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given tonight, Daniel Gregory Mason, first took up Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," his symphonic fantasia, which was written in 1886 when the composer was twenty-two years old. It marked the transition from his classical to his "poetic" or "realistic" style. His earlier works, influenced chiefly by Brahms, followed the traditional forms, such as the sonata form, based on a systematic arrangement of melodies. At the time "Aus Italien" was written, Strauss was dissatisfied with these forms, and began, under the influence of his friend, Alexander Ritter, to work in the direction which Berlioz and Liszt had indicated — "programme music" — based on a free evolution of themes. Mr. Mason pointed out that his great success in this experiment depended in no small measure on his thorough training in traditional methods. The lecturer then played parts of the first and third movements of the work, "In the Campagna," and "By Sorrento's Strand."

Beethoven's "Piano Concerto in G," it was suggested, also contained in its second movement an example of the same style of "poetic" or definitely expressive musical ideas. In illustration, the movement was played in full.

The lecture closed with an exposition and performance of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which constitutes the third number on tonight's programme. Mr. Mason played with sureness of touch and sympa thetic understanding and was warr applauded. The recital was gi the lecture hall, Academy of under Institute auspices.

be unrest, [illegible] is sustained to the last bar. It was given a splendid reading, it goes without saying.

Novelty of the Programme.

Following the Sibelius came Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the novelty of the programme, which is best described in the German words "symphonisches Lebensbild." By comparison with the task before the composer who sets himself to compose a portrait in tones the matter of writing a musical biography is simple, and the composer of "Schlemihl" was quite equal to his task.

In analyzing his own work Reznicek said that this symphonic poem had nothing to do with the Peter Schemihl of the Chamisso story, who lost his shadow. It is intended only to portray the fate "of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence." That he accomplished what he set out to do was the opinion of most of the hearers last night, especially those who had the programme notes to guide them.

There are some really beautiful passages in the work and some of a stirring quality of real worth. The prayer, a tenor solo, sung last night by Paul Draper, is Goethe's "Wanderers Nachtlied." With the organ accompaniment it makes an effective prelude to the final theme. When it is heard again probably it will be welcome on New York programmes.

Full of Novel Twists and Turns.

An "overture to a comedy of Shakespeare," by Paul Scheinpflug, completed the list. It is a brilliantly scored piece, light and melodious, and full of novel twists and turns. The amusing ending, when the Glockenspiel does an unexpected trick, leaves a pleasant impression.

The band played with its usual superb finish and charm. It is noticeable, somehow, that the players seem to enjoy their work, which may be responsible for the perfect ensemble.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS AUDIENCE

Schienpflug's 'Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare' Saves Programme.

OTHER NUMBERS TECHNICALLY FINE

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Biography" Brilliantly Played.

The Orchestra from Boston came to us again last night, and Carnegie Hall held an audience such as gathers there only when Major Higginson's musicians honor us with their presence. It was an audience which contained all that is most brilliant in New York's musical public; it came hoping and expecting to be conquered—and despite the programme it was conquered, solely by the magnificent playing of the band under Dr. Muck's baton.

It must be said at the outset that the programme was one of the dullest ever given by Dr. Muck at a Boston Symphony concert. It contained only three numbers, of which only the last, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," brought happiness. This overture was a bright and very characteristic composition into which is worked a charming English melody of the sixteenth century. It sent the audience away happy, and almost willing to forgive the boredom which had gone before. The two preceding numbers were Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and Reznicek's "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography for full orchestra, tenor solo and organ.

We have made a larger acquaintance with Sibelius's music since he first charmed us with his "Finlandia" and his early symphonies. His music, based on incidents in the Finnish epic, "Kalewala," has aroused a sincere admiration for his genius as an interpreter of the national spirit in music. But his fourth symphony is still repellent, or we are still rebellent. It still seems to us that if it is not it ought to be irritating to all who have not made it a point to see beauty and significance in every kind of expression in the art, provided it departs sufficiently far from the accepted canons of taste. This is one of the affectations which will no doubt be rooted out of music as one of the results of the cataclysm through which civilization is passing now. After it will come a greater tranquillity of thought, a sincerer devotion to æsthetic principles, less arrogant assertion of the privilege of doing what one pleases, based on the notion that the layman is an ignoramus and the critic a pedant, and that an artist needs only say that he feels it to be right to do as he is doing, and that, if an observer disputes his right to paint a red house with blue pigments, the observer simply does not see with artist's eyes.

The latest of Sibelius's symphonies is crude and rude in its thematic material, and in its harmonization seems purposely designed to pain the ears of its hearers. As was said here a year and a half ago, it is an individual expression beyond question, but it will be hard for anyone to believe that the composer wrote it because it was the voice of an æsthetical or emotional [illegible] for utterance [illegible] in it might be explained on the ground that it was designed to be delineative of outward incident, like some of the "Kalewala" music, but unless this explanation be adopted and the programme confessed it must leave the mind of the normal listener in a maze.

Needless to say, the great band gave it a splendid performance, a performance which brought out most effectively the technical excellencies of the work and the composer's mastery of orchestral effect. The audience gave the symphony only a polite reception.

The Reznicek "Symphonic Biography" was very much in the school of Richard Strauss. It portrayed the "life and fate of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence," and portrayed it in the usual mood of flambuoyant pessimism so prevalent in musical Germany of to-day. It was in spirit a sort of compound of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Symphonia Domestica." It possessed some melodic inspiration, which was overwhelmed by a mass of Straussian dissonances, and it was in addition entirely too long. In fact, there seemed altogether too much ado about a very uninteresting character, the chief merit of the composition being its sense of orchestral technical mastery.

The tenor solo in the composition was sung by Mr. Paul Draper. Why Mr. Draper should have been selected to sing it must have roused much won-

H. E. K.

D
v York City

RY PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

d Evening Concert Tedious—nicek's Symphonic Biography Has First Hearing.

Musically, last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall was unspeakably dreary.

The first fifty minutes of wasted musical effort was devoted to Jean Sibilius's fourth symphony, in A minor, which received its American premiere at a New York Symphony Orchestra concert on March 2, 1913.

Following the symphony was the first performance in this city of Emil Nikolaus Reznicek's symphonic biography, entitled "Schlemihl." Declaring in his own analysis of the work that it has nothing to do in any way with Chamisso's Schlemihl, who has been embodied in "The Tales of Hoffmann," the Austrian composer explains that his music is intended to depict, in tones, the life of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence.

Played without pause between the four sections, the composition is frankly descriptive and filled with constant contrasts that serve the intended purpose.

The music portrays the first haughty bearing of man, then destiny, his strayings and debauchery, and his struggles toward downfall. The close brings a prayer for peace, in which a tenor solo is introduced.

Were this symphonic biography shorter it might gain in value.

A performance that did not show the orchestra at its best included the added services of an organist and Paul Draper, whose singing of the prayer was weak in voice and style. The final work on the programme was Scheinpflug's overture to a Shakespeare comedy.

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914

Strange Things Told in Music by Boston Men

Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography," Played by Orchestra, Depicts a Humpback, a Dancer and a Disgusted Man.

Advocates of modern music got their fill of unusual harmonies and orchestral effects at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Dr. Karl Muck chose three works of the most modern style of presentation. The fourth symphony of the Finnish composer Sibelius, with which the programme began, is already known in this city, having been introduced to this country by the New York Symphony Orchestra last year. It is a strange work, dissonant but not so highly colored as the majority of modern things.

The real novelty of the evening was a new work by a Viennese composer, Reznicek, called "Schlemihl," a symphonic biography. As with many late compositions, it was played without pause and was so long as to tax the nerves of many hearers whose taste does not run toward dissonance. At first it seemed a disconnected succession of episodes. Perhaps that is what the composer meant it to be.

In his own analysis printed in the programme notes Reznicek gives some of the things he meant to depict. Among them there appear the vicious man, straying in a fantastical orgy, a female dancer, a mad flute player, a humpbacked dwarf, a love scene and a man seized with disgust who lets himself glide toward Nirvana.

How all of that could be expressed musically without seeming to wander in treatment occasionally is a wonder. There were entrancing fragments of music amidst the harsh sounding of the brass section and lound beating of drums. There were thrilling climaxes, such as the one directly following the incidental vocal solo which was sung by Mr. Paul Draper, who has shown himself before now equal to almost any task requiring perfect intonation in chromatic works. He did his little work well.

The symphonic biography as a whole in spite of its beauties, some of which were suggestive of more than one of Germany's composers, did not give the impression of being a unified whole. Sometimes the orchestral effects seemed to have been used simply to display the composer's ingenuity rather than to bring out pictorial effects.

Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare was the third and last work played. The playing of the orchestra was excellent, all that could be desired, but the amount of applause which followed the numbers would indicate that there were many in the audience who would prefer to hear Dr. Muck and his men play more of the classics than of present day novelties.

From DAILY PEOPLE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 - 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Concert of Modern Music by Sibelius, Reznicek, and Schienpflug.

Dr. Muck put the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening in Carnegie Hill to probably the severest test it has ever been subjected to, of its capacity to absorb new music. The result was scarcely less than a proof of iron endurance. His programme was made up of three modern compositions—Jean Sibelius's fourth symphony in A minor, Emil Reznicek's "symphonic biography," as he calls it, "Schlemihl," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakepeare." Of these the first and last had been heard in New York before, but were at least unfamiliar to most of the listeners and new perhaps to many.

Sibelius's symphony was played in March, 1913, by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It was at that time scarcely intelligible to many of its listeners; last evening it was no more so. Its four movements are strangely disjointed, fragmentary, thin in substance. It was remarked when it was first heard here that it signifies a sudden and complete departure of the composer from all his previous musical ideals as they have been represented in other of his orchestral compositions known to New York.

It seems still hemmed in with doubts of his own raising; uncertainties, half-hearted attempts, beginnings without issue. His themes are long and diffuse, but they are developed with little progress toward any definite result, vaguely, with an irresolute touch. They are dropped and something else taken up; they vanish mysteriously and leave no sign. The movements wander on and expire like a candle blown out. Their substance and method are wholly rhapsodical. The second, an "allegro molto vivace," begins somewhat more coherently than the others, with a rhythmically striking theme in the feeling of a scherzo, but the mists soon gather around it, and it vanishes into nothingness with an abruptness that leaves the audience for several seconds bewildered. The composer gathers himself finally in the third movement for a strong and eloquent passage, and again in the last movement, but they are very brief, and he returns to his wandering unisons, his fragmentary reiterations.

The instrumentation is very light and transparent. There are "modern" effects of the "whole tone scale." The themes are often presented in imitation by one and another choir with a harmonic background thin to the verge of barrenness. They are set against each other in biting dissonances with perfect unconcern. The performance was a remarkably finished one and the analysis of the work to which Dr. Muck's reading subjected it seemed to lay bare its thinness pitilessly.

The symphony, at least, gives the impression of being the work of a musical personality, however, misdirected. Reznicek's long "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," however is the pretentious and bombastic attempt of a commonplace imitator of Strauss. The elaborate framework of a "programme," given by the composer in detail, is such as Strauss uses with infinitely greater talent. Some of the themes, such as that which opens the work, representing "the man," show their source without much guile. There is the whole outfit of biographical detail, which the music pursues with a fidelity purely literary, wholly incompatible with a real musical significance.

It is full of the conventional signs, signals, and earmarks of the musician bent more on a programme than on music, and without the talent to produce a plausible compatibility between them. At the end "the word" must be allowed to enter, to give full expression to the climax; and Mr. Paul Draper sang the short solo which is a setting of Goethe's "Wanderer's Nachtlied." The orchestra played the work with great finish and with elaborate bravura.

Scheinpflug's overture was played here by the Boston Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction, in March, 1909, when it gave pleasure as a clever piece of musical humor, with traits of a true comic spirit.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 4 - 1914

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the first of its second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra was tuned to the pitch of its perfections. Perhaps it is too much to expect the perfections of any orchestra in the world at the very beginning of a season, but of the Boston Orchestra we do. The performance of its first pair of concerts here a few weeks ago was so nearly all of what we have grown accustomed to expect that the performance last night, with the excitement of its transparent fire, was almost a surprise.

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, which headed the programme, was played for the first time by this orchestra two years ago in Boston. Any one who had heard the two performances might well have wondered at the clarity with which all that is so beautifully mysterious in this music had at last been embodied. In the first performance there was the groping of a life in a mist. In the performance last night the symphony seemed like a cloud of evaporating sculpture. Neither performance was obscure, and in neither performance did the symphony itself seem less profound with the questioning shapes of life that cannot be answered. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is a supreme invitation to revery.

Individual as this music is and as rich as it is in innovations, it does not belong to the so-called music of the future. It is not Cubist music and it is not Futurist music, though it has been called such by critics who see in Cubism and Futurism only something which they cannot see through. The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius is organically connected with the traditional forms, but it is completely free from the traditional rhetoric of music, the dramatic emphasis which is the birthmark of self-consciousness, the gesture of climax. The symphony of introspection, it is never the soliloquy of the theatre. A little like a maniac, it talks to itself; it is the lonely solo of lonely thought; it is the only solipsist in art. And so the tones of eloquence are all quite naturally absent.

Intensity of mood seems to strangle the tone instead of releasing it, and in the place of a fortissimo there is continually the effect of exploding into silence. The ending of the second movement is the most mysteriously sudden effect that I know in music. It comes like sudden death to a man who is thinking only of living, not merely without preparation, without even the pause of recognition. It makes the anticlimax of life itself.

The second number was the "Schlemihl," by Reznicek, a brilliant and moving piece of programme music which had here its first performance in New York. This work is not without reminiscences of Strauss and Wagner, but is none the less fresh with its own individuality, full of vivacity and novel coloring. Certain passages for the harps did much by a queer brittle effect of splintered sound to show a new way to deal with an instrument that needs to be desentimentalized. Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare" brought the concert to a close with a systematic mingling of modern Germany and Elizabethan England.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE

Mason's Analysis of Concert to Be Given Tonight.

In his lecture recital last evening on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given tonight, Daniel Gregory Mason, first took up Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," his symphonic fantasia, which was written in 1886 when the composer was twenty-two years old. It marked the transition from his classical to his "poetic" or "realistic" style. His earlier works, influenced chiefly by Brahms, followed the traditional forms, such as the sonata form, based on a systematic arrangement of melodies. At the time "Aus Italien" was written, Strauss was dissatisfied with these forms, and began, under the influence of his friend, Alexander Ritter, to work in the direction which Berlioz and Liszt had indicated — "programme music" — based on a free evolution of themes. Mr. Mason pointed out that his great success in this experiment depended in no small measure on his thorough training in traditional methods. The lecturer then played parts of the first and third movements of the work, "In the Campagna," and "By Sorrento's Strand."

Beethoven's "Piano Concerto in G," it was suggested, also contained in its second movement an example of the same style of "poetic" or definitely expressive musical ideas. In illustration, the movement was played in full.

The lecture closed with an exposition and performance of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which constitutes the third number on tonight's programme. Mr. Mason played with sureness of touch and sympathetic understanding and was warm[illegible] applauded. The recital was gi[illegible] the lecture hall, Academy of [illegible] under Institute auspices.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 – 19

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Dr. Muck's Revenge.

Dr. Carl Muck is not in sympathy with the cubists and futurists in music. Why then did he dismay, bore, and ruffle his large audience in Carnegie Hall last night by inflicting on it nearly two hours of the dullest and most bizarre music of the cubist-futurist school? Judging by the remarks he made when he came back from Berlin a few weeks ago, one might fancy that he did this in order to get even with at least some of the Americans for siding with the Allies. It is more likely, however, that he has put this music on his programmes because he was sharply censured in Boston last season for not doing this very thing. If this is the explanation, he was justified in having his revenge by playing this sort of stuff in Boston; but why make New Yorkers suffer for the insistence and challenge of H. T. Parker and other Bostonians?

It is pretty safe to say that very few of those who heard the fourth symphony of Sibelius as rendered by Walter Damrosch on March 2, 1913, in Aeolian Hall, were anxious to hear it again. It was played last night in a much more polished manner, it is needless to say; but the music seemed as incoherent, empty, dull, and pointless as before. Here and there there were a few bars of striking harmony, or of lovely orchestral coloring usually reminiscent of Wagner; but as a whole this symphony did not deserve the honor of being performed by so splendid an orchestra as the Boston Symphony. There was little applause, and, during the ten-minute intermission following it, many of the most loyal subscribers were in open mutiny. More than a dozen of them expressed themselves to the present writer in emphatic language as to the deplorable waste of time. "I have only five opportunities every year to enjoy the Boston Orchestra," said one, "and I don't want to hear such stuff." "Dr. Muck," said another, "is not a good programme-maker, but this one is the limit." "He is abusing his privilege," said a third; and a fourth exclaimed: "He ought to let Stransky make his programmes."

The following number threw the audience from the fryingpan into the fire. The Sibelius symphony was, at any rate, the work of a composer who, by his earlier works, established his claims to originality; but the so-called "symphonic biography" called "Schlemihl," by Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek, which was presented as a novelty, proved to be, as the "programme" provided by its composer led one to anticipate, an imitation of the methods, tricks, and frills of Richard Strauss. What these methods, tricks, and frills are everybody knows. One of them is to soak the audience in vinegar or brine for ten minutes, and then, by contrast, enchant everybody by treating it to a few bars of sugar-water, which, under ordinary conditions, would seem insipid. Another is to suddenly introduce in the midst of the cacophony a few bars of a folksong. In this case it was "O du lieber Augustin." But the most ingenious of these tricks is, after straining the endurance of the audience to the limit, to build up at the end a stupendous, thrilling climax of sound, involving all the orchestral forces, which inevitably overwhelms the audience and makes it burst out into loud applause. That happened last night; and it was only fair that the orchestra should be made to rise for its superb performance of a work which, it is to be hoped, will not be again inflicted on a New York audience.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date DEC

Bauer Plays With Symphony

The program of the Boston Symphony at the Academy last night was all of a piece. A fine air of high and serious intention marked the work of conductor, orchestra and soloist. Doctor Muck conducted first the second symphony of Brahms. Then Harold Bauer played, with the orchestra, the third concerto of Beethoven, and the program ended with the Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont." All of it was done with irreproachable excellence.

Mr. Bauer has trod the way of all great pianists and of the few great ones now living. Year by year he has diminished in virtuosity and grown greater in poetic eloquence, in true feeling, in making his technique an instrument and not an end. He was never an advertised prodigy; his reputation grew steadily as an artist and as an artist alone. That is perhaps the reason why the topmost gallery was not crowded last night. There is nothing superficial, nothing meretricious about Mr. Bauer's playing, nothing to attract any but the truest lovers of music.

Last night he played a difficult concerta, and one particularly ungrateful to the prodigy type of pianist. In the greater part of the first movement the piano is executing delicate embroideries about the smooth and shining cloth of the orchestra's weaving. In the combined andante and rondo the piano comes into its own, but even there Mr. Bauer kept it in the swing of the orchestra, making his instrument a necessary complement of the whole.

It is not that Mr. Bauer ever lacked technique. The perfection of each separate note, the sureness of phrasing, the finely intelligent reading of the score which he made last night, are all proof that in a question of technique Mr. Bauer is with the masters. But he knows that the great thing is to make each separate item of feeling felt, just as it is necessary to give each note its place. His accents in the cantabile passages were made with artistic righteousness, and his fire in the rondo was gloriously stirring.

Doctor Muck's part in the concerto was not less fine. The modulation of orchestral tones which he accomplished, always thinking of the music and not of orchestra or soloist, was perfect. And when, on two occasions, he swung the orchestra into the stride of the piano, after a long cadenza, the effect was of such surpassing beauty that it was almost too much to bear.

The concerto came in the middle of the program, but it sent the Brahms symphony into far oblivion, and made it very hard to listen even to Beethoven's own "Egmont." It is now exactly four weeks since Doctor Muck led the "Eroica" symphony here, but the memory of its splendor has not died out. That memory made the intellectual melodies of Brahms seem almost pathetically unreal. Melodies there were, but they were not rich, not informed with gracious spirit, except for the allegretto.

And admitting that in its graciousness there is a touch of life, there remains the distinction that Brahms' dance is a ballet, an intellectual diversion, pretty to look at, but it does not draw the feet of the hearer into its swing. And to dance one should listen with the feet, not with the ear. When Beethoven wrote dances, they were human, like the fox-trot. Brahms' dance is a ballet.

It was this mental quality of the symphony which tinged the whole evening and removed it by an appreciable step from the former triumphs of the Boston Symphony. Of Doctor Muck's graceful, powerful leading there is no need to say again what is so well known—that it is one of the highest pleasures vouchsafed us. It has been said that the Boston Symphony is the finest single instrument given a man to play upon—and Doctor Muck is the happy man who deserves that honor. But the orchestra was not at its noblest last night, except in the concerto. Even the stressful "Egmnot" did not lift it to abnormal heights. And one has learned to expect the very highest from these players. That explains why their sustained and even glory was not so effective last night. They could do the mosaic of raindrops in the symphony, and the powerful emotion of the "Egmont," but they had no music which called for perfection of feeling as well as for perfection of art.

---

the Reznicek "biograhy" as to become demarcation that put an end to interest in the latter. After five minutes of Reznicek, one cursed the whole tribe of programmatists in music, from the good but irritating Abbe Liszt down to the newest worker in this vineyard of chaff.

But Sibelius is far from this clan of blatant dabblers in puerile futilities. He is a composer of music and not a mere illustrator of a literary fabric whose texture would be beneath the contempt of a tenth-rate pseudo-philosophic literarian.

Sibelius has an imagination that finds its expression in music alone, in distinctively individual, intensely subjective music. He has absorbed the many inventions of the Frenchmen of the day, but he gives them forth according to his own purposes. The complexities of his utterance are hidden within the structure of this music, whilst the speech itself is admirably simple, eloquently simple.

This is music that finds its roots entwined among the principles that dominated the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. But its message to a modern audience is a voice from life itself, the life of the period, the sanely materialistic, aristocratically spiritual philosophy of the few. It is the gospel of futility in all save the single human manifestation of beauty.

Dr. Muck played the Sibelius symphony with much clarifying attention to detail, with a penetrative account of its rhythmic necessities and enlightening variety of tempo and dynamics, but there might have been more vigor, more emphasis upon its expression of brooding hopelessness. The orchestra played it with conviction. Of particular beauty were the many passages amounting almost to solo features as played by the several first instruments.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date DEC 4 – 1914

Boston Symphony Concert.

Far different from the melodies of Schubert and the harmonious motions of ancient Greece were the discordant modernisms presented on the same stage in the evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck chose to open his programme with the futuristic fourth symphony of Sibelius, which had already been given a half-hearted trial by one of the New York orchestras.

It is difficult to tell just what the Finnish composer is trying to express in this work. The first two movements are utterly incoherent, full of experiments and tentative suggestions of "motifs" and harmonies, but never arriving at any definite means of articulation.

The third and fourth movements, however, contain passages of real beauty, all the more impressive because of their deliberately ugly surroundings.

The symphony as a whole is bewildering, but compels a desire for further hearings. It may be assumed that the orchestra played it well, although a thousand mistakes might easily have been made without being detected.

Reznicek's "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," was given its first New York performance. This elaborate piece of programme music fairly eclipsed the symphony in the forcefulness of its melodic ideas, the dramatic power of its whole conception and the masterly skill of its instrumentation.

A novel device was the introduction of a short tenor solo near the close, bringing out in actual words the final episode in the story illustrated by the composition.

The programme ended with Schinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," a Teutonic cultivation of an old English melody. Altogether a pretty heavy meal to be taken at one sitting, Dr. Muck!

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS THE ULTRA

Programme of Last Evening Opened With the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

A "SYMPHONIC BIOGRAPHY"

"Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Scheinpflug Closes Programme.

By STANLEY OLMSTED.

The second seasonal programme of the Boston Symphony offered at Carnegie Hall would no doubt strike many listeners as aptly timed with the promised exhibition of paintings by Matisse. Since men have made music at all there has always been perhaps a majority who has failed to find accord and sympathy with whatever in each era has been deemed ultra.

The listening majority of the now differs no whit from the listening majority who once found Beethoven an irritating enigma and musical Sphinx riddle. Last night one heard an annihilating condemnation of Sibelius in the ten minutes' intermission following the rendition of his Symphony No. 4 in A minor.

The habitual Manhattan concert-goer had, of course, heard the symphony once before. He was inclined, therefore, to be more apathetic if in no respect more tolerant. When Mr. Damrosch escorted his New York orchestra through its maze of Finnish idiosyncrasies in the early part of 1913 he created a courteous attentiveness by an apology a priori. He requested, well-nigh implored, his audience, to strive their best to meet this symphony they were about to hear half way—as far as they could! One had to hear all sorts of things with a brave heart. Why not, therefore, Sibelius? He was so evidently sincere about it that the audience did its utmost to be nice.

No Longer Baffling.

At the hands of Dr. Muck and his virtuose musicians the contour and plan of the four movements became vastly clearer. There was the progress, you see, of a second hearing, coupled with every interpretive advantage. For one listener at least the work lost something of its first Kalevaler mysticism through the fact that it baffled him no longer. As heard last night it seemed nothing more nor less than a broadening and enlargement of that Swan song, sang throughont the concert halls of Europe, in the middle nineties, at the very outest of this Finnish composer's career. (Even in the timing of a Swan song, you perceive, there was an inversion.) It remains, however, a work of metaphysical sincerity with certain taut moments, closely defining something that may be that elusive fourth dimension. On the sense of the fourth dimension will it rely for fugitive responsiveness, until general public taste moves one peg further.

The second offering of the evening, "Schlemihl," characterized as a "Symphonic Biography" and composed by Emil Nipolaus von Reznicek, requires the composer's own analysis, printed in the Boston Symphony booklet, and impracticable here. It was played in New York for the first time. It will be best remembered after a single hearing by an episode of unusual, and even unique orchestral grandeur, just preceding the gliding closing chords wherein the programmatic hero sinks into Devachan.

Portrayed With Real Fervor.

The booklet calls it "sinking into Nirvana"—but Nirvana is reabsorption in the Supreme—not cessation through failure. The hero's mightiest effort, ere his relinquishment is here portrayed with a real fervor of exultation.

Closing this Boston Symphony concert there was played an "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare"—name of comedy undivulged, Sheinpflug, the composer, is familiar to many concertgoers through his "Fruehling ein Kampf und Lehenslied." The overture of last evening is like a blending of Cubism and the art of Maxfield Parrish.

The effect of the concert as an entirety was profound in one direction or the other, according to the conservatism or rebellious individualism of the listener.

Miss Beatrice, Gjertsen, an American who is Chamberlain-Singer and a member of the Grand Ducal Court Opera at Weimar, gave a vocal recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening, having been preceded in the same type of diversion by Miss Florence Austin

---

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

pictures of the Harvard-Yale game showing Coolidge's 9 yard run for a touchdown were an added feature.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A program made up of three numbers, long favorites with local audiences, and a soloist who has already won a strong following among music-lovers here made the popular success of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy a foregone conclusion. Beethoven, in two of his most stirring moods, represented by the fourth concerto for piano and the Egmont overture, and Brahms in the most melodic of his symphonies, the second, in D major, were the offerings. In all of them Dr. Muck's thorough leadership over his men was again apparent, as it has been ever since he assumed control of the organization, and his musicianly and temperamental reading of the scores was characteristic of him at his best.

Harold Bauer, the soloist, has grown steadily in his art since his first appearances here. The Beethoven concerto demands both technic and sympathetic understanding of the highest order, and to say that Mr, Bauer gave an interpretation that was in all ways satisfactory sums up his ability with no conservative praise. Contrasted with an unusual strength and resonant power is a limpid pianissimo fitly comparable to the traditional purling of brooks, with a mastery of all of the moods between. There is nothing sensational in his playing; it is sincere and well considered and colored throughout with a studiousness that is scholarly, without being even remotely pedantic.

In both the overture and the symphony the orchestra again demonstrated that it possesses a tonal quality that cannot be matched by any other organization that appears here. This is largely due unquestionably to the fact that it is financially able to own instruments that are masterpieces of the makers' art and that are unrivalled by any other similar collection in this country, but instruments alone are not sufficient to achieve the results that have given the Boston musicians their standing. The thorough training, the many years through which they have been playing as a body and the careful selection of men of proved ability all go to produce the qualities that have won them such a large following here and elsewhere.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

"Tristan" Sung at the Opera; Boston Band in New Music

The Boston Symphony audienc popularly credited with being New York's musical elect, went forth from the orchestra's concert at Carnegi Hall last evening with a more or les frank bepuzzlement on its face and i its speech, and possibly some unbetokened inner questionings. The audience was not quite sure whether it or Dr. Karl Muck, who provided a programme of bristling challenge, was at fault.

The challenge was quite indubitably apparent, for Dr. Muck presented three works which the greater part of those who listened found to be terra incognita. One of these works had never before been heard in New York, another only once, in March, 1913, and the third also only once, at a performance of the Boston Orchestra during the conductorship of Max Fiedler. All, moreover, are compositions of the last few years and embody the most modern of modernism in structure and orchestration and general scheme.

The three compositions were the Fourth Symphony of Jan Sibelius, Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek's "Schlemihl, a Symphonic Biography," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare."

If Dr. Muck strove for the element of contrast in this programme, he builded perhaps better than he knew, for the line was so sharply drawn between the Sibelius symphony and

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 — 19

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Dr. Muck's Revenge.

Dr. Carl Muck is not in sympathy with the cubists and futurists in music. Why then did he dismay, bore, and ruffle his large audience in Carnegie Hall last night by inflicting on it nearly two hours of the dullest and most bizarre music of the cubist-futurist school? Judging by the remarks he made when he came back from Berlin a few weeks ago, one might fancy that he did this in order to get even with at least some of the Americans for siding with the Allies. It is more likely, however, that he has put this music on his programmes because he was sharply censured in Boston last season for not doing this very thing. If this is the explanation, he was justified in having his revenge by playing this sort of stuff in Boston; but why make New Yorkers suffer for the insistence and challenge of H. T. Parker and other Bostonians?

It is pretty safe to say that very few of those who heard the fourth symphony of Sibelius as rendered by Walter Damrosch on March 2, 1913, in Aeolian Hall, were anxious to hear it again. It was played last night in a much more polished manner, it is needless to say; but the music seemed as incoherent, empty, dull, and pointless as before. Here and there there were a few bars of striking harmony, or of lovely orchestral coloring usually reminiscent of Wagner; but as a whole this symphony did not deserve the honor of being performed by so splendid an orchestra as the Boston Symphony. There was little applause, and, during the ten-minute intermission following it, many of the most loyal subscribers were in open mutiny. More than a dozen of them expressed themselves to the present writer in emphatic language as to the deplorable waste of time. "I have only five opportunities every year to enjoy the Boston Orchestra," said one, "and I don't want to hear such stuff." "Dr. Muck," said another, "is not a good programme-maker, but this one is the limit." "He is abusing his privilege," said a third; and a fourth exclaimed: "He ought to let Stransky make his programmes."

The following number threw the audience from the fryingpan into the fire. The Sibelius symphony was, at any rate, the work of a composer who, by his earlier works, established his claims to originality; but the so-called "symphonic biography" called "Schlemihl," by Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek, which was presented as a novelty, proved to be, as the "programme" provided by its composer led one to anticipate, an imitation of the methods, tricks, and frills of Richard Strauss. What these methods, tricks, and frills are everybody knows. One of them is to soak the audience in vinegar or brine for ten minutes, and then, by contrast, enchant everybody by treating it to a few bars of sugar-water, which, under ordinary conditions, would seem insipid. Another is to suddenly introduce in the midst of the cacophony a few bars of a folksong. In this case it was "O du lieber Augustin." But the most ingenious of these tricks is, after straining the endurance of the audience to the limit, to build up at the end a stupendous, thrilling climax of sound, involving all the orchestral forces, which inevitably overwhelms the audience and makes it burst out into loud applause. That happened last night; and it was only fair that the orchestra should be made to rise for its superb performance of a work which, it is to be hoped, will not be again inflicted on a New York audience.

---

om EVENING JOURNAL dress: New York City ate

Established: Lo

"Tristan" Sung at the Opera; Boston Band in New Music

The Boston Symphony audience popularly credited with being New York's musical elect, went forth from the orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last evening with a more or less frank bepuzzlement on its face and in its speech, and possibly some unbetokened inner questionings. The audience was not quite sure whether it or Dr. Karl Muck, who provided a programme of bristling challenge, was at fault.

The challenge was quite indubitably apparent, for Dr. Muck presented three works which the greater part of those who listened found to be terra incognita. One of these works had never before been heard in New York, another only once, in March, 1913, and the third also only once, at a performance of the Boston Orchestra during the conductorship of Max Fiedler. All, moreover, are compositions of the last few years and embody the most modern of modernism in structure and orchestration and general scheme.

The three compositions were the Fourth Symphony of Jan Sibelius, Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek's "Schlemihl, a Symphonic Biography," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare."

If Dr. Muck strove for the element of contrast in this programme, he builded perhaps better than he knew, for the line was so sharply drawn between the Sibelius symphony and he Reznicek "biograhy" as to become demarcation that put an end to inerest in the latter. After five minites of Reznicek, one cursed the vhole tribe of programmatists in nusic, from the good but irritating bbe Liszt down to the newest worker n this vineyard of chaff.

But Sibelius is far from this clan f blatant dabblers in puerile futilities. He is a composer of music and not a mere illustrator of a literary fabric whose texture would be beneath the contempt of a tenth-rate pseudo-philosophic literarian.

Sibelius has an imagination that finds its expression in music alone, in distinctively individual, intensely subjective music. He has absorbed the many inventions of the Frenchmen of the day, but he gives them forth according to his own purposes. The complexities of his utterance are hidden within the structure of this music, whilst the speech itself is admirably simple, eloquently simple.

This is music that finds its roots entwined among the principles that dominated the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. But its message to a modern audience is a voice from life itself, the life of the period, the sanely materialistic, aristocratically spiritual philosophy of the few. It is the gospel of futility in all save the single human manifestation of beauty.

Dr. Muck played the Sibelius symphony with much clarifying attention to detail, with a penetrative account of its rhythmic necessities and enlightening variety of tempo and dynamics, but there might have been more vigor, more emphasis upon its expression of brooding hopelessness. The orchestra played it with conviction. Of particular beauty were the many passages amounting almost to solo features as played by the several first instruments.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

Bauer Plays With Symphony

The program of the Boston Symphony at the Academy last night was all of a piece. A fine air of high and serious intention marked the work of conductor, orchestra and soloist. Doctor Muck conducted first the second symphony of Brahms. Then Harold Bauer played, with the orchestra, the third concerto of Beethoven, and the program ended with the Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont." All of it was done with irreproachable excellence.

Mr. Bauer has trod the way of all great pianists and of the few great ones now living. Year by year he has diminished in virtuosity and grown greater in poetic eloquence, in true feeling, in making his technique an instrument and not an end. He was never an advertised prodigy; his reputation grew steadily as an artist and as an artist alone. That is perhaps the reason why the topmost gallery was not crowded last night. There is nothing superficial, nothing meretricious about Mr. Bauer's playing, nothing to attract any but the truest lovers of music.

Last night he played a difficult concerta, and one particularly ungrateful to the prodigy type of pianist. In the greater part of the first movement the piano is executing delicate embroideries about the smooth and shining cloth of the orchestra's weaving. In the combined andante and rondo the piano comes into its own, but even there Mr. Bauer kept it in the swing of the orchestra, making his instrument a necessary complement of the whole.

It is not that Mr. Bauer ever lacked technique. The perfection of each separate note, the sureness of phrasing, the finely intelligent reading of the score which he made last night, are all proof that in a question of technique Mr. Bauer is with the masters. But he knows that the great thing is to make each separate item of feeling felt, just as it is necessary to give each note its place. His accents in the cantabile passages were made with artistic righteousness, and his fire in the rondo was gloriously stirring.

Doctor Muck's part in the concerto was not less fine. The modulation of orchestral tones which he accomplished, always thinking of the music and not of orchestra or soloist, was perfect. And when, on two occasions, he swung the orchestra into the stride of the piano, after a long cadenza, the effect was of such surpassing beauty that it was almost too much to bear.

The concerto came in the middle of the program, but it sent the Brahms symphony into far oblivion, and made it very hard to listen even to Beethoven's own "Egmont." It is now exactly four weeks since Doctor Muck led the "Eroica" symphony here, but the memory of its splendor has not died out. That memory made the intellectual melodies of Brahms seem almost pathetically unreal. Melodies there were, but they were not rich, not informed with gracious spirit, except for the allegretto.

And admitting that in its graciousness there is a touch of life, there remains the distinction that Brahms' dance is a ballet, an intellectual diversion, pretty to look at, but it does not draw the feet of the hearer into its swing. And to dance one should listen with the feet, not with the ear. When Beethoven wrote dances, they were human, like the fox-trot. Brahms' dance is a ballet.

It was this mental quality of the symphony which tinged the whole evening and removed it by an appreciable step from the former triumphs of the Boston Symphony. Of Doctor Muck's graceful, powerful leading there is no need to say again what is so well known—that it is one of the highest pleasures vouchsafed us. It has been said that the Boston Symphony is the finest single instrument given a man to play upon—and Doctor Muck is the happy man who deserves that honor. But the orchestra was not at its noblest last night, except in the concerto. Even the stressful "Egmnot" did not lift it to abnormal heights. And one has learned to expect the very highest from these players. That explains why their sustained and even glory was not so effective last night. They could do the mosaic of raindrops in the symphony, and the powerful emotion of the "Egmont," but they had no music which called for perfection of feeling as well as for perfection of art.

...Complete
...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

Far different from the melodies of Schubert and the harmonious motions of ancient Greece were the discordant modernisms presented on the same stage in the evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck chose to open his programme with the futuristic fourth symphony of Sibelius, which had already been given a half-hearted trial by one of the New York orchestras.

It is difficult to tell just what the Finnish composer is trying to express in this work. The first two movements are utterly incoherent, full of experiments and tentative suggestions of "motifs" and harmonies, but never arriving at any definite means of articulation.

The third and fourth movements, however, contain passages of real beauty, all the more impressive because of their deliberately ugly surroundings.

The symphony as a whole is bewildering, but compels a desire for further hearings. It may be assumed that the orchestra played it well, although a thousand mistakes might easily have been made without being detected Reznicek's "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," was given its first New York performance. This elaborate piece of programme music fairly eclipsed the symphony in the forcefulness of its melodic ideas, the dramatic power of its whole conception and the masterly skill of its instrumentation.

A novel device was the introduction of a short tenor solo near the close, bringing out in actual words the final episode in the story illustrated by the composition.

The programme ended with Schinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," a Teutonic cultivation of an old English melody. Altogether a pretty heavy meal to be taken at one sitting, Dr. Muck!

Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS THE ULTRA

Programme of Last Evening Opened With the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

A "SYMPHONIC BIOGRAPHY"

"Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Scheinpflug Closes Programme.

By STANLEY OLMSTED.

The second seasonal programme of the Boston Symphony offered at Carnegie Hall would no doubt strike many listeners as aptly timed with the promised exhibition of paintings by Matisse. Since men have made music at all there has always been perhaps a majority who has failed to find accord and sympathy with whatever in each era has been deemed ultra.

The listening majority of the now differs no whit from the listening majority who once found Beethoven an irritating enigma and musical Sphinx's riddle. Last night one heard much annihilating condemnation of Sibelius in the ten minutes' intermission following the rendition of his Symphony No. 4 in A minor.

The habitual Manhattan concert-goer had, of course, heard the symphony once before. He was inclined, therefore, to be more apathetic if in no respect more tolerant. When Mr. Damrosch escorted his New York orchestra through its maze of Finnish idiosyncrasies in the early part of 1913 he created a courteous attentiveness by an apology a priori. He requested, well-nigh implored, his audience, to strive their best to meet this symphony they were about to hear half way—as far as they could! One had to hear all sorts of things with a brave heart. Why not, therefore, Sibelius? He was so evidently sincere about it that the audience did its utmost to be nice.

No Longer Baffling.

At the hands of Dr. Muck and his virtuose musicians the contour and plan of the four movements became vastly clearer. There was the progress, you see, of a second hearing, coupled with every interpretive advantage. For one listener at least the work lost something of its first Kalevaler mysticism through the fact that it baffled him no longer. As heard last night it seemed nothing more nor less than a broadening and enlargement of that Swan song, sang throughont the concert halls of Europe, in the middle nineties, at the very outest of this Finnish composer's career. (Even in the timing of a Swan song, you perceive, there was an inversion.) It remains, however, a work of metaphysical sincerity with certain taut moments, closely defining something that may be that elusive fourth dimension. On the sense of the fourth dimension will it rely for fugitive responsiveness, until general public taste moves one peg further.

The second offering of the evening, "Schlemihl," characterized as a "Symphonic Biography" and composed by Emil Nipolaus von Reznicek, requires the composer's own analysis, printed in the Boston Symphony booklet, and impracticable here. It was played in New York for the first time. It will be best remembered after a single hearing by an episode of unusual, and even unique orchestral grandeur, just preceding the gliding closing chords wherein the programmatic hero sinks into Devachan.

Portrayed With Real Fervor.

The booklet calls it "sinking into Nirvana"—but Nirvana is reabsorption in the Supreme—not cessation through failure. The hero's mightiest effort, ere his relinquishment is here portrayed with a real fervor of exultation.

Closing this Boston Symphony concert there was played an "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare"—name of comedy undivulged, Sheinpflug, the composer, is familiar to many concertgoers through his "Fruehling ein Kampf und Lebenslied." The overture of last evening is like a blending of Cubism and the art of Maxfield Parrish.

The effect of the concert as an entirety was profound in one direction or the other, according to the conservatism or rebellious individualism of the listener.

Miss Beatrice, Gjertsen, an American who is Chamberlain-Singer and a member of the Grand Ducal Court Opera at Weimar, gave a vocal recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening, having been preceded in the same type of diversion by Miss Florence Austin, the violinist.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

pictures of the Harvard-Yale game showing Coolidge's 93 yard run for a touchdown were an added feature.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A program made up of three numbers, long favorites with local audiences, and a soloist who has already won a strong following among music-lovers here made the popular success of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy a foregone conclusion. Beethoven, in two of his most stirring moods, represented by the fourth concerto for piano and the Egmont overture, and Brahms in the most melodic of his symphonies, the second, in D major, were the offerings. In all of them Dr. Muck's thorough leadership over his men was again apparent, as it has been ever since he assumed control of the organization, and his musicianly and temperamental reading of the scores was characteristic of him at his best.

Harold Bauer, the soloist, has grown steadily in his art since his first appearances here. The Beethoven concerto demands both technic and sympathetic understanding of the highest order, and to say that Mr. Bauer gave an interpretation that was in all ways satisfactory sums up his ability with no conservative praise. Contrasted with an unusual strength and resonant power is a limpid pianissimo fitly comparable to the traditional purling of brooks, with a mastery of all of the moods between. There is nothing sensational in his playing; it is sincere and well considered and colored throughout with a studiousness that is scholarly, without being even remotely pedantic.

In both the overture and the symphony the orchestra again demonstrated that it possesses a tonal quality that cannot be matched by any other organization that appears here. This is largely due unquestionably to the fact that it is financially able to own instruments that are masterpieces of the makers' art and that are unrivalled by any other similar collection in this country, but instruments alone are not sufficient to achieve the results that have given the Boston musicians their standing. The thorough training, the many years through which they have been playing as a body and the careful selection of men of proved ability all go to produce the qualities that have won them such a large following here and elsewhere.

[73]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 - 1914

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Dr. Muck's Revenge.

Dr. Carl Muck is not in sympathy with the cubists and futurists in music. Why then did he dismay, bore, and ruffle his large audience in Carnegie Hall last night by inflicting on it nearly two hours of the dullest and most bizarre music of the cubist-futurist school? Judging by the remarks he made when he came back from Berlin a few weeks ago, one might fancy that he did this in order to get even with at least some of the Americans for siding with the Allies. It is more likely, however, that he has put this music on his programmes because he was sharply censured in Boston last season for not doing this very thing. If this is the explanation, he was justified in having his revenge by playing this sort of stuff in Boston; but why make New Yorkers suffer for the insistence and challenge of H. T. Parker and other Bostonians?

It is pretty safe to say that very few of those who heard the fourth symphony of Sibelius as rendered by Walter Damrosch on March 2, 1913, in Aeolian Hall, were anxious to hear it again. It was played last night in a much more polished manner, it is needless to say; but the music seemed as incoherent, empty, dull, and pointless as before. Here and there there were a few bars of striking harmony, or of lovely orchestral coloring usually reminiscent of Wagner; but as a whole this symphony did not deserve the honor of being performed by so splendid an orchestra as the Boston Symphony. There was little applause, and, during the ten-minute intermission following it, many of the most loyal subscribers were in open mutiny. More than a dozen of them expressed themselves to the present writer in emphatic language as to the deplorable waste of time. "I have only five opportunities every year to enjoy the Boston Orchestra," said one, "and I don't want to hear such stuff." "Dr. Muck," said another, "is not a good programme-maker, but this one is the limit." "He is abusing his privilege," said a third; and a fourth exclaimed: "He ought to let Stransky make his programmes."

The following number threw the audience from the fryingpan into the fire. The Sibelius symphony was, at any rate, the work of a composer who, by his earlier works, established his claims to originality; but the so-called "symphonic biography" called "Schlemihl," by Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek, which was presented as a novelty, proved to be, as the "programme" provided by its composer led one to anticipate, an imitation of the methods, tricks, and frills of Richard Strauss. What these methods, tricks, and frills are everybody knows. One of them is to soak the audience in vinegar or brine for ten minutes, and then, by contrast, enchant everybody by treating it to a few bars of sugar-water, which, under ordinary conditions, would seem insipid. Another is to suddenly introduce in the midst of the cacophony a few bars of a folksong. In this case it was "O du lieber Augustin." But the most ingenious of these tricks is, after straining the endurance of the audience to the limit, to build up at the end a stupendous, thrilling climax of sound, involving all the orchestral forces, which inevitably overwhelms the audience and makes it burst out into loud applause. That happened last night; and it was only fair that the orchestra should be made to rise for its superb performance of a work which, it is to be hoped, will not be again inflicted on a New York audience.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia
DEC

Bauer Plays With Symph

The program of the Boston Symp at the Academy last night was all piece. A fine air of high and seriou tention marked the work of condu orchestra and soloist. Doctor Muck ducted first the second symphony Brahms. Then Harold Bauer played, w the orchestra, the third concerto of Beethoven, and the program ended with the Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont." All of it was done with irreproachable excellence.

Mr. Bauer has trod the way of all great pianists and of the few great ones now living. Year by year he has diminished in virtuosity and grown greater in poetic eloquence, in true feeling, in making his technique an instrument and not an end. He was never an advertised prodigy; his reputation grew steadily as an artist and as an artist alone. That is perhaps the reason why the topmost gallery was not crowded last night. There is nothing superficial, nothing meretricious about Mr. Bauer's playing, nothing to attract any but the truest lovers of music.

Last night he played a difficult concerta, and one particularly ungrateful to the prodigy type of pianist. In the greater part of the first movement the piano is executing delicate embroideries about the smooth and shining cloth of the orchestra's weaving. In the combined andante and rondo the piano comes into its own, but even there Mr. Bauer kept it in the swing of the orchestra, making his instrument a necessary complement of the whole.

It is not that Mr. Bauer ever lacked technique. The perfection of each separate note, the sureness of phrasing, the finely intelligent reading of the score which he made last night, are all proof that in a question of technique Mr. Bauer is with the masters. But he knows that the great thing is to make each separate item of feeling felt, just as it is necessary to give each note its place. His accents in the cantabile passages were made with artistic righteousness, and his fire in the rondo was gloriously stirring.

Doctor Muck's part in the concerto was not less fine. The modulation of orchestral tones which he accomplished, always thinking of the music and not of orchestra or soloist, was perfect. And when, on two occasions, he swung the orchestra into the stride of the piano, after a long cadenza, the effect was of such surpassing beauty that it was almost too much to bear.

The concerto came in the middle of the program, but it sent the Brahms symphony into far oblivion, and made it very hard to listen even to Beethoven's own "Egmont." It is now exactly four weeks since Doctor Muck led the "Eroica" symphony here, but the memory of its splendor has not died out. That memory made the intellectual melodies of Brahms seem almost pathetically unreal. Melodies there were, but they were not rich, not informed with gracious spirit, except for the allegretto.

And admitting that in its graciousness there is a touch of life, there remains the distinction that Brahms' dance is a ballet, an intellectual diversion, pretty to look at, but it does not draw the feet of the hearer into its swing. And to dance one should listen with the feet, not with the ear. When Beethoven wrote dances, they were human, like the foxtrot. Brahms' dance is a ballet.

It was this mental quality of the symphony which tinged the whole evening and removed it by an appreciable step from the former triumphs of the Boston Symphony. Of Doctor Muck's graceful, powerful leading there is no need to say again what is so well known—that it is one of the highest pleasures vouchsafed us. It has been said that the Boston Symphony is the finest single instrument given a man to play upon—and Doctor Muck is the happy man who deserves that honor. But the orchestra was not at its noblest last night, except in the concerto. Even the stressful "Egmnot" did not lift it to abnormal heights. And one has learned to expect the very highest from these players. That explains why their sustained and even glory was not so effective last night. They could do the mosaic of raindrops in the symphony, and the powerful emotion of the "Egmont," but they had no music which called for perfection of feeling as well as for perfection of art.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Established: Lo

"Tristan" Sung at the Opera; Boston Band in New Music

The Boston Symphony audienc popularly credited with being Ne York's musical elect, went forth fror the orchestra's concert at Carnegi Hall last evening with a more or les frank bepuzzlement on its face and i its speech, and possibly some unbetokened inner questionings. The audience was not quite sure whether it or Dr. Karl Muck, who provided a programme of bristling challenge, was at fault.

The challenge was quite indubitably apparent, for Dr. Muck presented three works which the greater part of those who listened found to be terra incognita. One of these works had never before been heard in New York, another only once, in March, 1913, and the third also only once, at a performance of the Boston Orchestra during the conductorship of Max Fiedler. All, moreover, are compositions of the last few years and embody the most modern of modernism in structure and orchestration and general scheme.

The three compositions were the Fourth Symphony of Jan Sibelius, Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek's "Schlemihl, a Symphonic Biography," and Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare."

If Dr. Muck strove for the element of contrast in this programme, he builded perhaps better than he knew, for the line was so sharply drawn between the Sibelius symphony and the Reznicek "biography" as to become a demarcation that put an end to interest in the latter. After five minutes of Reznicek, one cursed the whole tribe of programmatists in music, from the good but irritating Abbe Liszt down to the newest worker in this vineyard of chaff.

But Sibelius is far from this clan of blatant dabblers in puerile futilities. He is a composer of music and not a mere illustrator of a literary fabric whose texture would be beneath the contempt of a tenth-rate pseudo-philosophic literarian.

Sibelius has an imagination that finds its expression in music alone, in distinctively individual, intensely subjective music. He has absorbed the many inventions of the Frenchmen of the day, but he gives them forth according to his own purposes. The complexities of his utterance are hidden within the structure of this music, whilst the speech itself is admirably simple, eloquently simple.

This is music that finds its roots entwined among the principles that dominated the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. But its message to a modern audience is a voice from life itself, the life of the period, the sanely materialistic, aristocratically spiritual philosophy of the few. It is the gospel of futility in all save the single human manifestation of beauty.

Dr. Muck played the Sibelius symphony with much clarifying attention to detail, with a penetrative account of its rhythmic necessities and enlightening variety of tempo and dynamics, but there might have been more vigor, more emphasis upon its expression of brooding hopelessness. The orchestra played it with conviction. Of particular beauty were the many passages amounting almost to solo features as played by the several first instruments.

Complete
paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date DEC 4 - 1914

Boston Symphony Concert.

Far different from the melodies of Schubert and the harmonious motions of ancient Greece were the discordant modernisms presented on the same stage in the evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck chose to open his programme with the futuristic fourth symphony of Sibelius, which had already been given a half-hearted trial by one of the New York orchestras.

It is difficult to tell just what the Finnish composer is trying to express in this work. The first two movements are utterly incoherent, full of experiments and tentative suggestions of "motifs" and harmonies, but never arriving at any definite means of articulation.

The third and fourth movements, however, contain passages of real beauty, all the more impressive because of their deliberately ugly surroundings.

The symphony as a whole is bewildering, but compels a desire for further hearings. It may be assumed that the orchestra played it well, although a thousand mistakes might easily have been made without being detected.

Reznicek's "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl," was given its first New York performance. This elaborate piece of programme music fairly eclipsed the symphony in the forcefulness of its melodic ideas, the dramatic power of its whole conception and the masterly skill of its instrumentation.

A novel device was the introduction of a short tenor solo near the close, bringing out in actual words the final episode in the story illustrated by the composition.

The programme ended with Schinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," a Teutonic cultivation of an old English melody. Altogether a pretty heavy meal to be taken at one sitting, Dr. Muck!

rk, 1884

From MORNING TELEGR
Address: New York City
Date DEC 4 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS THE ULTRA

Programme of Last Evening Opened With the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

A "SYMPHONIC BIOGRAPHY"

"Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Scheinpflug Closes Programme.

By STANLEY OLMSTED.

The second seasonal programme of the Boston Symphony offered at Carnegie Hall would no doubt strike many listeners as aptly timed with the promised exhibition of paintings by Matisse. Since men have made music at all there has always been perhaps a majority who has failed to find accord and sympathy with whatever in each era has been deemed ultra.

The listening majority of the now differs no whit from the listening majority who once found Beethoven an irritating enigma and musical Sphinx's riddle. Last night one heard annihilating condemnation of Sibelius in the ten minutes' intermission following the rendition of his Symphony No. 4 in A minor.

The habitual Manhattan concert-goer had, of course, heard the symphony once before. He was inclined, therefore, to be more apathetic if in no respect more tolerant. When Mr. Damrosch escorted his New York orchestra through its maze of Finnish idiosyncrasies in the early part of 1913 he created a courteous attentiveness by an apology a priori. He requested, well-nigh implored, his audience, to strive their best to meet this symphony they were about to hear half way—as far as they could! One had to hear all sorts of things with a brave heart. Why not, therefore, Sibelius? He was so evidently sincere about it that the audience did its utmost to be nice.

No Longer Baffling.

At the hands of Dr. Muck and his virtuose musicians the contour and plan of the four movements became vastly clearer. There was the progress, you see, of a second hearing, coupled with every interpretive advantage. For one listener at least the work lost something of its first Kalevaler mysticism through the fact that it baffled him no longer. As heard last night it seemed nothing more nor less than a broadening and enlargement of that Swan song, sang throughont the concert halls of Europe, in the middle nineties, at the very outest of this Finnish composer's career. (Even in the timing of a Swan song, you perceive, there was an inversion.) It remains, however, a work of metaphysical sincerity with certain taut moments, closely defining something that may be that elusive fourth dimension. On the sense of the fourth dimension will it rely for fugitive responsiveness, until general public taste moves one peg further.

The second offering of the evening, "Schlemihl," characterized as a "Symphonic Biography" and composed by Emil Nipolaus von Reznicek, requires the composer's own analysis, printed in the Boston Symphony booklet, and impracticable here. It was played in New York for the first time. It will be best remembered after a single hearing by an episode of unusual, and even unique orchestral grandeur, just preceding the gliding closing chords wherein the programmatic hero sinks into Devachan.

Portrayed With Real Fervor.

The booklet calls it "sinking into Nirvana"—but Nirvana is reabsorption in the Supreme—not cessation through failure. The hero's mightiest effort, ere his relinquishment is here portrayed with a real fervor of exultation.

Closing this Boston Symphony concert there was played an "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare"—name of comedy undivulged, Sheinpflug, the composer, is familiar to many concertgoers through his "Fruehling ein Kampf und Lebenslied." The overture of last evening is like a blending of Cubism and the art of Maxfield Parrish.

The effect of the concert as an entirety was profound in one direction or the other, according to the conservatism or rebellious individualism of the listener.

Miss Beatrice, Gjertsen, an American who is Chamberlain-Singer and a member of the Grand Ducal Court Opera at Weimar, gave a vocal recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening, having been preceded in the same type of diversion by Miss Florence Austin, the violinist, in the afternoon.

, 1884

Philadelphia
DEC 1914

s of the Harvard-Yale game showoolidge's 9 yard run for a touch-were an added feature.

Boston Symphony Concert.

program made up of three numbers, favorites with local audiences, and soloist who has already won a strong lowing among music-lovers here made ne popular success of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy a foregone conclusion. Beethoven, in two of his most stirring moods, represented by the fourth concerto for piano and the Egmont overture, and Brahms in the most melodic of his symphonies, the second, in D major, were the offerings. In all of them Dr. Muck's thorough leadership over his men was again apparent, as it has been ever since he assumed control of the organization, and his musicianly and temperamental reading of the scores was characteristic of him at his best.

Harold Bauer, the soloist, has grown steadily in his art since his first appearances here. The Beethoven concerto demands both technic and sympathetic understanding of the highest order, and to say that Mr, Bauer gave an interpretation that was in all ways satisfactory sums up his ability with no conservative praise. Contrasted with an unusual strength and resonant power is a limpid pianissimo fitly comparable to the traditional purling of brooks, with a mastery of all of the moods between. There is nothing sensational in his playing; it is sincere and well considered and colored throughout with a studiousness that is scholarly, without being even remotely pedantic.

In both the overture and the symphony the orchestra again demonstrated that it possesses a tonal quality that cannot be matched by any other organization that appears here. This is largely due unquestionably to the fact that it is financially able to own instruments that are masterpieces of the makers' art and that are unrivalled by any other similar collection in this country, but instruments alone are not sufficient to achieve the results that have given the Boston musicians their standing. The thorough training, the many years through which they have been playing as a body and the careful selection of men of proved ability all go to produce the qualities that have won them such a large following here and elsewhere.

884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 1 - 1914

Es 1884

Boston Symphony

Harold Bauer Piano Soloist at Second Concert of Season

WITH Harold Bauer as the piano soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program of three numbers on which Brahms and Beethoven were the only composers represented. The symphony, which opened the program, was the No. 2, in D major, of Brahms, already played here this season by the Philadelphia Orchestra, at its opening concerts on October 16 and 17. It is most necessary to draw a comparison between the two interpretations. Both are notable. That given last evening under Dr. Karl Muck's direction was a high plane of orchestral excellence, not only in the skill employed in its unfolding, but as a great composition radiated by a truly musical elucidation.

The conducting of Dr. Muck at times seem almost phlegmatic in its repose and unpretentiousness. Always it has meaning and deep significance, however, devoid of emotion as it may appear to be, and the results attained speak for themselves. One feels that he has accomplished all that he deems necessary in rehearsal, and that so sure is he of what his musicians will do, and the unfaltering competency with which they will do it, that no stressful exhibition of leadership is required.

The second symphony of Brahms is essentially melodious, with so much of simplicity and poetic charm that it has not inappropriately been called "Pastoral," though with no assurance that the composer had any such appellation in mind. It has not the epic grandeur of the profoundly significant first, but to the average listener its appeal probably is even more direct, and last night's audience was visibly impressed by its buoyant beauty. If there were especial heights in the interpretation, the lovely adagio, with its deep-toned introduction by the soulful 'cellos, and the joyful abandon of the graceful scherzo, like sunshine after shadows, might be mentioned, although the virtuoso quality of the orchestra, in its unity of tone like one great instrument, was demonstrated throughout.

Mr. Bauer's piano playing is of the sort that impresses by its ease while it charms by its fluency and beauty. He was heard last evening in Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, and while the composition is not titanic in power, it is alluring in its melodiousness, and one need not ask to hear it more sympathetically played. Bauer is wholesome as well as artistic, with his big round face and mass of curly hair, and there is nothing of the freak about him either in his personality or his playing.

Technically he is supreme and temperamentally both poetic and impressive. Flawless execution and purity of tone mark his bravura passages, an evidence of his true musicianship being the fact that, even in fortissimo measures, he does not wear through the velvet that seems to cover the strings when he plays. Big effects he may get, but beauty of tone never vanishes, and the most sensitive ear never suffers. His success last night was pronounced and fully deserved.

Sustaining the spirit of melody that was the keynote of the performance, was the concluding number, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which, however has enough of the dramatic to present a fitting climax. The third concert of the Boston Orchestra's series of five will be given on Monday evening, January 3, when Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, is to be the soloist.

Evening

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns tonight for its second concert at the Academy of Music. This is the 30th season of the Boston organization in Philadelphia, and it is late in the day for any new thing to be said of them. The assisting artist will be Harold Bauer, who is modestly called an "admirable pianist" by the press agent. This is quite in keeping with Mr. Bauer's genius, which is quiet and restrained and poetically fine. There has never been a bit of sensation connected with Mr. Bauer's name, and the repute he now enjoys is a tribute to merit alone. Mr. Bauer will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven, a work which will be heard again, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, when Harold Randolph will play it. Dr. Muck begins his program with Brahm's second symphony, and ends it with the Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Conductorship at Its Best. Bauer's Pianism.

The beautifully-balanced program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, last night, commanded the admiration of the large audience. Brahms' D Major Symphony, Beethoven's piano concerto in G Major and the Beethoven Overture "Egmont," formed a perfect arrangement for the practical musician, and must have been equally interesting to the musical amateur. Brahms' D Major Symphony belongs to the great works of this character and is unfailing in its appeal, both melodically and in a constructive sense. Dr. Muck's conducting of this symphony, while along traditional lines, is sufficiently original to keep attention constantly alert. In listening to the performance as it shows Muck's master value of every [illegible] its relative place in the building of the whole, one is bound to feel that Muck's knowledge of Bach must be great, for from Bach only can be learned the sort of musicianship possessed by this extraordinary leader.

E 1884

When Harold Bauer plays all other pianists appear stilted and almost meaningless. His interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto in G Major is a classic. Unquestionably, it loses much of its Teutonic character, but when the concerto is made to shine and scintillate in its more delicate and fanciful garb, one can only be grateful for the absence of the thunderous style usually accorded a Beethoven concerto. Bauer is a really great pianist and so thoroughly original in everything he does that he can almost be said to have created a new school of piano playing. His manners are as ingenious as those of a child and just as captivating. If he could only be induced to play one of his wonderful recitals in Philadelphia the musical season would take on new importance. The program concluded with a noble reading of the Egmont Overture.

Pianist Heard in Recital

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1 - 1914

Es

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Brahms' Second Symphony Feature of Its Last Evening's Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second in its current series of local concerts under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck at the Academy of Music last evening when Brahms' beautiful second symphony was the principal feature of the program. One could have wished that some other choice had been made for the second was played by Mr. Stokowski at the opening performance of the present season. It is difficult to account in any satisfactory way for the frequency of these duplications. It will be remembered that when the Boston organization was here a month ago it played the Eroica symphony of Beethoven which had been given only a few days before by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, and no year passes without one or more similar repetitions. Are they merely fortuitous coincidences? Such is the only explanation of them which those who are in a position to speak with authority will ever vouchsafe and it must be said that this explanation is not convincing. What seems more likely is that one conductor wishes to show how much more impressively he can interpret such and such a composition than some other.

However, the second symphony of Brahms is such a lovely work that it is, perhaps, ungracious to quarrel with the circumstances under which it was heard last night, especially in view of the very admirable manner in which it was played under Dr. Muck's inspiring baton. It was an exquisite performance in the beauty of its tone, the refinement of its finish, the clearness of its analysis and the eloquence of its expression, and the enjoyment which it afforded the large and intelligently appreciative audience which was privileged to hear it was unbounded. All the intricacies of a complicated score were unerringly unraveled and it is easy to believe that every effect which the composer had in mind was entirely realized. After the symphony came Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major, played with masterly ability and a perfect comprehension of its contents by Mr. Harold Bauer, a modest, unassuming artist who without any adventitious aid, by merit alone, has won recognition as one of the great pianists of the day, and a splendid reading of the Egmont overture closed the proceedings.

CITY WINS AWARD

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE GERMAN PROGRAM

Ultra-Classical Works of Brahms and Beethoven Mark Second Concert

HAROLD BAUER AT PIANO

Continually Enchanting Timbre of String Choir, Unattainable by Others, a Feature

GERMAN music of ultra-classical type was played at the Boston Orchestra's second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. Brahms, with his fine D major symphony, Beethoven, with his dramatic "Egmont" overture and suave yet masterful G major and orchestra—this was the "Germany-over-all" program, with the always efficient and thoroughly capable Harold Bauer—half German, half English—to convey to entranced ears the witchery of Beethoven's most melodious and divinely poetic concerto.

There was little to note in the instrumental rendering of Brahm's highly academic composition, aside from the continually enchanting timbre of the string choir—a quality unattainable by other orchestras not so profusely equipped with costly instruments. "It's the fiddle that does it," as Ysaye remarked when asked to explain his grandiose tonality.

Herr Direktor Muck always has his orchestral force well in hand and under precise control when a Brahms symphony is in question. Brahms' works are peculiarly for musicians—all save this second symphony, which might have been writen by Beethoven himself. It was performed with artistic sympathy, reverent care and entire respect for the composer's theories of interpretation, as also was Beethoven's stormy interpretation in music of Goethe's passionate poem.

There is no living pianist to whom Harold Bauer need yield precedence; and, moreover, his lofty position in his own sphere of interpretative art is due to no arts of puffery under shrewd management, nor to individual eccentricities sedulously exploited. As Bauer played this most melodious of concertos—one of the few in which the hammered strings are never tortured—so might the great composer have played it in Vienna more than a century ago.

The second movement—a thing of beauty that is a joy forever alike to layman and professional—was played with a refinement of artistic feeling and a fluency of effortless technique seldom heard and seen in these days of concert-hall empiricisms. Mr. Bauer is of that rarest class of pianists—a genuine artist, down to the very fingertips.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

E 1884

HAROLD BAUER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven Concerto and Overture Introduced by Brahms' Second Symphony

The name of Harold Bauer stands for the best—and only the best—in musical literature, and the fourth piano concerto of Beethoven he chose to play with Boston Symphony, to the delight of the crowded Academy last evening, is one that some players do not care for, since it so pitilessly takes the measure of the performer. There is nothing of the self-advertiser about last evening's soloist. He took his place at the piano as unaffectedly as he would in his own music room, and addressed himself to his task in sincere and sober fashion, wholly free from meretricious artifice.

Mr. Bauer does not distort nor exaggerate. He never projected violent dynamics outside the frame of the tonal picture. He played into, as well as with, the orchestra; he shared their sense of rhythm and maintained their pace.

One of the striking features was the perfect clearness, not merely of themes and phrases, but of every note. However rapid, nothing was flurried, nothing failed in crystalline articulation, and each finger seemed to have the independent strength and flexibility of the whole wrist.

When one hand was playing the even balance of power was maintained as though both were on the keyboard. The digital technique was supplemented by a rarely skilful and intelligent use of the pedals.

For the less versatile piano of his own era, Beethoven indicated that in the Andante movement the soft pedal should be used all the time; Mr. Bauer knew exactly how to construe this injunction, and in large measure the singing tones that lingered after the percussion came from the adroitness with which the pedals were controlled. The Rondo, at a dizzy pace, rippled and overflowed with the joy of living, and throughout one's admiration was divided between the technique and the true, fine sentiment that at all points informed the playing. The cadenza fitted the context, and still had its own melodiously resolute, creative individuality. The entrance of the orchestra upon the protracted closing trill of the cadenza was a miracle of deftness. There were many recalls.

The Second symphony of Brahms has won its place in high favor with discerning modern audiences. It seems strange that it was ever received with disaproval. Mr. Howe tells us, in his recently published history of this orchestra, that during the first performance of the Third Brahms symphony in erudite Boston, "the audience left the hall in hundreds." How fresh and vital, how buoyantly lyrical in quality this Second symphony seemed last night, with the exquisite stopped horns of the first movement, the blended 'cellos of the Adagio, the playful woodwind of the Allegretto, and the spirited finale! After a recall, Mr. Muck placed both hands on Concermeister Witek's shoulders and the men stood in their places.

The concert ended with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." If it is not among the heart-reaching, soul-searching products of the master's hand, it made, at any rate, an energetic and picturesque coda for the program. Kreisler plays at the next concert on Jan

[74]

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 1 - 1914

Es 1884

SECOND CONCERT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Presents Fine Program, with Harold Bauer Soloist.

PROGRAM.

Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73
Beethoven—Concerto in G Major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58
Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist....................Harold Bauer

The Boston Symphony gave their second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, with Harold Bauer as the soloist. There was a carefully arranged program which conformed well, the Orchestra playing Brahms' luscious Symphony No. 2, while the pianist the brilliant Beethoven Concerto in G. Major, the concluding number being Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

The Brahms No. 2 is in many respects the finest of the great efforts of the German composer. It is distinctly in his style, yet it has a general appeal to others than the confirmed Brahmsites. It is easily understandable and makes a strong appeal in its every note. It is hard to pick out which of the four movements present the most luscious melody, for its one succession of brilliant orchestra passages from beginning to end.

Orchestra's Fine Response.

Dr. Muck was in exceptionally good form last evening, and his Orchestra responded admirably. There was perfection in every note, and nothing finer in the way of concerted playing could be desired. The Allegretto movement, one of the fullest and best things of the composer's symphonies, was read with especial care to make its various themes emphatic, and the fine exhibition of brass in this movement leaves a lasting impression of the horn choir of the Orchestra.

Mr. Bauer could have chosen nothing better than the Concerto in G to show his finished art, and his playing was at all times masterly, but especially so in the long scale passages of the andante movement, and strikingly pleasing was the way he emphasized the staccato theme of this movement. He has an easy and graceful way of playing which adds much to the fine effects produced, and his work was very much appreciated and applauded.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony will be given on Monday evening, January 4, when Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 29 1914

Establis

BAUER WILL PLAY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Early Work of Richard Strauss to Be Principal Item on the Program.

Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, on Tuesday, December 1, at the National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock.

An early work by Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the program of this second concert. This is his Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," and in this work Strauss gave the first real evidence of what afterward was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. Certainly for the modern hearer there is nothing particularly uncommon or difficult in this work. As a matter of fact, it is very melodious, and, according to modern standards, very simple.

His Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," is in four parts, the titles of which are, in the order in which they come: "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento," and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." In this work he records musically the deep impressions he received in 1886 when he made his first visit to Italy. It was while he was in Italy that he sketched out the Fantasia, and it had its first performance at a subscription concert in the Odeon, Munich, March 2, 1887.

At the performance of Tuesday Bauer will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

…ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Boston Symphony

Harold Bauer Piano Soloist at Second Concert of Season

WITH Harold Bauer as the piano soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program of three numbers on which Brahms and Beethoven were the only composers represented. The symphony, which opened the program, was the No. 2, in D major, of Brahms, already played here this season by the Philadelphia Orchestra, at its opening concerts on October 16 and 17. It is most necessary to draw a comparison between the two interpretations. Both are notable. That given last evening under Dr. Karl Muck's direction was a high plane of orchestral excellence, not only in the skill employed in its unfolding, but as a great composition radiated by a truly musical elucidation.

The conducting of Dr. Muck at times seem almost phlegmatic in its repose and unpretentiousness. Always it has meaning and deep significance, however, devoid of emotion as it may appear to be, and the results attained speak for themselves. One feels that he has accomplished all that he deems necessary in rehearsal, and that so sure is he of what his musicians will do, and the unfaltering competency with which they will do it, that no stressful exhibition of leadership is required.

The second symphony of Brahms is essentially melodious, with so much of simplicity and poetic charm that it has not inappropriately been called "Pastoral," though with no assurance that the composer had any such appellation in mind. It has not the epic grandeur of the profoundly significant first, but to the average listener its appeal probably is even more direct, and last night's audience was visibly impressed by its buoyant beauty. If there were especial heights in the interpretation, the lovely adagio, with its deep-toned introduction by the soulful 'cellos, and the joyful abandon of the graceful scherzo, like sunshine after shadows, might be mentioned, although the virtuoso quality of the orchestra, in its unity of tone like one great instrument, was demonstrated throughout.

Mr. Bauer's piano playing is of the sort that impresses by its ease while it charms by its fluency and beauty. He was heard last evening in Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, and while the composition is not titanic in power, it is alluring in its melodiousness, and one need not ask to hear it more sympathetically played. Bauer is wholesome as well as artistic, with his big round face and mass of curly hair, and there is nothing of the freak about him either in his personality or his playing.

Technically he is supreme and temperamentally both poetic and impressive. Flawless execution and purity of tone mark his bravura passages, an evidence of his true musicianship being the fact that, even in fortissimo measures, he does not wear through the velvet that seems to cover the strings when he plays. Big effects he may get, but beauty of tone never vanishes, and the most sensitive ear never suffers. His success last night was pronounced and fully deserved.

Sustaining the spirit of melody that was the keynote of the performance, was the concluding number, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which, however has enough of the dramatic to present a fitting climax. The third concert of the Boston Orchestra's series of five will be given on Monday evening, January 3, when Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, is to be the soloist.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns tonight for its second concert at the Academy of Music. This is the 30th season of the Boston organization in Philadelphia, and it is late in the day for any new thing to be said of them. The assisting artist will be Harold Bauer, who is modestly called an "admirable pianist" by the press agent. This is quite in keeping with Mr. Bauer's genius, which is quiet and restrained and poetically fine. There has never been a bit of sensation connected with Mr. Bauer's name, and the repute he now enjoys is a tribute to merit alone. Mr. Bauer will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven, a work which will be heard again, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, when Harold Randolph will play it. Dr. Muck begins his program with Brahm's second symphony, and ends it with the Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Es 1884

TIPPE[illegible] STILL FARTHER

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Conductorship at Its Best. Bauer's Pianism.

The beautifully-balanced program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, last night, commanded the admiration of the large audience. Brahms' D Major Symphony, Beethoven's piano concerto in G Major and the Beethoven Overture "Egmont," formed a perfect arrangement for the practical musician, and must have been equally interesting to the musical amateur. Brahms' D Major Symphony belongs to the great works of this character and is unfailing in its appeal, both melodically and in a constructive sense. Dr. Muck's conducting of this symphony, while along traditional lines, is sufficiently original to keep attention constantly alert. In listening to the performance as it shows Muck's mast…

…value of every theme and its relative place in the building of the whole, one is bound to feel that Muck's knowledge of Bach must be great, for from Bach only can be learned the sort of musicianship possessed by this extraordinary leader.

When Harold Bauer plays all other pianists appear stilted and almost meaningless. His interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto in G Major is a classic. Unquestionably, it loses much of its Teutonic character, but when the concerto is made to shine and scintillate in its more delicate and fanciful garb, one can only be grateful for the absence of the thunderous style usually accorded a Beethoven concerto. Bauer is a really great pianist and so thoroughly original in everything he does that he can almost be said to have created a new school of piano playing. His manners are as ingenious as those of a child and just as captivating. If he could only be induced to play one of his wonderful recitals in Philadelphia the musical season would take on new importance. The program concluded with a noble reading of the Egmont Overture.

Pianist Heard in Recital

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

they ask.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Brahms' Second Symphony Feature of Its Last Evening's Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second in its current series of local concerts under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck at the Academy of Music last evening when Brahms' beautiful second symphony was the principal feature of the program. One could have wished that some other choice had been made for the second was played by Mr. Stokowski at the opening performance of the present season. It is difficult to account in any satisfactory way for the frequency of these duplications. It will be remembered that when the Boston organization was here a month ago it played the Eroica symphony of Beethoven which had been given only a few days before by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, and no year passes without one or more similar repetitions. Are they merely fortuitous coincidences? Such is the only explanation of them which those who are in a position to speak with authority will ever vouchsafe and it must be said that this explanation is not convincing. What seems more likely is that one conductor wishes to show how much more impressively he can interpret such and such a composition than some other.

However, the second symphony of Brahms is such a lovely work that it is, perhaps, ungracious to quarrel with the circumstances under which it was heard last night, especially in view of the very admirable manner in which it was played under Dr. Muck's inspiring baton. It was an exquisite performance in the beauty of its tone, the refinement of its finish, the clearness of its analysis and the eloquence of its expression, and the enjoyment which it afforded the large and intelligently appreciative audience which was privileged to hear it was unbounded. All the intricacies of a complicated score were unerringly unraveled and it is easy to believe that every effect which the composer had in mind was entirely realized. After the symphony came Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major, played with masterly ability and a perfect comprehension of its contents by Mr. Harold Bauer, a modest, unassuming artist who without any adventitious aid, by merit alone, has won recognition as one of the great pianists of the day, and a splendid reading of the Egmont overture closed the proceedings.

CITY WINS AWARD

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE GERMAN PROGRAM

Ultra-Classical Works of Brahms and Beethoven Mark Second Concert

HAROLD BAUER AT PIANO

Continually Enchanting Timbre of String Choir, Unattainable by Others, a Feature

GERMAN music of ultra-classical type was played at the Boston Orchestra's second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. Brahms, with his fine D major symphony, Beethoven, with his dramatic "Egmont" overture and suave yet masterful G major and orchestra—this was the "Germany-over-all" program, with the always efficient and thoroughly capable Harold Bauer—half German, half English—to convey to entranced ears the witchery of Beethoven's most melodious and divinely poetic concerto.

There was little to note in the instrumental rendering of Brahm's highly academic composition, aside from the continually enchanting timbre of the string choir—a quality unattainable by other orchestras not so profusely equipped with costly instruments. "It's the fiddle that does it," as Ysaye remarked when asked to explain his grandiose tonality.

Herr Direktor Muck always has his orchestral force well in hand and under precise control when a Brahms symphony is in question. Brahms' works are peculiarly for musicians—all save this second symphony, which might have been writen by Beethoven himself. It was performed with artistic sympathy, reverent care and entire respect for the composer's theories of interpretation, as also was Beethoven's stormy interpretation in music of Goethe's passionate poem.

There is no living pianist to whom Harold Bauer need yield precedence; and, moreover, his lofty position in his own sphere of interpretative art is due to no arts of puffery under shrewd management, nor to individual eccentricities sedulously exploited. As Bauer played this most melodious of concertos—one of the few in which the hammered strings are never tortured—so might the great composer have played it in Vienna more than a century ago.

The second movement—a thing of beauty that is a joy forever alike to layman and professional—was played with a refinement of artistic feeling and a fluency of effortless technique seldom heard and seen in these days of concert-hall empiricisms. Mr. Bauer is of that rarest class of pianists—a genuine artist, down to the very fingertips.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia

Date

HAROLD BAUER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven Concerto and Overture Introduced by Brahms' Second Symphony

E 1884

The name of Harold Bauer stands for the best—and only the best—in musical literature, and the fourth piano concerto of Beethoven he chose to play with Boston Symphony, to the delight of the crowded Academy last evening, is one that some players do not care for, since it so pitilessly takes the measure of the performer. There is nothing of the self-advertiser about last evening's soloist. He took his place at the piano as unaffectedly as he would in his own music room, and addressed himself to his task in sincere and sober fashion, wholly free from meretricious artifice.

Mr. Bauer does not distort nor exaggerate. He never projected violent dynamics outside the frame of the tonal picture. He played into, as well as with, the orchestra; he shared their sense of rhythm and maintained their pace.

One of the striking features was the perfect clearness, not merely of themes and phrases, but of every note. However rapid, nothing was flurried, nothing failed in crystalline articulation, and each finger seemed to have the independent strength and flexibility of the whole wrist.

When one hand was playing the even balance of power was maintained as though both were on the keyboard. The digital technique was supplemented by a rarely skilful and intelligent use of the pedals.

For the less versatile piano of his own era, Beethoven indicated that in the Andante movement the soft pedal should be used all the time; Mr. Bauer knew exactly how to construe this injunction, and in large measure the singing tones that lingered after the percussion came from the adroitness with which the pedals were controlled. The Rondo, at a dizzy pace, rippled and overflowed with the joy of living, and throughout one's admiration was divided between the technique and the true, fine sentiment that at all points informed the playing. The cadenza fitted the context, and still had its own melodiously resolute, creative individuality. The entrance of the orchestra upon the protracted closing trill of the cadenza was a miracle of deftness. There were many recalls.

The Second symphony of Brahms has won its place in high favor with discerning modern audiences. It seems strange that it was ever received with disaproval. Mr. Howe tells us, in his recently published history of this orchestra, that during the first performance of the Third Brahms symphony in erudite Boston, "the audience left the hall in hundreds." How fresh and vital, how buoyantly lyrical in quality this Second symphony seemed last night, with the exquisite stopped horns of the first movement, the blended 'cellos of the Adagio, the playful woodwind of the Allegretto, and the spirited finale! After a recall, Mr. Muck placed both hands on Concermeister Witek's shoulders and the men stood in their places.

The concert ended with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." If it is not among the heart-reaching, soul-searching products of the master's hand, it made, at any rate, an energetic and picturesque coda for the program. Kreisler plays at the [illegible] on Jan.

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

SECOND CONCERT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Presents Fine Program, with Harold Bauer Soloist.

Es 1884

PROGRAM.

Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73
Beethoven—Concerto in G Major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58
Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist......................Harold Bauer

The Boston Symphony gave their second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, with Harold Bauer as the soloist. There was a carefully arranged program which conformed well, the Orchestra playing Brahms' luscious Symphony No. 2, while the pianist the brilliant Beethoven Concerto in G. Major, the concluding number being Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

The Brahms No. 2 is in many respects the finest of the great efforts of the German composer. It is distinctly in his style, yet it has a general appeal to others than the confirmed Brahmsites. It is easily understandable and makes a strong appeal in its every note. It is hard to pick out which of the four movements present the most luscious melody, for its one succession of brilliant orchestra passages from beginning to end.

Orchestra's Fine Response.

Dr. Muck was in exceptionally good form last evening, and his Orchestra responded admirably. There was perfection in every note, and nothing finer in the way of concerted playing could be desired. The Allegretto movement, one of the fullest and best things of the composer's symphonies, was read with especial care to make its various themes emphatic, and the fine exhibition of brass in this movement leaves a lasting impression of the horn choir of the Orchestra.

Mr. Bauer could have chosen nothing better than the Concerto in G to show his finished art, and his playing was at all times masterly, but especially so in the long scale passages of the andante movement, and strikingly pleasing was the way he emphasized the staccato theme of this movement. He has an easy and graceful way of playing which adds much to the fine effects produced, and his work was very much appreciated and applauded.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony will be given on Monday evening, January 4, when Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

◆

…Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BAUER WILL PLAY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Early Work of Richard Strauss to Be Principal Item on the Program.

Establisl

Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, on Tuesday, December 1, at the National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock.

An early work by Richard Strauss will be the principal item in the program of this second concert. This is his Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," and in this work Strauss gave the first real evidence of what afterward was to become his wide departure from the musical conventions and traditions of the past. Certainly for the modern hearer there is nothing particularly uncommon or difficult in this work. As a matter of fact, it is very melodious, and, according to modern standards, very simple.

His Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," is in four parts, the titles of which are, in the order in which they come: "On the Campagna," "Amid Rome's Ruins," "On the Shore of Sorrento," and "Neapolitan Folk-Life." In this work he records musically the deep impressions he received in 1886 when he made his first visit to Italy. It was while he was in Italy that he sketched out the Fantasia, and it had its first performance at a subscription concert in the Odeon, Munich, March 2 1887.

At the performance of Tuesday Bauer will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven in G major. The final number will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 1914

BAUER AND MUCK TRIUMPH.

Soloist and Orchestra Leader Deeply Sympathetic in Concert Here.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under Dr. Karl Muck, was all in the spirit of joy and sunshine, and the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G major by the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, brought together a combination of artists who seem sympathetic in every degree, for the finish and detail that make up the superb art of Harold Bauer also govern the work of Dr. Muck in his handling of this splendid orchestra.

The symphonic fantasia "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, was doubly interesting, for it was played with the greatest beauty, and it also showed the impressionistic mind of the composer, so different in this is he from the Strauss of today, who paints tone pictures in such lurid colors. It is an early work, and seems the faithful impress of a holiday in that land of blue sky, soft breezes, and lovely nature, sunny Italy. He paints placid nature in "On the Campagna," with a lyric beauty and melodiousness that he must have felt deeply, it is so pastoral, and open and serene. One wonders how how he felt "Amid Rome's Ruins," for it has a festive spirit and a touch of martial joy. With an interlude, where pipers pipe, and the strings and winds of the orchestra played with rare beauty, he resolves it into a joyous triumph. "On the Shore of Sorrento," is all nature music, which, in its purity and melodiousness makes one understand why Italy is the land of song; while the festival of the finale completed the picture by revealing a town "en fete."

Such a concerto as the Beethoven, No. 4, seems to show just what an artist can do. It reveals every nuance in its reiterated phrases, and every variety of shading and tone. It enables one to see into the art as it stands, and Harold Bauer was master in his giving of every beautiful detail. His pearly tone and clarity were woven throughout the figures of the allegro, and his commanding passages were big art work, contrasting tellingly with the exquisite feeling and beauty of his melodies. The rugged introduction of the andante by the orchestra led into some solo passages of the piano of deep feeling and mellow tone, and the closing piano phrase to a kind of funeral march of the orchestra was most impressive. Throughout the rondo the piano showed great virtuosity, but the figures were full of meaning, and the vital accents, and the lyric quality of the cadenza interwove great art with sheer music beauty.

The program closed with the Beethoven "Egmont" overture given with the same skill and fineness that characterized the entire concert.

J. MACB.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS "AUS ITALIEN"

Washington Admirers Hear Novel Strauss Composition at New National Theater.

Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater afforded Washington admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an opportunity of hearing Richard Strauss' first excursion into realism. This was Strauss' Symphony Fantastique, "Aus Italien," a musically pictorial record of some of the composer's impressions on a visit to Italy.

This initial expedition of Strauss into the realm of the concrete was made while he was a young man—about twenty—and it is exceedingly interesting to note how quickly and surely his genius "found itself" in this new field of musical expression.

The third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," makes vivid through, both harmonic and rhythmic means, the motion of the sea and a wonderful transparency. The device of widely-separated moving intervals of tone, makes vivid a remarkable impression of depth. The chaotic crossing and recrossing of fragmentary themes in the movement explained as "Rome's Ruins" is significant, but of less definite pictorial value than the Sorrento movement. The "Campagnia" movement is not, especially clear, except as to a prevalence of dreary progressions. The "Neapolitan Folk Life" is full of a volatile excitable expression easily imagined as portraying the subject.

Quite antithetic in musical thought was the concerto of Beethoven for piano, No. 4, Mr. Harold Bauer at the solo instrument. With a luxurious opulence of technique and endless variety of touch Mr. Bauer made resplendent all the wealth of formal beauty of this concerto. In the second movement Mr. Bauer was remarkably fine in the beautiful way in which he worked out the tender themes for the piano in contrast with the bold manly vigor of the orchestral work in an unusual dialogue between orchestra and solo instrument.

The program closed with a fine rendering of Beethoven's overture to Egmont.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2

Boston Symphony's Concert Is Interesting

The scond concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Director Dr. Karl Muck in charge, and Harold Bauer as soloist, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater.

While there was in no measure wild applause at the end of th efirst number, the symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, the audience was deeply intereseted, perhaps almost as deeply interested as that first audience which heard this symphony. Certainly the same spirit prevailed, but, whereas the first audience was perfectly frank in expressing its disapproval, the audience of yesterday first warmly congratulated Dr. Muck on his masterly interpretation, and then sat back to discuss excitedly whether or not they "liked" and "understood" the Strauss music.

Harold Bauer, whom one always thinks of first as a great teacher, a maker of musicians, played the Beethoven concerto No. 4 with a sympathy and understanding both for the work itseld and the movements of the orchestra, that brought him no undecided applause. His tone work was a revelation of clarity.

The last number on the program was another Beethoven number, the overture to "Egmont."

F. Y.

Eagles to Elect.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 1914

Smart Set at Concert.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater yesterday attracted a large and smart audience. The British Ambassador and Lady Spring-Rice were guests of Mrs. Slater, who had one of the stage boxes, and whose party included also Miss Gwynn. The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Mme. Dumba occupied a box across the house, and with them were Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt and Mrs. Clarence Wilson. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier entertained a box party, as did also Mr. and Mrs. Eisner. Mrs. James McMillan, who had a stage box, entertained a party, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, the Misses Patten, Mrs. Hugh McMillan, of Denver, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. With Mrs. Edward McLean, in her box, were Mrs. John Wilkins, Mrs. Clarence Moore, and Viscountess de Sibour. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests in her box included Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Miss Lee, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mr. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore. Mrs. I. T. Mann's guests in her box included Mrs. Walter Wells and Mrs. William Barret Ridgely. Among others in the audience were the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Gen. and Mrs. Wotherspoon, Admiral and Mrs. Richardson Clove the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, M Arnold Hague, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendel Miss Rosalie Stang, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Julian James, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Douglas Putnam Birnie, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Gen. and Mrs. Andrews, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Miss Gwendolin Denys, Mr. and Mrs. J Biddle, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss H lan, Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. Nel Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, M Thomas Carter, Mrs. Charles T. Thon son, Miss Isabella Hagner, Miss Elli Mrs. Charles Howry, Mrs. Sidney B lou, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davi Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, Miss Sargent, M Caroline Ogden Jones, Mrs. Frederi McGuire, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, M Frederica Morgan Cameron, M George E. Pickett, Mrs. Charles Richardson, Mr. Samuel Pilson, and M Cuno Rudolph.

From News
Address Baltimore Md
DEC 2 - 1914
Date

BAUER SOLOIST AT SECOND SYMPHONY

HAROLD BAUER

Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Lyric tonight. He will play the great Beethoven Concerto in G major for piano and orchestra.

Dr. Muck has selected as the opening number the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, which was played here only a few weeks ago at the first of the New York Symphony Orchestra's three concerts. The other instrumental number, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare," is a new composition, and has never been heard in Baltimore. One of the episodes is developed from an English melody of the Sixteenth Century. The overture is its composer's fifteenth work, and is said to be extremely interesting.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2

Boston Symphony Concert.

Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, was the assisting soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, playing the Beethoven "Concerto, No. 4" for the piano. Richard Strauss' symphony fantastique, "Aus Italien," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture were the orchestral numbers. A large audience expressed its satisfaction in the characteristic way.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 3 - 1914

SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS DISAPPOINTING

Brahms' Work Heard Here Only Few Weeks Ago; Bauer As Soloist.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was by no means so successful as its predecessor. We do not, however, for a moment mean to suggest that there was any inferiority in the performance: indeed, only a very dyspeptic musician could pick any holes either in the playing of the orchestra or in that of the soloist of the occasion, Harold Bauer.

The fault lay once again in the construction of the program. Dr. Muck has several times before displayed a maladroitness almost amounting to genius in the making up of his programs, and that of last night was

The symphony chosen was Brahms' second, which we all heard under the direction of Walter Damrosch a few weeks ago. Now, in justice to Dr. Muck, it would be ridiculous to expect him to keep track of what other organizations have been doing of late in Baltimore, but he might, at any rate, call to mind that this is the third time he himself has given us this symphony during the last few years. Unfortunately, also, it happens that this is one of the few big works of Brahms which (with the exception of its beautiful slow movement) does not grow beyond a certain point on closer acquaintance.

His other three symphonies have that rugged austerity and obscure beauty which can only be appreciated by more intimate knowledge. The number immediately following was the Beethoven pianoforte concerto in G, not by any means, with all its beauties, the most virile of Beethoven's concertos. Herein lay the real weakness of the program—the softer side of both these pre-eminently masculine composers being unduly accentuated by the choice of these particular works in succession.

The last number—an overture by a modern German composer, Scheinpflug—was a change in style, but, though full of happily conceived and picturesque orchestral effects, it contains little thematic material of any value.

It was interesting to those who recall Hoffmann's reading of the Beethoven concerto here two or three years ago to hear that of Harold Bauer last evening.

Harold Bauer made the very most of this work, giving to it all variety of shade and coloring possible without in any way modernizing it.

One could not help being struck anew with the singular beauty and delicacy of his tone throughout, but it is a matter for regret that the work in question did not afford this great pianist anything like sufficient scope for revealing his full powers.

H. D. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 21 1914

Boston Symphony To Have Bauer As Soloist

Brahms' Second Symphony in D major is the first number on the program of the second Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 2. This is one of the most gracious and tuneful works in symphonic literature, and, as Dr. Muck is particularly fond of it, he gives to it, it is said, a most remarkable interpretation. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G major, and the final number will be Scheinpflug's fanciful overture to a comedy by Shakespeare, which will be given in Baltimore for the first time.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 28 1914

TO DISCUSS SYMPHONY

Program Will Be Taken Up By Director Randolph.

The Boston Symphony program will be discussed by Director Harold Randolph at the Musical Appreciation Class at the Peabody Conservatory of Music on Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock. Mr. Randolph will play the piano arrangement of the Brahms Symphony and also the G major Concerto of Beethoven, with the orchestral part arranged for second piano. This is the concerto announced to be played by the soloist at the symphony concert, Harold Bauer. The meetings are held weekly on Mondays and are conducted by Mr. Randolph, who is assisted from time to time by other artists, both instrumental and

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 2 - 1914

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 o'clock this evening. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. The program comprises Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for piano in G major and Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy by Shakespeare. The last-named work is a novelty and one of more than usual interest.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3

BAUER AND MUCK TRIUMPH.

Soloist and Orchestra Leader Deeply Sympathetic in Concert Here.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under Dr. Karl Muc[illegible] s all in the spirit of joy and sunshine, and the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G major by the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, brought together a combination of artists who seem sympathetic in every degree, for the finish and detail that make up the superb art of Harold Bauer also govern the work of Dr. Muck in his handling of this splendid orchestra.

The symphonic fantasia "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, was doubly interesting, for it was played with the greatest beauty, and it also showed the impressionistic mind of the composer, so different in this is he from the Strauss of today, who paints tone pictures in such lurid colors. It is an early work, and seems the faithful impress of a holiday in that land of blue sky, soft breezes, and lovely nature, sunny Italy. He paints placid nature in "On the Campagna," with a lyric beauty and melodiousness that he must have felt deeply, it is so pastoral, and open and serene. One wonders how how he felt "Amid Rome's Ruins," for it has a festive spirit and a touch of martial joy. With an interlude, where pipers pipe, and the strings and winds of the orchestra played with rare beauty, he resolves it into a joyous triumph. "On the Shore of Sorrento," is all nature music, which, in its purity and melodiousness makes one understand why Italy is the land of song, while the festival of the finale completed the picture by revealing a town "en fete."

Such a concerto as the Beethoven, No. 4, seems to show just what an artist can do. It reveals every nuance in its reiterated phrases, and every variety of shading and tone. It enables one to see into the art as it stands, and Harold Bauer was master in his giving of every beautiful detail. His pearly tone and clarity were woven throughout the figures of the allegro, and his commanding passages were big art work, contrasting tellingly with the exquisite feeling and beauty of his melodies. The rugged introduction of the andante by the orchestra led into some solo passages of the piano of deep feeling and mellow tone, and the closing piano phrase to a kind of funeral march of the orchestra was most impressive. Throughout the rondo the piano showed great virtuosity, but the figures were full of meaning, and the vital accents, and the lyric quality of the cadenza interwove great art with sheer music beauty.

The program closed with the Beethoven "Egmont" overture given with the same skill and fineness that characterized the entire concert.

J. MACB.

The First Established and Most Comp...
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS "AUS ITALIEN"

Washington Admirers Hear Novel Strauss Composition at New National Theater.

Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater afforded Washington admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an opportunity of hearing Richard Strauss' first excursion into realism. This was Strauss' Symphony Fantastique, "Aus Italien," a musically pictorial record of some of the composer's impressions on a visit to Italy.

This initial expedition of Strauss into the realm of the concrete was made while he was a young man—about twenty—and it is exceedingly interesting to note how quickly and surely his genius "found itself" in this new field of musical expression.

The third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," makes vivid through both harmonic and rhythmic means, the motion of the sea and a wonderful transparency. The device of widely-separated moving intervals of tone, makes vivid a remarkable impression of depth. The chaotic crossing and recrossing of fragmentary themes in the movement explained as "Rome's Ruins" is significant, but of less definite pictorial value than the Sorrento movement. The "Campagnia" movement is not, especially clear, except as to a prevalence of dreary progressions. The "Neapolitan Folk Life" is full of a volatile excitable expression easily imagined as portraying the subject.

Quite antithetic in musical thought was the concerto of Beethoven for piano, No. 4, Mr. Harold Bauer at the solo instrument. With a luxurious opulence of technique and endless variety of touch Mr. Bauer made resplendent all the wealth of formal beauty of this concerto. In the second movement Mr. Bauer was remarkably fine in the beautiful way in which he worked out the tender themes for the piano in contrast with the bold manly vigor of the orchestral work in an unusual dialogue between orchestra and solo instrument.

The program closed with a fine rendering of Beethoven's overture to Egmont.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3

Boston Symphony's Concert Is Interesting

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Director Dr. Karl Muck in charge, and Harold Bauer as soloist, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater.

While there was in no measure wild-applause at the end of th efirst number, the symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, the audience was deeply intereseted, perhaps almost as deeply interested as that first audience which heard this symphony. Certainly the same spirit prevailed, but, whereas the first audience was perfectly frank in expressing its disapproval, the audience of yesterday first warmly congratulated Dr. Muck on his masterly interpretation, and then sat back to discuss excitedly whether or not they "liked" and "understood" the Strauss music.

Harold Bauer, whom one always thinks of first as a great teacher, a maker of musicians, played the Beethoven concerto No. 4 with a sympathy and understanding both for the work itseld and the movements of the orchestra, that brought him no undecided applause. His tone work was a revelation of clarity.

The last number on the program was another Beethoven number, the overture to "Egmont."

F. Y.

Eagles to Elect.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3

Smart Set at Concert.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater yesterday attracted a large and smart audience. The British Ambassador and Lady Spring-Rice were guests of Mrs. Slater, who had one of the stage boxes, and whose party included also Miss Gwynn. The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Mme. Dumba occupied a box across the house, and w[illegible] them were Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt and Mrs. Clarence Wilson. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier entertained a box party, as did also Mr. and Mrs. Lisner. Mrs. James McMillan, who had a stage box, entertained a party, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, the Misses Patten, Mrs. Hugh McMillan, of Denver, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. With Mrs. Edward McLean, in her box, were Mrs. John Wilkins, Mrs. Clarence Moore, and Viscountess de Sibour. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests in her box included Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Miss Lee, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mr. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore. Mrs. I. T. Mann's guests in her box included Mrs. Walter Wells and Mrs. William Barret Ridgely. Among others in the audience were the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Gen. and Mrs. Wotherspoon, Admiral and Mrs. Richardson Clove the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, M Arnold Hague, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendel Miss Rosalie Stang, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Julian James, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Douglas Putnam Birnie, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Gen. and Mrs. Andrews, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Miss Gwendolin Denys, Mr. and Mrs. J Biddle, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss H lan, Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. Nels Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, M Thomas Carter, Mrs. Charles T. Thom son, Miss Isabella Hagner, Miss Ellic Mrs. Charles Howry, Mrs. Sidney B lou, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davi Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, Miss Sargent, M Caroline Ogden Jones, Mrs. Frederi McGuire, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, M Frederica Morgan Camero, M George E. Pickett, Mrs. Charles Richardson, Mr. Samuel Pilsor, and M Cuno Rudolph.

From
Address
Date DEC 2 - 1914

BAUER SOLOIST AT SECOND SYMPHONY

HAROLD BAUER

Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be he soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Lyric tonight. He will play the great Beethoven Concerto in G major for piano and orchestra.

Dr. Muck has selected as the opening number the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, which was played here only a few weeks ago at the first of the New York Symphony Orchestra's three concerts. The other instrumental number, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare," is a new composition, and has never been heard in Baltimore. One of the episodes is developed from an English melody of the Sixteenth Century. The overture is its composer's fifteenth work, and is said to be extremely interesting.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC

Boston Symphony Concert.

Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, was the assisting soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, playing the Beethoven "Concerto, No. 4" for the piano. Richard Strauss' "Aus Italien," symphony fantastique, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture were the orchestral numbers. A large audience expressed its satisfaction in the characteristic way.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 3 - 1914

SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS DISAPPOINTING

Brahms' Work Heard Here Only Few Weeks Ago; Bauer As Soloist.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was by no means so successful as its predecessor. We do not, however, for a moment mean to suggest that there was any inferiority in the performance: indeed, only a very dyspeptic musician could pick any holes either in the playing of the orchestra or in that of the soloist of the occasion, Harold Bauer.

The fault lay once again in the construction of the program. Dr. Muck has several times before displayed a maladroitness almost amounting to genius in the making up of his programs, and that of last night was

The symphony chosen was Brahms' second, which we all heard under the direction of Walter Damrosch a few weeks ago. Now, in justice to Dr. Muck, it would be ridiculous to expect him to keep track of what other organizations have been doing of late in Baltimore, but he might, at any rate, call to mind that this is the third time he himself has given us this symphony during the last few years. Unfortunately, also, it happens that this is one of the few big works of Brahms which (with the exception of its beautiful slow movement) does not grow beyond a certain point on closer acquaintance.

His other three symphonies have that rugged austerity and obscure beauty which can only be appreciated by more intimate knowledge. The number immediately following was the Beethoven pianoforte concerto in G, not by any means, with all its beauties, the most virile of Beethoven's concertos. Herein lay the real weakness of the program—the softer side of both these pre-eminently masculine composers being unduly accentuated by the choice of these particular works in succession.

The last number—an overture by a modern German composer, Scheinpflug—was a change in style, but, though full of happily conceived and picturesque orchestral effects, it contains little thematic material of any value.

It was interesting to those who recall Hoffmann's reading of the Beethoven concerto here two or three years ago to hear that of Harold Bauer last evening.

Harold Bauer made the very most of this work, giving to it all variety of shade and coloring possible without in any way modernizing it.

One could not help being struck anew with the singular beauty and delicacy of his tone throughout, but it is a matter for regret that the work in question did not afford this great pianist anything like sufficient scope for revealing his full powers.

H. D. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible] 1 1914

Boston Symphony To Have Bauer As Soloist

Brahms' Second Symphony in D major is the first number on the program of the second Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 2. This is one of the most gracious and tuneful works in sym- ic literature, and, as Dr. Muck is icularly fond of it, he gives to it, said, a most remarkable interpre- n. The soloist will be Harold er, the pianist. He will play the rth Concerto of Beethoven in G or, and the final number will be einpflug's fanciful overture to a edy by Shakespeare, which will be n in Baltimore for the first time.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 28 1914

TO DISCUSS SYMPHONY

Program Will Be Taken Up By Director Randolph.

The Boston Symphony program will be discussed by Director Harold Randolph at the Musical Appreciation Class at the Peabody Conservatory of Music on Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock. Mr. Randolph will play the piano arrangement of the Brahms Symphony and also he G major Concerto of Beethoven, with the orchestral part arranged for econd piano. This is the concerto anounced to be played by the soloist at e symphony concert, Harold Bauer. meetings are held weekly on Mon- and are conducted by Mr. Ran- , who is assisted from time to time her artists, both instrumental and

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 2 - 1914

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 o'clock this evening. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. The program comprises Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for piano in G major and Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy by Shakespeare. The last-named work is a novelty and one of more than usual interest.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 - 1914

BAUER AND MUCK TRIUMPH.

Soloist and Orchestra Leader Deeply Sympathetic in Concert Here.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under Dr. Karl Muck, [illegible] in the spirit of joy and sunshine, and the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G major by the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer, brought together a combination of artists who seem sympathetic in every degree, for the finish and detail that make up the superb art of Harold Bauer also govern the work of Dr. Muck in his handling of this splendid orchestra.

The symphonic fantasia "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, was doubly interesting, for it was played with the greatest beauty, and it also showed the impressionistic mind of the composer, so different in this is he from the Strauss of today, who paints tone pictures in such lurid colors. It is an early work, and seems the faithful impress of a holiday in that land of blue sky, soft breezes, and lovely nature, sunny Italy. He paints placid nature in "On the Campagna," with a lyric beauty and melodiousness that he must have felt deeply, it is so pastoral, and open and serene. One wonders how how he felt "Amid Rome's Ruins," for it has a festive spirit and a touch of martial joy. With an interlude, where pipers pipe, and the strings and winds of the orchestra played with rare beauty, he resolves it into a joyous triumph. "On the Shore of Sorrento," is all nature music, which, in its purity and melodiousness makes one understand why Italy is the land of song, while the festival of the finale completed the picture by revealing a town "en fete."

Such a concerto as the Beethoven, No. 4, seems to show just what an artist can do. It reveals every nuance in its reiterated phrases, and every variety of shading and tone. It enables one to see into the art as it stands, and Harold Bauer was master in his giving of every beautiful detail. His pearly tone and clarity were woven throughout the figures of the allegro, and his commanding passages were big art work, contrasting tellingly with the exquisite feeling and beauty of his melodies. The rugged introduction of the andante by the orchestra led into some solo passages of the piano of deep feeling and mellow tone, and the closing piano phrase to a kind of funeral march of the orchestra was most impressive. Throughout the rondo the piano showed great virtuosity, but the figures were full of meaning, and the vital accents, and the lyric quality of the cadenza interwove great art with sheer music beauty.

The program closed with the Beethoven "Egmont" overture given with the same skill and fineness that characterized the entire concert.

J. MACB.

The First Established and Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS "AUS ITALIEN"

Washington Admirers Hear Novel Strauss Composition at New National Theater.

Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater afforded Washington admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an opportunity of hearing Richard Strauss' first excursion into realism. This was Strauss' Symphony Fantastique, "Aus Italien," a musically pictorial record of some of the composer's impressions on a visit to Italy.

This initial expedition of Strauss into the realm of the concrete was made while he was a young man—about twenty—and it is exceedingly interesting to note how quickly and surely his genius "found itself" in this new field of musical expression.

The third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," makes vivid through both harmonic and rhythmic means, the motion of the sea and a wonderful transparency. The device of widely-separated moving intervals of tone, makes vivid a remarkable impression of depth. The chaotic crossing and recrossing of fragmentary themes in the movement explained as "Rome's Ruins" is significant, but of less definite pictorial value than the Sorrento movement. The "Campagnia" movement is not, especially clear, except as to a prevalence of dreary progressions. The "Neapolitan Folk Life" is full of a volatile excitable expression easily imagined as portraying the subject.

Quite antithetic in musical thought was the concerto of Beethoven for piano, No. 4, Mr. Harold Bauer at the solo instrument. With a luxurious opulence of technique and endless variety of touch Mr. Bauer made resplendent all the wealth of formal beauty of this concerto. In the second movement Mr. Bauer was remarkably fine in the beautiful way in which he worked out the tender themes for the piano in contrast with the bold manly vigor of the orchestral work in an unusual dialogue between orchestra and solo instrument.

The program closed with a fine rendering of Beethoven's overture to Egmont.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 1914

Boston Symphony's Concert Is Interesting

The scond concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Director Dr. Karl Muck in charge, and Harold Bauer as soloist, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater.

While there was in no measure wild applause at the end of th efirst number, the symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," of Richard Strauss, the audience was deeply intereseted, perhaps almost as deeply interested as that first audience which heard this symphony. Certainly the same spirit prevailed, but, whereas the first audience was perfectly frank in expressing its disapproval, the audience of yesterday first warmly congratulated Dr. Muck on his masterly interpretation, and then sat back to discuss excitedly whether or not they "liked" and "understood" the Strauss music.

Harold Bauer, whom one always thinks of first as a great teacher, a maker of musicians, played the Beethoven concerto No. 4 with a sympathy and understanding both for the work itseld and the movements of the orchestra, that brought him no undecided applause. His tone work was a revelation of clarity.

The last number on the program was another Beethoven number, the overture to "Egmont."

F. Y.

Eagles to Elect.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 - 1914

Smart Set at Concert.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater yesterday attracted a large and smart audience. The British Ambassador and Lady Spring-Rice were guests of Mrs. Slater, who had one of the stage boxes, and whose party included also Miss Gwynn. The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Mme. Dumba occupied a box across the house, and w[illegible] them were Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt and Mrs. Clarence Wilson. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier entertained a box party, as did also Mr. and Mrs. Eisner. Mrs. James McMillan, who had a stage box, entertained a party, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, the Misses Patten, Mrs. Hugh McMillan, of Denver, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. With Mrs. Edward McLean, in her box, were Mrs. John Wilkins, Mrs. Clarence Moore, and Viscountess de Sibour. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests in her box included Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Miss Lee, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mr. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore. Mrs. I. T. Mann's guests in her box included Mrs. Walter Wells and Mrs. William Barret Ridgely. Among others in the audience were the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Gen. and Mrs. Wotherspoon, Admiral and Mrs. Richardson Clove the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, M Arnold Hague, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendel Miss Rosalie Stang, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Julian James, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Douglas Putnam Birnie, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Gen. and Mrs. Andrews, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Miss Gwendolin Denys, Mr. and Mrs. J Biddle, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss H lan, Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. Nels Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, M Thomas Carter, Mrs. Charles T. Thom son, Miss Isabella Hagner, Miss Ellic Mrs. Charles Howry, Mrs. Sidney B lou, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davi Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, Miss Sargent, M Caroline Ogden Jones, Mrs. Frederi McGuire, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, M Frederica Morgan Cameron, M George E. Pickett, Mrs. Charles Richardson, Mr. Samuel Pilsor, and M Cuno Rudolph.

DEC 2 -

ER SOLOIST AT SECOND SYMPHON

HAROLD BAUER

Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Lyric tonight. He will play the great Beethoven Concerto in G major for piano and orchestra.

Dr. Muck has selected as the opening number the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, which was played here only a few weeks ago at the first of the New York Symphony Orchestra's three concerts. The other instrumental number, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare," is a new composition, and has never been heard in Baltimore. One of the episodes is developed from an English melody of the Sixteenth Century. The overture is its composer's fifteenth work, and is said to be extremely interesting.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C
Date DEC

Boston Symphony Concert.

Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, was the assisting soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, playing the Beethoven "Concerto, No. 4" for the piano. Richard Strauss' symphony fantastique, "Aus Italien," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture were the orchestral numbers. A large audience expressed its satisfaction in the characteristic way.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 3 - 1914

SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS DISAPPOINTING

Brahms' Work Heard Here Only Few Weeks Ago; Bauer As Soloist.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was by no means so successful as its predecessor. We do not, however, for a moment mean to suggest that there was any inferiority in the performance: indeed, only a very dyspeptic musician could pick any holes either in the playing of the orchestra or in that of the soloist of the occasion, Harold Bauer.

The fault lay once again in the construction of the program. Dr. Muck has several times before displayed a maladroitness almost amounting to genius in the making up of his programs, and that of last night was

The symphony chosen was Brahms' second, which we all heard under the direction of Walter Damrosch a few weeks ago. Now, in justice to Dr. Muck, it would be ridiculous to expect him to keep track of what other organizations have been doing of late in Baltimore, but he might, at any rate, call to mind that this is the third time he himself has given us this symphony during the last few years. Unfortunately, also, it happens that this is one of the few big works of Brahms which (with the exception of its beautiful slow movement) does not grow beyond a certain point on closer acquaintance.

His other three symphonies have that rugged austerity and obscure beauty which can only be appreciated by more intimate knowledge. The number immediately following was the Beethoven pianoforte concerto in G, not by any means, with all its beauties, the most virile of Beethoven's concertos. Herein lay the real weakness of the program—the softer side of both these pre-eminently masculine composers being unduly accentuated by the choice of these particular works in succession.

The last number—an overture by a modern German composer, Scheinpflug—was a change in style, but, though full of happily conceived and picturesque orchestral effects, it contains little thematic material of any value.

It was interesting to those who recall Hoffmann's reading of the Beethoven concerto here two or three years ago to hear that of Harold Bauer last evening.

Harold Bauer made the very most of this work, giving to it all variety of shade and coloring possible without in any way modernizing it.

One could not help being struck anew with the singular beauty and delicacy of his tone throughout, but it is a matter for regret that the work in question did not afford this great pianist anything like sufficient scope for revealing his full powers.

H. D. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 21 1914

Boston Symphony To Have Bauer As Soloist

Brahms' Second Symphony in D major is the first number on the program of the second Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 2. This is one of the most gracious and tuneful works in symphonic literature, and, as Dr. Muck is particularly fond of it, he gives to it, it is said, a most remarkable interpretation. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven in G major, and the final number will be Scheinpflug's fanciful overture to a comedy by Shakespeare, which will be given in Baltimore for the first time.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 28 1914

TO DISCUSS SYMPHONY

Program Will Be Taken Up By Director Randolph.

The Boston Symphony program will be discussed by Director Harold Randolph at the Musical Appreciation Class at the Peabody Conservatory of Music on Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock. Mr. Randolph will play the piano arrangement of the Brahms Symphony and also the G major Concerto of Beethoven, with the orchestral part arranged for second piano. This is the concerto announced to be played by the soloist at the symphony concert, Harold Bauer. The meetings are held weekly on Mondays and are conducted by Mr. Randolph, who is assisted from time to time by other artists, both instrumental and

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 2 - 1914

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 o'clock this evening. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the pianist. The program comprises Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for piano in G major and Scheinpflug's overture to a comedy by Shakespeare. The last-named work is a novelty and one of more than usual interest.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 3 - 1914
Est 188

GREAT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Hearty Reception Given Brahms' Second Symphony; Bauer Is Soloist.

Presenting Harold Bauer, pianist, as the special soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the second of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The heavy fog did not mar either audience or musicians, perceptibly. Indeed, the hearty reception given the playing of Brahm's second symphony was the more remarkable, in consequence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the greatest of present-day orchestras in America, at least, is apparent the more one has the opportunity to compare it and its work with that of other orchestras. It is also plain that its conductor, Dr. Muck, is chiefly responsible for this musical superiority, for more musical truth is revealed orchestrally under his direction than in any other orchestra now playing here. The remainder of the responsibility rests upon his orchestra. His men play like thinking creatures and not like automatons. An enormous proportion of this country's musical education is due to this organization, and no evil fate ever should be allowed to overtake it.

Generally speaking, much of Beethoven's music is about as expressive in the present day as a vast expanse of pure, white marble. His pi in G major, played last nig Bauer, is one example. Hi certo in E flat major is there are many others,
Beethoven, but by other posers.

It is quite right that t be heard occasionally, so serve the acquaintance but positive enjoyment
the many is impossible, cause they were written in cal manner of expression days and partly because th expressed such a great nu ideas. Those who live in t think there is nothing like then they cease to be all-satisfying to those who are trying to live in the present, who are trying to live a complete life, to keep abreast of the times and to find full expression for their ever-changing complex attitudes and methods of thinking. It is quite possible that even Brahms, who expresses the present so richly, will appear in this manner in the years to come.

Bauer's playing was in keeping with the concerto. Even though it was disappointing in a degree to hear the Boston Orchestra play the same Brahms' symphony last night which another orchestra played here about one month ago, Baltimore probably lost nothing in reality, it was played in a manner so far superior. Its reception showed that Brahms is becoming understood gradually but surely.

It is one of the paradoxes of musical art that music which suggests best the most obvious is the least understood by the general public. Music which is often positively meaningless or shockingly astonishing is liked more readily. Here is the pitfall and where the study of the meaning of music begins. Musical art, like other things, can express mainly only one thing—that is qualities. As soon as composers begin to write music which, they say, expresses a bump on a log or a family quarrel or a man wearing a gold-mesh nightrobe; just then the mission of musical art disappears and a grotesque burlesque appears.

Brahm's music is true art expression of qualities in the ripest manner of the present, in his own way. Last night's symphony showed this plainly. Mention of this work should not leave unnoticed the particularly enjoyable third movement. Its theme and opening treatment is one of the most exquisite bits of modern music.

It is not surprising that the great works of Brahms and of others should miss and have missed general comprehension at times. Understanding music depends upon two things, the personal character of the listener and the amount of his musical education. It is one of the great things in favor of art appreciation that it doe not fail of some appeal through lac of particular art education. This is one of the proofs that music is expressive of qualities and not of physically tangible things. What musical appreciation does depend upon chiefly is the susceptibility of the emotions and depth of character, the mental constitution which can find "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones and good in everything."

What [illegible] it except the innate longing for expression of the thoughts, which they instinctively know music expresses, that brings judges, lawyers, physicians, scientists, clergymen and all men of habitual thought to our local symphony orchestra concerts night after night? These men have seen and know the world and its possibilities, and their regular attention to music, which cannot be other than sincere, testifies to the power of the art and the fact that it has something for them which they go to get. It is wonderful!

Because of the impressions created musicians as a whole would prefer to have the best music last in a concert. However, partly to accommodate the natural strain upon the perceptive faculties, not alone of musical laymen, but of musicians themselves, what is oftenest the best music is placed at the beginning of the program and music of decreasingly serious vein thereafter.

It is quite possible, although uncomfortable, for even the best musicians to accommodate themselves to this—it must be said—unnatural arrangement. It is certainly good policy for them to do so, if they increase the general interest in music thereby. The disagreeable part of it is that by this system the plane of artistic excellence is usually lower at the end than at the beginning of the concert. This is an unspeakably repulsive condition to anyone, and time must remedy it.

With conditions as they are, however, and that is usually the best way to meet them, musicians have their cue without looking further. It is to learn how to express sincerely in music the more joyful qualities of life. Musical literature is singularly deficient in this respect. It is either solemn or tragic, for the most part. How to be humorous or even pleasant when serious is a thing few of them have learned. They are usually so austere when serious.

When this is done then there will be no excuse for decrease in the tone of a concert as it progresses. Musical progress then may

---

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 22 1914
Established:

WASHINGTON has been rather long-suffering and mild in her attitude toward the musical menus served her in some of the visiting concerts, and recently so many protests have been registered against this attitude of apparent indifference that it seems an apt moment to voice them. These protests were precipitated by the last Boston symphony concert when the same symphony was played by them that the New York Symphony Orchestra had given the week before. This is, in some ways, an interesting happening, for it gives music lovers an opportunity of comparing the interpretations of two conductors; but, on the other hand, it is to be deplored here for the reason that we have in all but fourteen symphony concerts this year, and we need to have our musical outlook broadened by them.

There is so large a literature of music of the symphonic order with which we are totally unfamiliar that it would seem almost obligatory that we ask for these compositions on our program. This, however, is not a matter for the visiting conductor to handle alone, it is really a local responsibility, and one that needs attention. In the matter of art the Fine Arts Society sees to it that the season's output is representative of both the best in art, and of current art—to show us whither we are tending. Mr. O. G. Sonneck, who is in charge of the music department of the Library of Congress, outlined a scheme some years ago whereby music might also have a "vigilance committee" of representative musicians and music patrons to cooperate with the visiting orchestras by suggesting to them the compositions we most desire to hear.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been playing a novelty, the Ropartz fourth symphony, which has proved of interest elsewhere, and Dr. Muck no doubt would have gladly given it to us had he known that we desired it. Several seasons ago, out of a season of fifteen symphony concerts, we heard the fifth symphony of Beethoven played four times. It is to avert such a repetition that these protests are cited, and if the responsibility is ours, let us assume it, or at least let our needs be known.

J. MacB.

BOSTON JOURNAL

DECEMBER 11

SYMPHONY PLAYS A NEW PRELUDE

An interesting novelty was brought out in Sanders Theatre last night at the Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was entitled "Prelude to the Play, 'The Delectable Forest,'" and was composed by Edward Ballantine, who is an instructor in the department of music at Harvard.

The rest of the program was made up of the Brahms Second Symphony and the seldom played Saint-Saens piano concerto in C minor, brilliantly performed by Harold Bauer.

In view of Mr. Bauer's notable performance of the Beethoven G major concerto at the last Boston concerts, it was regrettable that the Cambridge audience could not hear such an ideal interpretation of that great concerto. Yet it is characteristic of the catholicity of Mr. Bauer's taste and the broadness of his repertoire that, unlike some soloists who repeat with parrot-like accuracy the same piece in every place they play, Mr. Bauer should play, as he has in the last week or two, the Brahms D minor concerto in New York, the Beethoven in Boston and the Saint-Saens in Cambridge.

Mr. Ballantine's prelude was written originally as part of incidental music to Hermann Hagedorn's play, "The Delectable Forest," which was given at Radcliffe in 1912. The prelude was rewritten by Mr. Ballantine while he was staying at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H., and was performed there last summer at the MacDowell festival, being very favorably received at that time.

The prelude has a charmingly fanciful character. The ideas are imaginative and the scoring is delicate and picturesque. There is considerable variety of thematic material. The composition as a whole seemed to lack coherence in the development of the material and a broader treatment of the themes.

The orchestra played the prelude delightfully and the composition evidently made a most favorable impression, receiving long-continued and enthusiastic applause.

DECEMBER 12

ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

A WILDLY MODERN WORK BY STRAVINSKY GIVEN

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Haydn's Violoncello Concerto Played by Josef Malkin.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Eighth Symphony. F major.
Stravinsky. "Fireworks."
Haydn. Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Malkin.

As usual with Dr. Muck, he surrounded his modern tonal wounds with classical poultices. Beethoven came before Stravinsky and Haydn after him. But even with these antidotes the modern tonal coruscations and explosions entitled "Fireworks" seemed anarchistic enough. Was it not of Whistler's painting entitled "Fireworks" that Ruskin wrote—"He has thrown a pot of paint at the head of the public"? (I quote from memory and may be mistaken in the exact sentence.) In this bit of fire-worship Stravinsky hurls a whole orchestra at the head of the public and calls it music. The effects of flame are more musically done in Wagner's "Feuerzauber," or even in Strauss' "Feuersnoth."

But viewed as a bit of musical impressionism, or perhaps sensationalism, the "Fireworks" were interesting enough. Of course there was a very large orchestra employed and there was mastery of many striking tonal effects. One could hear the pin-wheels, the flashes, and (very decidedly) the final bombs. The work is very short also, which is a rare virtue in modern music. It was performed with a technique that swept everything before it, but the musical content seemed very slight. What some of the brass dissonances meant we could not imagine, unless the man who lit the pieces had burnt his fingers and made a few resultant remarks. But the excitement of the short composition made amends for the absence of true music.

Beethoven's eighth symphony was quite another story. In these present days no self-respecting composer would write a symphony less than an hour-and-a-half in length, nor with an orchestra of less than thirty different parts, nor dealing with anything less than abject despair or a universal cataclysm. And here is this old fogy presenting a symphony less than half-an-hour in length, with about a dozen parts (sometimes less), and actually tuneful, genial and playful. We may ask in indignation—"Is this Music?" Are we to be entertained, pleased and refreshed by a Symphony? Are we to be thus trifled with by tunes and melodious sequences? The Irish echo answers—"We are!" and, what is more, the audience seemed to heartily enjoy the work.

The reading of it was commendable. The chattering themes of the first movement were merry enough, and the woodwind (oboe and flute) were dainty in the closing theme here. But the bassoons deserve the chief praise in this work. In one sense the bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument. He always enjoyed writing for it when he was in that free and easy mood that he graphically called "aufgekhoepft"—"unbuttoned," and, therefore, this work may almost be called a bassoon concerto. With comical gravity, these instruments gave their octave figure in the coda of the first movement, and in the last movement the duet of bassoons and kettledrums (odd combination) was quaintly effective.

In the slow movement, which is not slow in this instance (Allegretto Scherzando), the pretty little dialogue between violins and violoncellos was charmingly given, and the brusque manner in which the contrabasses bit off the innocent flutes was made as grotesque as possible. Altogether it was an example of the almost lost art of enjoyment in Music.

The contrabasses, which play an important part in this symphony, did excellent work. The only possible fault to be found was that the shading was sometimes too extreme. It made the work seem inflated. We prefer this little symphony in a quieter, simpler style.

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto was somewhat less striking to the modern ear. It had neither the modern technique nor the modern orchestral combinations. The first object of a true concerto ought to be orchestral. The perfect concerto is a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo work interwoven. Taken from this standpoint the literature of the violoncello is very defective. There are not many real violin concertos, but violoncello concertos are as rare as white blackbirds.

But the work demanded pure tone, sympathetic quality, good phrasing and a generally clean-cut style, and these qualities Mr. Josef Malkin brought to it. There were several long orchestral passages (tutti) in the old-fashioned style, and there was a flavor of Mozart (Leporello in "Don Giovanni") in the first movement.

The solo work, as above intimated, was excellent,—the best violoncello playing that we have had in these concerts for a very long while. Mr. Malkin, our new violoncellist in the orchestra, is certainly a great artist on his instrument. The warm, sympathetic tone in the Haydn passages was commendable, while in the long cadenza there was plenty of modern display, such as runs and skips, some superb double-stopping, and some nobly broad work on the C string.

At the end Mr. Malkin was recalled over and over again; in fact he awakened the chief enthusiasm in a concert where there was very much applause throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture is practically all that survives in the concert-room (or in theatre) of that undramatic opera. And this overture is dramatic from beginning to end. Right daintily did the violins give the delicate lace-work of the beginning. We firmly believe that no orchestra in the world possesses such a noble string band as we have in our Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was odd to listen to the diminished chords of the ninth in the opening of the work, as picturing evil. Nowadays Strauss, Rezenicek & Co. would give something infinitely more ear-splitting for such a purpose.

Dr. Muck read the work with fine abandon, and pictured the struggle of evil and innocence, and the final triumph of the lovers, with earnest power. It was a beautiful ending to a very enjoyable concert, which was of reasonable length and did not crush the auditor as some of the longer and more ambitious ones sometimes do.

[76]

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 3 1914

Est 188

GREAT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Hearty Reception Given Brahms' Second Symphony; Bauer Is Soloist.

Presenting Harold Bauer, pianist, as the special soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the second of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The heavy fog did not mar either audience or musicians, perceptibly. Indeed, the hearty reception given the playing of Brahm's second symphony was the more remarkable, in consequence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the greatest of present-day orchestras in America, at least, is apparent the more one has the opportunity to compare it and its work with that of other orchestras. It is also plain that its conductor, Dr. Muck, is chiefly responsible for this musical superiority, for more musical truth is revealed orchestrally under his direction than in any other orchestra now playing here. The remainder of the responsibility rests upon his orchestra. His men play like thinking creatures and not like automatons. An enormous proportion of this country's musical education is due to this organization, and no evil fate ever should be allowed to overtake it.

Generally speaking, much of Beethoven's music is about as expressive in the present day as a vast expanse of pure, white marble. His pi in G major, played last nig Bauer, is one example. Hi certo in E flat major is there are many others, Beethoven, but by other posers.

It is quite right that t be heard occasionally, so serve the acquaintance but positive enjoyment the many is impossible, cause they were written in cal manner of expression days and partly because th expressed such a great nu ideas. Those who live in t think there is nothing like then they cease to be all-satisfying to those who are trying to live in the present, who are trying to live a complete life, to keep abreast of the times and to find full expression for their ever-changing complex attitudes and methods of thinking. It is quite possible that even Brahms, who expresses the present so richly, will appear in this manner in the years to come.

Bauer's playing was in keeping with the concerto. Even though it was disappointing in a degree to hear the Boston Orchestra play the same Brahms' symphony last night which another orchestra played here about one month ago, Baltimore probably lost nothing in reality, it was played in a manner so far superior. Its reception showed that Brahms is becoming understood gradually but surely.

It is one of the paradoxes of musical art that music which suggests best the most obvious is the least understood by the general public. Music which is often positively meaningless or shockingly astonishing is liked more readily. Here is the pitfall and where the study of the meaning of music begins. Musical art, like other things, can express mainly only one thing—that is qualities. As soon as composers begin to write music which, they say, expresses a bump on a log or a family quarrel or a man wearing a gold-mesh nightrobe, just then the mission of musical art disappears and a grotesque burlesque appears.

Brahm's music is true art expression of qualities in the ripest manner of the present, in his own way. Last night's symphony showed this plainly. Mention of this work should not leave unnoticed the particularly enjoyable third movement. Its theme and opening treatment is one of the most exquisite bits of modern music.

It is not surprising that the great works of Brahms and of others should miss and have missed general comprehension at times. Understanding music depends upon two things, the personal character of the listener and the amount of his musical education. It is one of the great things in favor of art appreciation that it doe not fail of some appeal through lac of particular art education. This is one of the proofs that music is expressive of qualities and not of physically tangible things. What musical appreciation does depend upon chiefly is the susceptibility of the emotions and depth of character, the mental constitution which can find "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones and good in everything."

What is it except the innate longing for expression of the thoughts, which they instinctively know music expresses, that brings judges, lawyers, physicians, scientists, clergymen and all men of habitual thought to our local symphony orchestra concerts night after night? These men have seen and know the world and its possibilities, and their regular attention to music, which cannot be other than sincere, testifies to the power of the art and the fact that it has something for them which they go to get. It is wonderful!

Because of the impressions created musicians as a whole would prefer to have the best music last in a concert. However, partly to accommodate the natural strain upon the perceptive faculties, not alone of musical laymen, but of musicians themselves, what is oftenest the best music is placed at the beginning of the program and music of decreasingly serious vein thereafter.

It is quite possible, although uncomfortable, for even the best musicians to accommodate themselves to this—it must be said—unnatural arrangement. It is certainly good policy for them to do so, if they increase the general interest in music thereby. The disagreeable part of it is that by this system the plane of artistic excellence is usually lower at the end than at the beginning of the concert. This is an unspeakably repulsive condition to anyone, and time must remedy it.

With conditions as they are, however, and that is usually the best way to meet them, musicians have their cue without looking further. It is to learn how to express sincerely in music the more joyful qualities of life. Musical literature is singularly deficient in this respect. It is either solemn or tragic, for the most part. How to be humorous or even pleasant when serious is a thing few of them have learned. They are usually so austere when serious.

When this is done then there will be no excuse for decrease in the tone of a concert as it progresses. Musical progress then may [illegible]

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 11

SYMPHONY PLAYS A NEW PRELUDE

An interesting novelty was brought out in Sanders Theatre last night at the Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was entitled "Prelude to the Play, 'The Delectable Forest,'" and was composed by Edward Ballantine, who is an instructor in the department of music at Harvard.

The rest of the program was made up of the Brahms Second Symphony and the seldom played Saint-Saens piano concerto in C minor, brilliantly performed by Harold Bauer.

In view of Mr. Bauer's notable performance of the Beethoven G major concerto at the last Boston concerts, it was regrettable that the Cambridge audience could not hear such an ideal interpretation of that great concerto. Yet it is characteristic of the catholicity of Mr. Bauer's taste and the broadness of his repertoire that, unlike some soloists who repeat with parrot-like accuracy the same piece in every place they play, Mr. Bauer should play, as he has in the last week or two, the Brahms D minor concerto in New York, the Beethoven in Boston and the Saint-Saens in Cambridge.

Mr. Ballantine's prelude was written originally as part of incidental music to Hermann Hagedorn's play, "The Delectable Forest," which was given at Radcliffe in 1912. The prelude was rewritten by Mr. Ballantine while he was staying at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H., and was performed there last summer at the MacDowell festival, being very favorably received at that time.

The prelude has a charmingly fanciful character. The ideas are imaginative and the scoring is delicate and picturesque. There is considerable variety of thematic material. The composition as a whole seemed to lack coherence in the development of the material and a broader treatment of the themes.

The orchestra played the prelude delightfully and the composition evidently made a most favorable impression, receiving long-continued and enthusiastic applause.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date NO 22 1914

Established:

WASHINGTON has been rather long-suffering and mild in her attitude toward the musical menus served her in some of the visiting concerts, and recently so many protests have been registered against this attitude of apparent indifference that it seems an apt moment to voice them. These protests were precipitated by the last Boston symphony concert when the same symphony was played by them that the New York Symphony Orchestra had given the week before. This is, in some ways, an interesting happening, for it gives music lovers an opportunity of comparing the interpretations of two conductors; but, on the other hand, it is to be deplored here for the reason that we have in all but fourteen symphony concerts this year, and we need to have our musical outlook broadened by them.

There is so large a literature of music of the symphonic order with which we are totally unfamiliar that it would seem almost obligatory that we ask for these compositions on our program. This, however, is not a matter for the visiting conductor to handle alone, it is really a local responsibility, and one that needs attention. In the matter of art the Fine Arts Society sees to it that the season's output is representative of both the best in art, and of current art—to show us whither we are tending. Mr. O. G. Sonneck, who is in charge of the music department of the Library of Congress, outlined a scheme some years ago whereby music might also have a "vigilance committee" of representative musicians and music patrons to cooperate with the visiting orchestras by suggesting to them the compositions we most desire to hear.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been playing a novelty, the Ropartz fourth symphony, which has proved of interest elsewhere, and Dr. Muck no doubt would have gladly given it to us had he known that we desired it. Several seasons ago, out of a season of fifteen symphony concerts, we heard the fifth symphony of Beethoven played four times. It is to avert such a repetition that these protests are cited, and if the responsibility is ours, let us assume it, or at least let our needs be known.

J. MacB.

DECEMBER 12

ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

A WILDLY MODERN WORK BY STRAVINSKY GIVEN

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Haydn's Violoncello Concerto Played by Josef Malkin.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Eighth Symphony. F major.
Stravinsky. "Fireworks."
Haydn. Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Malkin.

As usual with Dr. Muck, he surrounded his modern tonal wounds with classical poultices. Beethoven came before Stravinsky and Haydn after him. But even with these antidotes the modern tonal coruscations and explosions entitled "Fireworks" seemed anarchistic enough. Was it not of Whistler's painting entitled "Fireworks" that Ruskin wrote—"He has thrown a pot of paint at the head of the public"? (I quote from memory and may be mistaken in the exact sentence.) In this bit of fire-worship Stravinsky hurls a whole orchestra at the head of the public and calls it music. The effects of flame are more musically done in Wagner's "Feuerzauber," or even in Strauss' "Feuersnoth."

But viewed as a bit of musical impressionism, or perhaps sensationalism, the "Fireworks" were interesting enough. Of course there was a very large orchestra employed and there was mastery of many striking tonal effects. One could hear the pin-wheels, the flashes, and (very decidedly) the final bombs. The work is very short also, which is a rare virtue in modern music. It was performed with a technique that swept everything before it, but the musical content seemed very slight. What some of the brass dissonances meant we could not imagine, unless the man who lit the pieces had burnt his fingers and made a few resultant remarks. But the excitement of the short composition made amends for the absence of true music.

Beethoven's eighth symphony was quite another story. In these present days no self-respecting composer would write a symphony less than an hour-and-a-half in length, nor with an orchestra of less than thirty different parts, nor dealing with anything less than abject despair or a universal cataclysm. And here is this old fogy presenting a symphony less than half-an-hour in length, with about a dozen parts (sometimes less), and actually tuneful, genial and playful. We may ask in indignation—"Is this Music?" Are we to be entertained, pleased and refreshed by a Symphony? Are we to be thus trifled with by tunes and melodious sequences? The Irish echo answers—"We are!" and, what is more, the audience seemed to heartily enjoy the work.

The reading of it was commendable. The chattering themes of the first movement were merry enough, and the woodwind (oboe and flute) were dainty in the closing theme here. But the bassoons deserve the chief praise in this work. In one sense the bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument. He always enjoyed writing for it when he was in that free and easy mood that he graphically called "aufgekhoepft"—"unbuttoned," and, therefore, this work may almost be called a bassoon concerto. With comical gravity, these instruments gave their octave figure in the coda of the first movement, and in the last movement the duet of bassoons and kettledrums (odd combination) was quaintly effective.

In the slow movement, which is not slow in this instance (Allegretto Scherzando), the pretty little dialogue between violins and violoncellos was charmingly given, and the brusque manner in which the contrabasses bit off the innocent flutes was made as grotesque as possible. Altogether it was an example of the almost lost art of enjoyment in Music.

The contrabasses, which play an important part in this symphony, did excellent work. The only possible fault to be found was that the shading was sometimes too extreme. It made the work seem inflated. We prefer this little symphony in a quieter, simpler style.

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto was somewhat less striking to the modern ear. It had neither the modern technique nor the modern orchestral combinations. The first object of a true concerto ought to be orchestral. The perfect concerto is a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo work interwoven. Taken from this standpoint the literature of the violoncello is very defective. There are not many real violin concertos, but violoncello concertos are as rare as white blackbirds.

But the work demanded pure tone, sympathetic quality, good phrasing and a generally clean-cut style, and these qualities Mr. Josef Malkin brought to it. There were several long orchestral passages (tutti) in the old-fashioned style, and there was a flavor of Mozart (Leporello in "Don Giovanni") in the first movement.

The solo work, as above intimated, was excellent,—the best violoncello playing that we have had in these concerts for a very long while. Mr. Malkin, our new violoncellist in the orchestra, is certainly a great artist on his instrument. The warm, sympathetic tone in the Haydn passages was commendable, while in the long cadenza there was plenty of modern display, such as runs and skips, some superb double-stopping, and some nobly broad work on the C string.

At the end Mr. Malkin was recalled over and over again; in fact he awakened the chief enthusiasm in a concert where there was very much applause throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture is practically all that survives in the concert-room (or in theatre) of that undramatic opera. And this overture is dramatic from beginning to end. Right daintily did the violins give the delicate lace-work of the beginning. We firmly believe that no orchestra in the world possesses such a noble string band as we have in our Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was odd to listen to the diminished chords of the ninth in the opening of the work, as picturing evil. Nowadays Strauss, Rezenicek & Co. would give something infinitely more ear-splitting for such a purpose.

Dr. Muck read the work with fine abandon, and pictured the struggle of evil and innocence, and the final triumph of the lovers, with earnest power. It was a beautiful ending to a very enjoyable concert, which was of reasonable length and did not crush the auditor as some of the longer and more ambitious ones sometimes do.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 3 - 1914
Est 188

GREAT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Hearty Reception Given Brahms' Second Symphony; Bauer Is Soloist.

Presenting Harold Bauer, pianist, as the special soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the second of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The heavy fog did not mar either audience or musicians, perceptibly. Indeed, the hearty reception given the playing of Brahm's second symphony was the more remarkable, in consequence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the greatest of present-day orchestras in America, at least, is apparent the more one has the opportunity to compare it and its work with that of other orchestras. It is also plain that its conductor, Dr. Muck, is chiefly responsible for this musical superiority, for more musical truth is revealed orchestrally under his direction than in any other orchestra now playing here. The remainder of the responsibility rests upon his orchestra. His men play like thinking creatures and not like automatons. An enormous proportion of this country's musical education is due to this organization, and no evil fate ever should be allowed to overtake it.

Generally speaking, much of Beethoven's music is about as expressive in the present day as a vast expanse of pure, white marble. His piano concerto in G major, played last night by Harold Bauer, is one example. His piano concerto in E flat major is another, and there are many others, not only by Beethoven, but by other classic composers.

It is quite right that these should be heard occasionally, so as to preserve the acquaintance with them; but positive enjoyment of them by the many is impossible, partly because they were written in the musical manner of expression of bygone days and partly because they never expressed such a great number of ideas. Those who live in the past think there is nothing like them; but, they cease to be all-satisfying to those who are trying to live in the present, who are trying to live a complete life, to keep abreast of the times and to find full expression for their ever-changing complex attitudes and methods of thinking. It is quite possible that even Brahms, who expresses the present so richly, will appear in this manner in the years to come.

Bauer's playing was in keeping with the concerto. Even though it was disappointing in a degree to hear the Boston Orchestra play the same Brahms' symphony last night which another orchestra played here about one month ago, Baltimore probably lost nothing in reality, it was played in a manner so far superior. Its reception showed that Brahms is becoming understood gradually but surely.

It is one of the paradoxes of musical art that music which suggests best the most obvious is the least understood by the general public. Music which is often positively meaningless or shockingly astonishing is liked more readily. Here is the pitfall and where the study of the meaning of music begins. Musical art, like other things, can express mainly only one thing—that is qualities. As soon as composers begin to write music which, they say, expresses a bump on a log or a family quarrel or a man wearing a gold-mesh nightrobe, just then the mission of musical art disappears and a grotesque burlesque appears.

Brahm's music is true art expression of qualities in the ripest manner of the present, in his own way. Last night's symphony showed this plainly. Mention of this work should not leave unnoticed the particularly enjoyable third movement. Its theme and opening treatment is one of the most exquisite bits of modern music.

It is not surprising that the great works of Brahms and of others should miss and have missed general comprehension at times. Understanding music depends upon two things, the personal character of the listener and the amount of his musical education. It is one of the great things in favor of art appreciation that it doe not fail of some appeal through lac of particular art education. This is one of the proofs that music is expressive of qualities and not of physically tangible things. What musical appreciation does depend upon chiefly is the susceptibility of the emotions and depth of character, the mental constitution which can find "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones and good in everything."

What is it except the innate longing for expression of the thoughts, which they instinctively know music expresses, that brings judges, lawyers, physicians, scientists, clergymen and all men of habitual thought to our local symphony orchestra concerts night after night? These men have seen and know the world and its possibilities, and their regular attention to music, which cannot be other than sincere, testifies to the power of the art and the fact that it has something for them which they go to get. It is wonderful!

Because of the impressions created musicians as a whole would prefer to have the best music last in a concert. However, partly to accommodate the natural strain upon the perceptive faculties, not alone of musical laymen, but of musicians themselves, what is oftenest the best music is placed at the beginning of the program and music of decreasingly serious vein thereafter.

It is quite possible, although uncomfortable, for even the best musicians to accommodate themselves to this—it must be said—unnatural arrangement. It is certainly good policy for them to do so, if they increase the general interest in music thereby. The disagreeable part of it is that by this system the plane of artistic excellence is usually lower at the end than at the beginning of the concert. This is an unspeakably repulsive condition to anyone, and time must remedy it.

With conditions as they are, however, and that is usually the best way to meet them, musicians have their cue without looking further. It is to learn how to express sincerely in music the more joyful qualities of life. Musical literature is singularly deficient in this respect. It is either solemn or tragic, for the most part. How to be humorous or even pleasant when serious is a thing few of them have learned. They are usually so austere when serious.

When this is done then there will be no excuse for decrease in the tone of a concert as it progresses. Musical progress then may pass from one extreme to another of emotion without loss of character. Last, but by no means least, music, as a means of expression, will have made its scope at least equal to that of language.

J. N. H.

---

long-suffering and mild in her attitude erved her in some of the visiting con-protests have been registered against attitude of apparent indifference that it seems an apt moment them. These protests were precipitated by the last Boston symphony concert when the same symphony was played by them that the New York Symphony Orchestra had given the week before. This is, in some ways, an interesting happening, for it gives music lovers an opportunity of comparing the interpretations of two conductors; but, on the other hand, it is to be deplored here for the reason that we have in all but fourteen symphony concerts this year, and we need to have our musical outlook broadened by them.

There is so large a literature of music of the symphonic order with which we are totally unfamiliar that it would seem almost obligatory that we ask for these compositions on our program. This, however, is not a matter for the visiting conductor to handle alone, it is really a local responsibility, and one that needs attention. In the matter of art the Fine Arts Society sees to it that the season's output is representative of both the best in art, and of current art—to show us whither we are tending. Mr. O. G. Sonneck, who is in charge of the music department of the Library of Congress, outlined a scheme some years ago whereby music might also have a "vigilance committee" of representative musicians and music patrons to cooperate with the visiting orchestras by suggesting to them the compositions we most desire to hear.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been playing a novelty, the Ropartz fourth symphony, which has proved of interest elsewhere, and Dr. Muck no doubt would have gladly given it to us had he known that we desired it. Several seasons ago, out of a season of fifteen symphony concerts, we heard the fifth symphony of Beethoven played four times. It is to avert such a repetition that these protests are cited, and if the responsibility is ours, let us assume it, or at least let our needs be known.

J. MacB.

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 11

SYMPHONY PLAYS A NEW PRELUDE

An interesting novelty was brought out in Sanders Theatre last night at the Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was entitled "Prelude to the Play, 'The Delectable Forest,'" and was composed by Edward Ballantine, who is an instructor in the department of music at Harvard.

The rest of the program was made up of the Brahms Second Symphony and the seldom played Saint-Saens piano concerto in C minor, brilliantly performed by Harold Bauer.

In view of Mr. Bauer's notable performance of the Beethoven G major concerto at the last Boston concerts, it was regrettable that the Cambridge audience could not hear such an ideal interpretation of that great concerto. Yet it is characteristic of the catholicity of Mr. Bauer's taste and the broadness of his repertoire that, unlike some soloists who repeat with parrot-like accuracy the same piece in every place they play, Mr. Bauer should play, as he has in the last week or two, the Brahms D minor concerto in New York, the Beethoven in Boston and the Saint-Saens in Cambridge.

Mr. Ballantine's prelude was written originally as part of incidental music to Hermann Hagedorn's play, "The Delectable Forest," which was given at Radcliffe in 1912. The prelude was rewritten by Mr. Ballantine while he was staying at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H., and was performed there last summer at the MacDowell festival, being very favorably received at that time.

The prelude has a charmingly fanciful character. The ideas are imaginative and the scoring is delicate and picturesque. There is considerable variety of thematic material. The composition as a whole seemed to lack coherence in the development of the material and a broader treatment of the themes.

The orchestra played the prelude delightfully and the composition evidently made a most favorable impression, receiving long-continued and enthusiastic applause.

DECEMBER 12
ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

A WILDLY MODERN WORK BY STRAVINSKY GIVEN

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Haydn's Violoncello Concerto Played by Josef Malkin.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Eighth Symphony. F major.
Stravinsky. "Fireworks."
Haydn. Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Malkin.

As usual with Dr. Muck, he surrounded his modern tonal wounds with classical poultices. Beethoven came before Stravinsky and Haydn after him. But even with these antidotes the modern tonal coruscations and explosions entitled "Fireworks" seemed anarchistic enough. Was it not of Whistler's painting entitled "Fireworks" that Ruskin wrote—"He has thrown a pot of paint at the head of the public"? (I quote from memory and may be mistaken in the exact sentence.) In this bit of fire-worship Stravinsky hurls a whole orchestra at the head of the public and calls it music. The effects of flame are more musically done in Wagner's "Feuerzauber," or even in Strauss' "Feuersnoth."

But viewed as a bit of musical impressionism, or perhaps sensationalism, the "Fireworks" were interesting enough. Of course there was a very large orchestra employed and there was mastery of many striking tonal effects. One could hear the pin-wheels, the flashes, and (very decidedly) the final bombs. The work is very short also, which is a rare virtue in modern music. It was performed with a technique that swept everything before it, but the musical content seemed very slight. What some of the brass dissonances meant we could not imagine, unless the man who lit the pieces had burnt his fingers and made a few resultant remarks. But the excitement of the short composition made amends for the absence of true music.

Beethoven's eighth symphony was quite another story. In these present days no self-respecting composer would write a symphony less than an hour-and-a-half in length, nor with an orchestra of less than thirty different parts, nor dealing with anything less than abject despair or a universal cataclysm. And here is this old fogy presenting a symphony less than half-an-hour in length, with about a dozen parts (sometimes less), and actually tuneful, genial and playful. We may ask in indignation—"Is this Music?" Are we to be entertained, pleased and refreshed by a Symphony? Are we to be thus trifled with by tunes and melodious sequences? The Irish echo answers—"We are!" and, what is more, the audience seemed to heartily enjoy the work.

The reading of it was commendable. The chattering themes of the first movement were merry enough, and the woodwind (oboe and flute) were dainty in the closing theme here. But the bassoons deserve the chief praise in this work. In one sense the bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument. He always enjoyed writing for it when he was in that free and easy mood that he graphically called "aufgekhoepft"—"unbuttoned," and, therefore, this work may almost be called a bassoon concerto. With comical gravity, these instruments gave their octave figure in the coda of the first movement, and in the last movement the duet of bassoons and kettledrums (odd combination) was quaintly effective.

In the slow movement, which is not slow in this instance (Allegretto Scherzando), the pretty little dialogue between violins and violoncellos was charmingly given, and the brusque manner in which the contrabasses bit off the innocent flutes was made as grotesque as possible. Altogether it was an example of the almost lost art of enjoyment in Music.

The contrabasses, which play an important part in this symphony, did excellent work. The only possible fault to be found was that the shading was sometimes too extreme. It made the work seem inflated. We prefer this little symphony in a quieter, simpler style.

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto was somewhat less striking to the modern ear. It had neither the modern technique nor the modern orchestral combinations. The first object of a true concerto ought to be orchestral. The perfect concerto is a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo work interwoven. Taken from this standpoint the literature of the violoncello is very defective. There are not many real violin concertos, but violoncello concertos are as rare as white blackbirds.

But the work demanded pure tone, sympathetic quality, good phrasing and a generally clean-cut style, and these qualities Mr. Josef Malkin brought to it. There were several long orchestral passages (tutti) in the old-fashioned style, and there was a flavor of Mozart (Leporello in "Don Giovanni") in the first movement.

The solo work, as above intimated, was excellent,—the best violoncello playing that we have had in these concerts for a very long while. Mr. Malkin, our new violoncellist in the orchestra, is certainly a great artist on his instrument. The warm, sympathetic tone in the Haydn passages was commendable, while in the long cadenza there was plenty of modern display, such as runs and skips, some superb double-stopping, and some nobly broad work on the C string.

At the end Mr. Malkin was recalled over and over again; in fact he awakened the chief enthusiasm in a concert where there was very much applause throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture is practically all that survives in the concert-room (or in theatre) of that undramatic opera. And this overture is dramatic from beginning to end. Right daintily did the violins give the delicate lace-work of the beginning. We firmly believe that no orchestra in the world possesses such a noble string band as we have in our Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was odd to listen to the diminished chords of the ninth in the opening of the work, as picturing evil. Nowadays Strauss, Rezenicek & Co. would give something infinitely more ear-splitting for such a purpose.

Dr. Muck read the work with fine abandon, and pictured the struggle of evil and innocence, and the final triumph of the lovers, with earnest power. It was a beautiful ending to a very enjoyable concert, which was of reasonable length and did not crush the auditor as some of the longer and more ambitious ones sometimes do.

Globe
Dec 12, 1914

WEDDING FIREWORKS.

Stravinsky's New Piece a Lively Incident.

Josef Malkin, an Admirable 'Cellist, Plays First Time Here.

The marriage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter to M. Steinberg, as celebrated by Igor Stravinsky, was a brief and flamboyant occasion. Old shoes, rice and other by-products have been thrown after young, struggling brides and grooms, but fireworks rarely.

Whether Mr Stravinsky entertained a sly joke in characterizing the feminine qualities of his teacher's daughter—he himself had been a married man these two years—or the nature of her husband, the records do not say. According to the music by which Dr Muck added the name of the revolutionary young Russian to the programs of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday, the wedding ceremony presaged a brilliant future. The piece should also become known to campaign managers who believe in the good old political methods of torchlight parades and red fire.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra had given us the first hearing of this ephemeral bit of composition, which bears the name "Fireworks" and in New York there are those who pride themselves upon the brilliance of Mr Stransky's readings. It is true he permitted more powder to be consumed than did Dr Muck, and as a result there were moments after the first bombardment of skyrockets when some of the set-pieces—the portraits of the bride and groom—blazed in the quiet ecstasy of conjugal bliss, and exhibited some harmonic and orchestral coloring that reflected credit on Mr Stravinsky.

Thematically, there is little to be taken seriously. There are musical figures caught and developed, now spinning as pinwheels, now in flight as blazing arrows, which are not without significance to the imaginative. But can this music be said to have true brilliance? Mr Brock, the London manufacturer of fireworks, when called in to a private performance for expert and serious judgment, found the number graphic and pictorial. No doubt he reflected that it would stimulate sales in the fireworks business.

Apropos of his choice, what sort of person would Reznicek have called into consultation over his "Schlemihl"? Had the symphonic poem of the dirigible balloon appeared, would Count Zeppelin have decided whether or not it was too far above the people's heads? But Mr Stravinsky's fireworks long since burnt themselves out. They made a pretty blaze with new prismatic colors and inspire a desire to hear later music from his ballets.

Josef Malkin, the new associate solo cellist of the orchestra, played for his first appearance here Haydn's concerto in D major. Apparently nervous during the earlier part of the first movement, he gained in confidence and authority and gave an excellent account of himself. His tone is not large, nor is it particularly sensuous, least of all in the A string, but it is expressive. His intonation, while not always secure yesterday, shows his ear and technic normally to be dependable. He accomplished many beautiful things in phraseology, choosing to leave this charming old music in its own form and of its own period. The slow movement was sung with true musical feeling and a well schooled bow, and in passages of bravura and embellishment he was admirable. Mr Malkin was warmly applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth, played with characteristic virtuosity, nor should Dr Muck's beautiful accompaniment of the concerto be passed by. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" was the program's final number.

Next week Miss Florence Hinkle, the justly admired concert soprano, unique in beauty of voice and intelligence, will be the soloist in the "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the Ave Maria from "The Cross of Fire." The orchestra numbers will be Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra and Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 6.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 12,

NEW 'CELLIST IS WARMLY GREETED

This week's Symphony soloist, Josef Malkin, is one of the new members of the orchestra, who shares the first 'cello desk with Heinrich Warnke. There was evidence of nervousness in his playing yesterday, but generally his tone was bright, though not big; his style smooth and graceful, his skill ample and at times brilliant, his treatment of lyric passages sympathetic. The usual large audience applauded him long and fervently. Evidently there were many present who love to hear the 'cello, even though the music written for the instrument is seldom inspiring.

Mr. Malkin is new to Boston, but he appeared in New York as soloist five years ago, during his career as a virtuoso. In Berlin, some years ago, he was a member of the trio presided over by the present concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek. He indeed is a welcome addition to a

Mr. Malkin chose the Haydn concerto in D major for his Boston debut. It is a favorite with 'cellists, if not with the public. The other numbers on the program, which will be heard again tonight, are Beethoven's eighth symphony, Stravinsky's "Fireworks" and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

The Stravinsky tone picture is an ingenious bit of symphonic realism introduced to Bostonians a few weeks ago by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. To some it might suggest a lively Fourth of July scene on the Common, with the conflict of bands, the whirr and whiz of pinwheels and rockets and the buzz of a great crowd. With the progress of realism in the realm of music there is every reason to hope for a musical setting of a Harvard-Yale football game in the course of another season or two. Here is an opportunity for aspiring Harvard composers to set forth the boom of field goals, the roar of the fans, the frenetic glee of the snake dance.

There was a joyous performance of the cheerful Beethoven symphony and a brilliant reading of the Schumann overture.

The program for next week's concerts will comprise Wagner's "Faust Overture," Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," Haydn's sixth symphony, and solos by Miss Hinkle, the soprano.

HERALD.
DECEMBER 12

7TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Stravinsky's "Fireworks," in Which Are Bombs, but No Pin Wheels, Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Josef Malkin, violoncellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, F major.....Beethoven
"Fireworks" ....Stravinsky
Concerto in D major for violoncello.... Haydn
Overture to "Genoveva"........Schumann

When Stravinsky's "Fireworks" was produced in New York by the Russian Symphony Orchestra four years ago, the New York Tribune denounced it as "an aesthetic outrage." There was no need of this savage characterization. The piece is a harmless one written for the marriage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter. It was a wedding present, probably not returnable or exchangeable.

"There'll be fireworks, but you won't see them." There may be fireworks in Stravinsky's composition, but it takes a vivid imagination to hear them. The explosive bombs were unmistakable, but with the most honorable intention we could not hear musical pin wheels, flower pots, Roman candles, Bengal lights, set pieces or rockets worthy the name. Mr. Brock of London, a pyrotechnist, was more fortunate. He was solemnly invited to deliver a judicial opinion as an expert. He was delighted. The music appealed to him and he saw all sorts of things. In his opinion he contrived to refer to the firework displays of his own firm, so Stravinsky's piece may have benefited at least two or three persons. It is no small thing to have pleased a pyrotechnist.

We have not yet heard the music of the real Stravinsky, who si hailed by some as the musical wonder of the age; who is as much discussed as is Arnold Schoenberg. It would have been fairer to this unusual and sincere composer if a suite from one of his ballets had been put on the program. The audience would have gained a better idea of this extraordinary man's music.

Mr. Malkin, the successor of Mr. Urack in the orchestra, played here for the first time. He is a virtuoso of high rank. While his tone is not sensuous, oily or impressive, it was sympathetic in the Adagio, which is the most tolerable movement of Haydn's concerto. He has a fluent technic, plays without self-importance, and in this periwigged music he displayed sound musicianship and fine taste. Thus he made a very favorable impression. But is not the time past for violoncello concertos in a Symphony concert? A little of the violoncello as a solo instrument goes a long way; a concerto in three movements seems interminable, even without formidable cadenzas.

Dr. Muck conducted an admirable performance of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Was Beethoven in jesting mood when he described this symphony as a "little one?" Rather let it for originality and striking effects be reckoned among the great ones. We have never heard a better performance of the work than that of yesterday. Especially to be noted was the treatment of the "working-out" section of the first movement. The capriciousness of Beethoven's fancy in this symphony, the captivating capriciousness of genius, was revealed, not by a force and personal interpretation, but by allowing Beethoven to have his say in his own manner. After all there is truth in the old saw: It takes a genius to understand a genius. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Mozart, "Voi Che Sapete" (Miss Florence Hinkle); Schoenberg, five pieces for orchestra (first time in Boston); Bruch, "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire" (Miss Hinkle); Haydn, symphony in G major, "The Surprise."

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 12

BEETHOVEN FEATURE BY SYMPHONY

"Fireworks," a Virtuoso Piece, Enjoyed; New Cellist Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, introduced as a soloist Mr. Joseph Malkin, second cellist of the orchestra. Igor Strawinsky's virtuoso piece for orchestra, "Fireworks," was played for the first time at these concerts. The piece was introduced in Boston by Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic, who played it last Nov. 1 in Symphony Hall. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the Genoveva overture of Schumann completed the programme.

BEETHOVEN THE FEATURE

The feature of the concert was neither the musicianly performance of Mr. Malkin nor the exceedingly brilliant performance of Strawinsky's showpiece, nor yet could it have been the romantic music of Schumann. When all is said, when a thousand scores of a hundred composers, schools and periods have been heard, the figure that towers head and shoulders above all others is and will probably remain for generations to come, that of Beethoven.

The performance, of which it is difficult to speak in anything but superlatives, brought the fact home with especial force. It also brought home the supreme tonal beauty and clarity and brilliancy and Promethean power of the Beethoven orchestra.

Secret Died With Beethoven

The secret of this force and power, and its complete representation by means of an orchestra small beside that of the orchestra ordinarily employed today, died with Beethoven. One can perceive the admirable balancing of tone, the economy of weans with which the most original effects are introduced; one can analyze to his heart's content the working of the machinery that Beethoven put in motion, but this is far from discovering the truth of the matter. There is no better illustration of the inexplicable manner in which the inspiration of a great artist glorifies the letter until the letter itself becomes pure spirit. There are the instruments, known to other composers of Beethoven's day than himself; there is the scoring which is apparently child's play by the side of a score of Tristan or Zarathustra. But, like no other orchestra, the Beethoven orchestra is as the mystery of nature in repose, or the elements themselves at play. A gigantic spirit inhabits it.

Gets "True 'Cello Tone"

Mr. Malkin is an unusually capable 'cellist. Others have shown a tone of more sensuous beauty, but his tone is big, though rough, and this is the tone, we beieve, commonly spoken of as the "true 'cello tone." All right, then, it is the true 'cello tone. A prettier tone, a more ladyfied tone, is not, we presume, a true 'cello tone. Again all right.

Mr. Malkin's intonation was admirably true; he was wholly master of his music; he played with the utmost appreciation of its style and with due deference to the wishes of the composer, and he was heartily applauded.

Display of Virtuosity

The performance of Strawinsky's music presented the piece to better advantage than its performance by the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Muck's tempi are more effective, and give more continuity as well as contrast to the music, and there was more conspicuous virtuosity on the part of the players. The piece is a tour de force on the part of a gifted and precocious youth and not without fantasy and humor of a realistic description.

This, too, pleased the audience, Strawinsky was encored, as had been Mr. Walkin, Dr. Muck, Beethoven.

HE BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 25.

KREISLER NEAR DEATH IN COSSACK CHARGE

Violinist, Limping From Wound, Tells of Peril.

His Revolver Saved Him After Being Borne Down Under a Horse.

NEW YORK, Nov 24—Violin virtuosos are supposed to be incapable of withstanding the slightest shock, but Fritz Kreisler, who arrived in New York today with his American wife, is a striking exception, for he limped from a lance wound in his thigh and smiled because he had retaliated by killing a Cossack when fighting with the Austrian Army, in which he is a lieutenant.

In the trenches before Lemberg the violinist first saw action and received the wound that incapacitated him and brought the Austrian authorities to the realization that he was far too valuable to be sacrificed. So he is here, limping along with the aid of a stout cane and full of assurance that a thigh wound has nothing whatever to do with his ability to play the violin.

"I had been in the trenches before Lemberg for four days before the Cossacks made the charge that put me out of action," said Mr Kreisler on board the Rotterdam.

"We had all been on duty for four days without rest when the charge came. It occurred at about midnight, and they came in such numbers that our rifle fire and machine guns never checked them for an instant. Whenever the volleys from the rifles or the stream of lead from the machine guns would cut a hole in their ranks there were more men behind only too eager to fill the gaps.

"Then they were on us. Just as one Cossack came at me, I fired and his horse crumpled under him. I went down with the horse and for a moment was stunned by the force of the fall. Then the horse rolled off me and I found that my right leg had been pierced by the Cossack's lance.

"I didn't have time to think of my wound, be it large or trifling, for the Cossack was trying to free his saber from the confusion of trappings. We closed and for a few moments it was a question which of us would first get his sword or revolver into action. I was lucky and killed him.

"The charge had swept our trench clean of every living soul, and I could find no one to help me. I called feebly but soon forgot, and when I revived I was in the hospital at Lemberg."

It was Mrs Kreisler who told how her husband's servant had gone back to the trench and found Mr Kreisler and brought him to the hospital. Even when he was in the hospital Mrs Kreisler did not know her husband's whereabouts until she chanced to walk by his cot. She was doing duty as a Red Cross nurse.

Mrs Kreisler then saw her husband for the first time in two months, for she had received no direct word from him after he had joined his regiment early in August.

She praised the work of the American nurses in the Austrian Red Cross and said that the Russians were now known throughout the Austrian Army as being humane fighters and fair to their foe.

Mrs Kreisler has come to this country for a series of concerts.

Glob
Dec 12, 1914

WEDDING FIREWORKS.

Stravinsky's New Piece a Lively Incident.

Josef Malkin, an Admirable 'Cellist, Plays First Time Here.

The marriage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter to M. Steinberg, as celebrated by Igor Stravinsky, was a brief and flamboyant occasion. Old shoes, rice and other by-products have been thrown after young, struggling brides and grooms, but fireworks rarely.

Whether Mr Stravinsky entertained a sly joke in characterizing the feminine qualities of his teacher's daughter—he himself had been a married man these two years—or the nature of her husband, the records do not say. According to the music by which Dr Muck added the name of the revolutionary young Russian to the programs of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday, the wedding ceremony presaged a brilliant future. The piece should also become known to campaign managers who believe in the good old political methods of torchlight parades and red fire.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra had given us the first hearing of this ephemeral bit of composition, which bears the name "Fireworks" and in New York there are those who pride themselves upon the brilliance of Mr Stransky's readings. It is true he permitted more powder to be consumed than did Dr Muck, and as a result there were moments after the first bombardment of skyrockets when some of the set-pieces—the portraits of the bride and groom—blazed in the quiet ecstasy of conjugal bliss, and exhibited some harmonic and orchestral coloring that reflected credit on Mr Stravinsky.

Thematically, there is little to be taken seriously. There are musical figures caught and developed, now spinning as pinwheels, now in flight as blazing arrows, which are not without significance to the imaginative. But can this music be said to have true brilliance? Mr Brock, the London manufacturer of fireworks, when called in to a private performance for expert and serious judgment, found the number graphic and pictorial. No doubt he reflected that it would stimulate sales in the fireworks business.

Apropos of his choice, what sort of person would Reznicek have called into consultation over his "Schlemihl"? Had the symphonic poem of the dirigible balloon appeared, would Count Zeppelin have decided whether or not it was too far above the people's heads? But Mr Stravinsky's fireworks long since burnt themselves out. They made a pretty blaze with new prismatic colors and inspire a desire to hear later music from his ballets.

Josef Malkin, the new associate solo cellist of the orchestra, played for his first appearance here Haydn's concerto in D major. Apparently nervous during the earlier part of the first movement, he gained in confidence and authority and gave an excellent account of himself. His tone is not large, nor is it particularly sensuous, least of all in the A string, but it is expressive. His intonation, while not always secure yesterday, shows his ear and technic normally to be dependable. He accomplished many beautiful things in phraseology, choosing to leave this charming old music in its own form and of its own period. The slow movement was sung with true musical feeling and a well schooled bow, and in passages of bravura and embellishment he was admirable. Mr Malkin was warmly applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth, played with characteristic virtuosity, nor should Dr Muck's beautiful accompaniment of the concerto be passed by. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" was the program's final number.

Next week Miss Florence Hinkle, the justly admired concert soprano, unique in beauty of voice and intelligence, will be the soloist in the "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the Ave Maria from "The Cross of Fire." The orchestra numbers will be Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra and Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 6.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 12,

NEW 'CELLIST IS WARMLY GREETED

This week's Symphony soloist, Josef Malkin, is one of the new members of the orchestra, who shares the first 'cello desk with Heinrich Warnke. There was evidence of nervousness in his playing yesterday, but generally his tone was bright, theugh not big; his style smooth and graceful, his skill ample and at times brilliant, his treatment of lyric passages sympathetic. The usual large audience applauded him long and fervently. Evidently there were many present who love to hear the 'cello, even though the music written for the instrument is seldom inspiring.

Mr. Malkin is new to Boston, but he appeared in New York as soloist five years ago, during his career as a virtuoso. In Berlin, some years ago, he was a member of the trio presided over by the present concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Witek. He indeed is a welcome addition to a

Mr. Malkin chose the Haydn concerto in D major for his Boston debut. It is a favorite with 'cellists, if not with the public. The other numbers on the program, which will be heard again tonight, are Beethoven's eighth symphony, Stravinsky's "Fireworks" and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

The Stravinsky tone picture is an ingenious bit of symphonic realism introduced to Bostonians a few weeks ago by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. To some it might suggest a lively Fourth of July scene on the Common, with the conflict of bands, the whirr and whiz of pinwheels and rockets and the buzz of a great crowd. With the progress of realism in the realm of music there is every reason to hope for a musical setting of a Harvard-Yale football game in the course of another season or two. Here is an opportunity for aspiring Harvard composers to set forth the boom of field goals, the roar of the fans, the frenetic glee of the snake dance.

There was a joyous performance of the cheerful Beethoven symphony and a brilliant reading of the Schumann overture.

The program for next week's concerts will comprise Wagner's "Faust Overture," Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," Haydn's sixth symphony, and solos by Miss Hinkle, the soprano.

HERALD.
DECEMBER 12

7TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Stravinsky's "Fireworks," in Which Are Bombs, but No Pin Wheels, Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Josef Malkin, violoncellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, F major......Beethoven
"Fireworks"......................Stravinsky
Concerto in D major for violoncello....Haydn
Overture to "Genoveva".........Schumann

When Stravinsky's "Fireworks" was produced in New York by the Russian Symphony Orchestra four years ago, the New York Tribune denounced it as "an aesthetic outrage." There was no need of this savage characterization. The piece is a harmless one written for the marriage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter. It was a wedding present, probably not returnable or exchangeable.

"There'll be fireworks, but you won't see them." There may be fireworks in Stravinsky's composition, but it takes a vivid imagination to hear them. The explosive bombs were unmistakable, but with the most honorable intention we could not hear musical pin wheels, flower pots, Roman candles, Bengal lights, set pieces or rockets worthy the name. Mr. Brock of London, a pyrotechnist, was more fortunate. He was solemnly invited to deliver a judicial opinion as an expert. He was delighted. The music appealed to him and he saw all sorts of things. In his opinion he contrived to refer to the firework displays of his own firm, so Stravinsky's piece may have benefited at least two or three persons. It is no small thing to have pleased a pyrotechnist.

We have not yet heard the music of the real Stravinsky, who si hailed by some as the musical wonder of the age; who is as much discussed as is Arnold Schoenberg. It would have been fairer to this unusual and sincere composer if a suite from one of his ballets had been put on the program. The audience would have gained a better idea of this extraordinary man's music.

Mr. Malkin, the successor of Mr. Urack in the orchestra, played here for the first time. He is a virtuoso of high rank. While his tone is not sensuous, oily or impressive, it was sympathetic in the Adagio, which is the most tolerable movement of Haydn's concerto. He has a fluent technic, plays without self-importance, and in this periwigged music he displayed sound musicianship and fine taste. Thus he made a very favorable impression. But is not the time past for violoncello concertos in a Symphony concert? A little of the violoncello as a solo instrument goes a long way; a concerto in three movements seems interminable, even without formidable cadenzas.

Dr. Muck conducted an admirable performance of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Was Beethoven in jesting mood when he described this symphony as a "little one?" Rather let it for originality and striking effects be reckoned among the great ones. We have never heard a better performance of the work than that of yesterday. Especially to be noted was the treatment of the "working-out" section of the first movement. The capriciousness of Beethoven's fancy in this symphony, the captivating capriciousness of genius, was revealed, not by a force and personal interpretation, but by allowing Beethoven to have his say in his own manner. After all there is truth in the old saw: It takes a genius to understand a genius. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Mozart, "Voi Che Sapete" (Miss Florence Hinkle); Schoenberg, five pieces for orchestra (first time in Boston); Bruch, "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire" (Miss Hinkle); Haydn, spmphony in G major, "The Surprise."

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 12

BEETHOVEN FEATURE BY SYMPHONY

"Fireworks," a Virtuoso Piece, Enjoyed; New Cellist Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, introduced as a soloist Mr. Joseph Malkin, second cellist of the orchestra. Igor Strawinsky's virtuoso piece for orchestra, "Fireworks," was played for the first time at these concerts. The piece was introduced in Boston by Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic, who played it last Nov. 1 in Symphony Hall. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the Genoveva overture of Schumann completed the programme.

BEETHOVEN THE FEATURE

The feature of the concert was neither the musicianly performance of Mr. Malkin nor the exceedingly brilliant performance of Strawinsky's showpiece, nor yet could it have been the romantic music of Schumann. When all is said, when a thousand scores of a hundred composers, schools and periods have been heard, the figure that towers head and shoulders above all others is and will probably remain for generations to come, that of Beethoven.

The performance, of which it is difficult to speak in anything but superlatives, brought the fact home with especial force. It also brought home the supreme tonal beauty and clarity and brilliancy and Promethean power of the Beethoven orchestra.

Secret Died With Beethoven

The secret of this force and power, and its complete representation by means of an orchestra small beside that of the orchestra ordinarily employed today, died with Beethoven. One can perceive the admirable balancing of tone, the economy of weans with which the most original effects are introduced; one can analyze to his heart's content the working of the machinery that Beethoven put in motion, but this is far from discovering the truth of the matter. There is no better illustration of the inexplicable manner in which the inspiration of a great artist glorifies the letter until the letter itself becomes pure spirit. There are the instruments, known to other composers of Beethoven's day than himself; there is the scoring which is apparently child's play by the side of a score of Tristan or Zarathustra. But, like no other orchestra, the Beethoven orchestra is as the mystery of nature in repose, or the elements themselves at play. A gigantic spirit inhabits it.

Gets "True 'Cello Tone"

Mr. Malkin is an unusually capable 'cellist. Others have shown a tone of more sensuous beauty, but his tone is big, though rough, and this is the tone, we beieve, commonly spoken of as the "true 'cello tone." All right, then, it is the true 'cello tone. A prettier tone, a more ladyfied tone, is not, we presume, a true 'cello tone. Again all right.

Mr. Malkin's intonation was admirably true; he was wholly master of his music; he played with the utmost appreciation of its style and with due deference to the wishes of the composer, and he was heartily applauded.

Display of Virtuosity

The performance of Strawinsky's music presented the piece to better advantage than its performance by the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Muck's tempi are more effective, and give more continuity as well as contrast to the music, and there was more conspicuous virtuosity on the part of the players. The piece is a tour de force on the part of a gifted and precocious youth and not without fantasy and humor of a realistic description.

This, too, pleased the audience, Strawinsky was encored, as had been Mr. Walkin, Dr. Muck, Beethoven.

HE BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 25.

KREISLER NEAR DEATH IN COSSACK CHARGE

Violinist, Limping From Wound, Tells of Peril.

His Revolver Saved Him After Being Borne Down Under a Horse.

NEW YORK, Nov 24—Violin virtuosos are supposed to be incapable of withstanding the slightest shock, but Fritz Kreisler, who arrived in New York today with his American wife, is a striking exception, for he limped from a lance wound in his thigh and smiled because he had retaliated by killing a Cossack when fighting with the Austrian Army, in which he is a lieutenant.

In the trenches before Lemberg the violinist first saw action and received the wound that incapacitated him and brought the Austrian authorities to the realization that he was far too valuable to be sacrificed. So he is here, limping along with the aid of a stout cane and full of assurance that a thigh wound has nothing whatever to do with his ability to play the violin.

"I had been in the trenches before Lemberg for four days before the Cossacks made the charge that put me out of action," said Mr Kreisler on board the Rotterdam.

"We had all been on duty for four days without rest when the charge came. It occurred at about midnight, and they came in such numbers that our rifle fire and machine guns never checked them for an instant. Whenever the volleys from the rifles or the stream of lead from the machine guns would cut a hole in their ranks there were more men behind only too eager to fill the gaps.

"Then they were on us. Just as one Cossack came at me, I fired and his horse crumpled under him. I went down with the horse and for a moment was stunned by the force of the fall. Then the horse rolled off me and I found that my right leg had been pierced by the Cossack's lance.

"I didn't have time to think of my wound, be it large or trifling, for the Cossack was trying to free his saber from the confusion of trappings. We closed and for a few moments it was a question which of us would first get his sword or revolver into action. I was lucky and killed him.

"The charge had swept our trench clean of every living soul, and I could find no one to help me. I called feebly but soon forgot, and when I revived I was in the hospital at Lemberg."

It was Mrs Kreisler who told how her husband's servant had gone back to the trench and found Mr Kreisler and brought him to the hospital. Even when he was in the hospital Mrs Kreisler did not know her husband's whereabouts until she chanced to walk by his cot. She was doing duty as a Red Cross nurse.

Mrs Kreisler then saw her husband for the first time in two months, for she had received no direct word from him after he had joined his regiment early in August.

She praised the work of the American nurses in the Austrian Red Cross and said that the Russians were now known throughout the Austrian Army as being humane fighters and fair to their foe.

Mrs Kreisler has come to this country for a series of concerts.

[77]

EVENING RECORD, NOVEMBER 24

Violinist Kreisler Tells of His Experiences in the War How He Killed a Cossack

NEW YORK, Nov. 24.—Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, who served as a lieutenant in the Third Kratz Regiment and was wounded in battle near Lemberg, reached New York today on the steamer Rotterdam. He was accompanied by his wife, who served as a Red Cross nurse in the Austrian army.

"I was wounded on the night of Sept. 16," said Mr. Kreisler. "While resisting a charge of Russian Cossacks I was knocked down by a horse. As the rider passed over me he sank his lance into my right thigh. It caught in my coat and before he could withdraw it I shot and killed. I lay in the trench for hours until I was found."

Mrs. Kreisler saw duty in German and Austrian Red Cross hospitals. She came into personal contact with the American Red Cross units, and she said that they were receiving unbounded praise everywhere.

"I was told by both German and Austrian surgeons that the American nurses could do 20 times the work that their own nurses could, and that their system of handling wounded was simply wonderful.

"As to wounds, I found that the Russian bullets were the most humane, and as foes the Russians were exceptionally courteous. While I was working in the Austrian hospitals I saw and talked with Emperor Francis Joseph many times."

NEW YORK TRIBUNE,

NOVEMBER 6,

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Orchestral Friends from "Hub" Opening Series of Concerts.

In the progress of the score of years during which the Boston Symphony has bestowed its benisons on New York the vocabulary of praise has been thoroughly exhausted; so has that of description and critical analysis.

It is only when the splendid body of musicians introduces a new work, or its conductor discloses a different conception of a familiar work from that held by his colleagues at the head of local organizations that the reviewer can get away from a simple record or a revamping of old utterances. It has become impossible even to chronicle growth in local appreciation of the visitors, for, so far as it can be measured by the attendance, that reached its limit some time ago.

When all the seats in a vast room like Carnegie Hall are subscribed for a year in advance the tale does not admit of many sequels. Nor is it necessary to popular knowledge that reiterations be made of the circumstances that the audiences have come to represent the fine flavor of New York's music lovers.

